WHILST the pontiff Honorius and his competitor were disputing for the throne of St. Peter, great troubles were agitating Italy on the subject of marriages prohibited by the church, in the different degrees of consanguinity, and which the secular laws, however, permitted. Alexander having convoked a council to decide this important question, the assembly composed of bishops and lawyers, after having for a long time examined the canon and civil laws, decided that the degrees of relationship should be counted in accordance with the old custom of the church, and prohibited, under penalty of anathema, that marriages should be entered into by relatives within the seventh generation. Notwithstanding this ridiculous decision, made by the Holy See, the Italians continued to follow the usages of the provinces, from whence arose a sect called the sect of the incestuous.

"This contempt of ecclesiastical thunders, came" says Damian, "of the abuse which the popes made of this terrible punishment. In all the decretals they pronounced the penalty of anathema against those who shall refuse to submit to the orders of the pontiff; which sends to hell an infinite number of Christian souls, before they have perceived the fault which they have committed. This is to spread snares for those who believe they are walking in safety. In the secular tribunals the punishment is proportionate to the crime, by imprisonment, the confiscation of property, or simply a fine; but in the church, for the least disagreement, one is separated from God ~~even~~; which is to suppose with the Stoics, that all ~~men~~ are equal. St. Gregory, ~~and~~ did not so act, they only ~~in~~ in matters of faith, ~~example, and place~~

In our decretals a pecuniary fine, or some other penalty against the transgressors of the laws of the Holy See."

The wise counsels of Damian were not listened to, and popes continued to inundate the kingdoms with their bulls of excommunication. After the death of his competitor, Alexander pursued with bitterness the ecclesiastics who had embraced the party of Cadalous, and left them no truce nor repose until they had submitted to his authority. Duke Godfrey himself was obliged to seek again the alliance of the pontiff, and in order to induce him to forget the protection which he had granted to Honorius, he consented to declare war against the Normans, who in contempt of treaties had seized upon several provinces in the states of the church.

This war was soon terminated; Godfrey, after some skirmishes, drove this people before him, as far as the environs of Aquina; as they found themselves shut up in the mountains, unable to continue their retreat, and not daring to give battle to so powerful an enemy, they sued for peace, offering to restore to the pope all the domains which they had usurped, and to pay a large sum to defray the expenses of the war. These conditions were accepted, and Godfrey returned to his duchy with the blessing of the holy father.

Some troubles then broke out in Milan, occasioned by the violent declamations of the monk St. Ariadus, who, in imitation of Aldobrandin, publicly accused Guy, his metropolitan, of adultery and sodomy, in order to depose him from his See. Ariadus, instigated by Pope Alexander and the cardinals, who had ordered him to resist with violence the enemies of Jesus Christ or his vicar, urged on the people to revolt, and came himself at the head of a furious troop to besiege the episcopal palace; but Guy having penetrated the secret intentions of the pontiff, who wished to substitute his own authority for his, took energetic measures. He called forth with his men-at-arms, seized the monk and bestowed upon him the crown of martyrdom, by beheading him.

After this execution, quiet was restored; but the archbishop fearing new disorders, determined to send a letter of submission to the pope, which he accompanied with rich presents. The gold was all-powerful over the mind of Alexander; not only did the ambassador obtain for Guy the approval of the holy father for the severity which he had displayed during those troubles, but he even sent him back with two legates, Mainard, cardinal bishop of St. Rufinus, and John, a cardinal priest, who bore the pallium to the archbishop of Milan.

The deputies then published this singular constitution: "The clergy and laity who took on oath to repress the deplorable disorders of the clergy of Milan, and who, under this false pretext, have burned, pillaged, violated and massacred the inhabitants of the city and country, are hereby declared to be in a state of excommunication, and are to be treated as such in future."

They should live in accordance with Christian morality, and bring their guilty before their archbishop, the canons of their churches, or the other suffragans. As the majority are more afflicted by temporal than eternal punishments, we condemn those who shall infringe this decree, if they are of the clerical order, to pay to the holy father an hundred livres of pannes, and we pronounce them under interdict until they shall have paid the fine. If they are nobles, we condemn them to pay twenty livres; if they are peasants, they shall pay ten; traders, five, and others in proportion,—the whole for the profit of the Holy See."

Alexander, following the example of his predecessor, wished to extend his dominion over all the churches, and sent into Spain, with the title of legate, the cardinal Hugh the White, who was instructed to introduce into the kingdom of Arragon the Latin in place of the Mozarabic ritual, which was in use throughout the whole peninsula. Hugh then went into Aquitaine. He convoked a council at Auch, and caused this assembly to confirm the independence of the convent of St. Orens, a privilege which the monks had bought with large sums. From thence he went to Toulouse, where he held another synod. The fathers who composed this assembly pronounced diverse judgments against simoniacs, re-established the church of Leitours, which had been converted into a monastery, and swore a blind obedience to the pontiff.

In the following year (1066) a division broke out between the altar and the throne. The emperor Henry, wearied by the misconduct of Bertha, resolved to repudiate her. He informed the archbishop of Mayence of it, who approved of his determination, and wrote to the pope for a confirmation of the dissolution of his marriage; or asking him to give such power to legates, who should go to Mayence in order to pronounce upon the matter. Peter Damian was chosen by the sovereign pontiff to represent him in Germany; but, instead of giving the consent of the holy father to the emperor, he prohibited him from separating from his adulterous spouse; and even deposed the metropolitan of Mayence, because, of his own authority, he had consented to a separation, of which the pope was the sole dispenser.

Henry, informed of the hostile dispositions of Damian, quitted Mayence, and prepared to return to Saxony; but his favourites represented to him that he would act with want of foresight in thus rudely dissolving an assembly composed of the first lords of his kingdom, and that he should avoid increasing the number of malcontents if he wished to obtain a separation from the empress. The prince approved of their advice, and went to Frankfort, where he convoked a new synod.

The fathers having re-assembled, Peter Damian, in the name of Alexander, spoke thus: "Your conduct, my lord, towards your chaste spouse, Bertha, is unworthy not only of a sovereign, but even of a Christian. Take care, prince, how you leave the divine and human laws which condemn you. Rome has terrible arms which will prevent the example of your conduct from perverting her subjects, and which will shake your imperial authority to its very foundations. I command you to conform to the supreme orders of the pontiff; otherwise you will force us to employ the severity of the canons against you, and to take from you that imperial crown of which you have shown yourself unworthy, by betraying the cause of religion." The bishops applauded this discourse, and declared that the pope acted wisely, and that they would sustain his decision.

Henry rose in great agitation, and replied to them: "Since the pope orders it, I will do violence to my own feelings, and bear the load of adultery for the edification of my people."

The pontiff, who showed himself so irritable on a question of divorce, did not manifest the same rigour in his other judgments. Thus, Herman, bishop of Bamberg, who had been excommunicated by the Holy See, for the crimes of simony and incest, authentically proved upon him, continued to exercise his episcopal functions, notwithstanding the anathema which he had incurred. Alexander, informed of this circumstance, wrote to the metropolitans Annon and Sigefroy, to appear at Rome with Herman, in order that he might be condemned a second time by a council. The prelates obeyed; but the guilty bishop took care to bring with him large sums of money, which soothed the anger of the pope; and not only did Alexander re-instate him in his dignity, but he even granted to him the pallium and all the privileges attached to archiepiscopal Sees.

Lambert of Schaferburg relates, that in a great festival given by the holy father to the three prelates, when the fumes of generous wine had clouded his reason, he declared that he did not regard simony as a crime; and that, if he deposed simoniacal or concubinary priests, it was for the purpose of selling absolution to them; that on the other hand, he much approved of those bishops who had mistresses, and knew how to increase their treasures.

Some years before these events, a great revolution took place in England. William the Bastard, duke of Normandy, had conquered that island. Alexander hastened to send a standard which he had blessed to the usurper, with a bull of investiture, which dispossessed Harold the legitimate king. William, from gratitude to the Holy See, or rather, in consequence of a compact with the court of Rome, augmented the tax of St. Peter, and doubled the tithes which the people paid to the clergy. He also sent to the pope a large quantity of gold and silver money, sacred vases, and the standard of King Harold, on which was embroidered an armed man, covered with armour of precious stones.

Legates and Italian monks soon came to avail themselves of this new conquest, and to extend the pontifical sway over all the churches. Rapin affirms, "that they carved and elipt ecclesiastical matters as they pleased." Lanfranc was named metropolitan of Canterbury, Thomas archbishop of York, and both went to Rome during the following year to make their submission to the pope. Alexander, as a recompense for their zeal, gave them the pallium, and overwhelmed them with honours, especially Lanfranc, before whom he rose deferentially, adding, "I do not render you this honour, my brother, because you are archbishop of Canterbury, but because I was your disciple in the monastery of Bec." He gave the prelates a letter for William the Bastard, in which he was prodigal of the most extravagant eulogies on that prince, he thus concluded it, "We entreat you to follow the councils of Lanfranc for the interests of the church, for we have granted to him all the authority of the Holy See over the ecclesiastical affairs of England. We authorize him to preserve the monks in the cathedrals, and we prohibit the clergy from employing the aid of the secular power, to drive away the monks from St. Saviour of Canterbury, and the other metropolitan churches."

But whilst the pontiff was disposing at will of the kingdom and church of England, Henry the Fourth, irritated against the Holy See, and the bishops who had constrained him to live with Bertha, his adulterous wife, took his vengeance on the unfortunate people for the outrages which he had received. The prince surrounded all the cities of Saxony and Thuringia with fortresses, and after having placed numerous garrisons in these castles, he organized the pillage of the provinces. By his orders the troops ravaged the country, violated girls and women, burned the farm-houses and massacred the cultivators.

For the purpose of justifying these violences, Sigefroy, metropolitan of Mayence, advised the king to decree, by a council, that sovereigns were permitted to sell or murder their subjects when they could no longer pay the imposts. This frightful assembly was convened at Erford for the 10th of March 1073, and the priests dared to declare that God authorized kings to massacre the people, when they refused to pay imposts or tithes. Notwithstanding this abominable decision, some Saxon nobles united with the citizens of Thuringia, and remonstrated with the king, threatening to appeal to the Holy See. Henry, exasperated by this opposition, burst out into an excess of rage, and in the midst of his imprecations, swore, that if any of his subjects had the boldness to write to Rome, he would put him to death by the most horrid punishments, and would cover the provinces with so great disasters, that they would be remembered for many years. Two courageous men, however, informed the Holy See of the exactions of which they were the victims. Alexander immediately wrote to the prince to come to Rome to be judged by a council; but the holy father did not live long enough to finish this matter; he died suddenly, on the 20th of April 1073, after having held the Holy See for eleven years and a half.

Alexander contributed much to augment the wealth of the church, by instituting the offering of the first fruits, an impost imitated from the Mosaic law, which commanded the Jews to give to the priests the first fruits of their trees, and the first born of their flocks.

This pontiff, if we can believe William of Poitiers, was eloquent, well informed and worthy to rule the universal church; he cites some of his decisions, which are remarkable for their wisdom. For example, the holy father prohibited a married man from entering upon a monastic life without the consent of his wife, because her husband had no right to force her to continence, if she was unwilling to submit to it.

Leo and Desiderius represent Alexander as a pope of great sanctity, and endowed with the gift of miracles. "He freed," they add, "from the spirit of evil, a monk of Monte Cassino; and one day, a lame woman having drunk some drops of water in which he had washed his hands, was miraculously cured."

At length the ambitious Hildebrand, that fanatical monk, that poisoner of popes, whom we have seen struggling obstinately against all temporal powers, mounted the chair of St. Peter, after having buried eight pontiffs, who were the instruments of his policy and the victims of his ambition. He was an Italian by birth—his father, named Banizon, was a carpenter at Rome; his mother carried on an incestuous intercourse with her brother, the abbot of the monastery of Our Lady on Mount Aventine; and some authors affirm, that Hildebrand was the fruit of their amours. He was brought up by his uncle, who took great pains with his education, and when he had attained his fifteenth year, he was sent into France to continue his studies in the celebrated abbey of Cluny.

Some years afterwards, his education being completed, Hildebrand resolved, before returning to Rome, to visit the court of the emperor Henry the Black, for the purpose of preaching there the word of God. His sermons were so successful, that the most learned bishops of the age left their dioceses to come to listen to him. On the rumour of this renown, Leo the Ninth hastened to recall him into Italy, and attached him to his person in the capacity of a counsellor. He also gave him the monastery of St. Paul, which was in a deplorable state, and the church of which was used as a stable. The monks of this abbey instead of fulfilling their religious duties, were occupied in debauchery, and lived publicly with courtezans, whom they had introduced into the convent, and who served in the refectory.

Hildebrand, a skilful priest, at first exhibited great rigidity of morals; he reformed abuses, restored the rigour of discipline, and wished to drive from the convent the women whom he found there, but having been surprised himself in adultery with one of the handsomest serving girls, he was obliged, in order to avoid a scandal which would have unmasked his hypocrisy, to review his first decision and authorize the monks to keep women in the convent. The reason which he gave to the holy father in explanation of this change in his ideas was, that he had discovered that they understood domestic economy and order better than the brethren.

After the death of Leo, his successor, Nicholas, elevated Hildebrand to the rank of archdeacon of the Roman church, and granted him great authority over the clergy. Other pontiffs also employed him near to kings and princes, in the capacity of ambassador from the Holy See, on account of his great reputation for address and eloquence. Finally, on the day of the funeral of Alexander the Second, the cardinals and other ecclesiastics assembled in the church of St. Peter to deliberate on the choice of a new pontiff. Some proposed Didier, the abbot of Monte Cassino; others wished to name Jerome, a venerable priest of the chapter of St. Rufinus, but no one dreamed of elevating to the Holy See the son of the incestuous wife of Banizon the carpenter.

Suddenly, some priests, who had adroitly mingled among the people, exclaimed: "Hildebrand is pope, St. Peter has chosen him." Their words excited great acclamations; the crowd ran towards the church, where the cardinals were assembled, uttering the same cries. The affrighted cardinals dared not resist this public manifestation, and immediately signed the decree which elevated Hildebrand to the Holy See. He was enthroned by the name of Gregory the Seventh.

Cardinal Benno affirms, that Hildebrand entered the conclave followed by armed men, and that he used terror to force their suffrages, and thus usurp the supreme dignity of the church. "He knew by experience," adds this historian, "that the pontifical chair is the first throne in the world; he knew all the advantages of the papacy; and the secrets of the palace of the Lateran were no mysteries to him. He had rendered himself so powerful in the church, that Damian calls him the master of the popes, and that one day he said to him in the presence of several bishops, 'I honour the holy father as every ecclesiastic should; but you I adore on both knees, because you make our pontiffs supreme; and because they have made you a god.'"

Another historian, Heydegger, assures us that he obtained the Holy See through the assistance of Satan; he accuses him of having been a sorcerer, a magician, and the most abominable of men. Ecclesiastical authors, on the other hand, describe him as an incomparable pontiff; they cannot find eulogies sufficiently magnificent, in which to glorify his science and his virtues. They adduce his descent from the illustrious family of the counts of Petiliani, and maintain that the other versions in regard to his birth, are fables invented by his enemies.

Gregory the Seventh was sixty years old when he was elevated to the chair of St. Peter; he was fat and short, and nature had refused to him exterior gifts; but in recompense therefor his soul was great, his mind vigorous and enlightened. He possessed profound erudition in divinity, and especially in regard to religious legislation, and the customs of the church. Ardent, imperious, enterprising and bold, Hildebrand pursued all his enterprises with great energy, giving proof of an intrepid courage that no obstacle could arrest, and of an inflexibility which recoiled neither from treason nor crime; thus historians have accused him of having poisoned the seven popes who preceded him, in order to pave his way to the pontifical throne.

On the day succeeding his election, the hypocritical Hildebrand, desiring to prevent the reclamations of Didier, his competitor for the chair of St. Peter, hastened to write to him the following letter, which he sent to Monte Cassino, by one of his chamberlains. "The pope Alexander is no more, my brother, and his death has fallen upon me to overwhelm me; it has torn my entrails, and precipitated me into an abyss. Whilst they were celebrating the service for the dead over his mortal remains, a great tumult broke out among the people; priests, as if crazy, seized upon me and bore me on their shoulders to the palace of the Lateran, where they seated me on the chair of the apostle, so that I could but exclaim with the prophet: "I am come into the depths of the sea, and my forehead is ravaged by a tempest." I shall not detain you longer with my afflictions, but will claim from your charity the prayers of your brethren, that God will sustain me in the peril which I wished to shun. We wait for you in our palace, my brother, for you know how much the Roman church needs your devotion and your prudence. Salute for me the empress Agnes, and the venerable Rainard, the bishop of Como, and beseech them to continue their affection and their prayers for me."

Hildebrand had laboured for a long time to take from the emperors the rights which they had acquired over the church of Rome. Become pope himself, he used the experience which he had acquired in his long career, and prepared for the success of his policy by crooked ways. At first he affected great deference for King Henry, and sent Didier as ambassador to him to inform him of his election, and to beseech him not to confirm it, because he preferred, he affirmed, the humble retreat of a monastery to the splendour of palaces. But no one was the dupe of his hypocrisy; and the council of Brixen, assembled by the prince, to receive the legates of the new pope, accused Hildebrand of having usurped the tiara, and refused to confirm his nomination.

Gregory seeing the turn which matters were taking, hastened to write to Didier, reproaching him for his lukewarmness in a matter so important, and even accused him of throwing the way of his nomination, through prelate of Metz: "As for those who maintain that kings cannot be legitimately deposed by popes, I refer them to the words and the example of the fathers; and they will learn that St. Peter said: 'Be ye always ready to punish the guilty, whatever their rank.' Let them consider the motives which induced Pope Zachary to depose King Childeric, and to free all the Franks from their oath of fidelity. Let them learn that St. Gregory, in his decretals, not only excommunicated the lords and kings who opposed the execution of his orders, but that he even deprived them of their power. Let them not forget that St. Ambrose himself drove from the temple the emperor Theodosius, calling him a profane man, sacrilegious, and a murderer.

"Perhaps these miserable slaves of kings would maintain that God, when he said to St. Peter: 'Feed my lambs,' excepted princes; but we will demonstrate that Christ, in giving to the apostle power to bind and loose men, excepted no one. The Holy See has absolute power over all spiritual things: why should it not also rule temporal affairs? God reigns in the heavens,—his vicar should reign over all the earth. These senseless wretches, however, maintain that the royal is above the episcopal dignity. Are they, then, ignorant that the name of king was invented by human pride, and that the title of bishop was instituted by Christ? St. Ambrose affirms that the episcopate is superior to royalty, as gold is superior to a viler metal."

The astute policy of the pope drew off the greater part of the prelates and lords of Germany into the party of the Holy See; and Henry saw all his friends retiring gradually from his cause. Several bishops who had before subscribed to the condemnation of the pope, sent deputies to Rome to make their apologies. Others went in person, with naked feet, to the tomb of the apostles, in order to obtain their pardon.

Gregory received them all with great honours, loaded them with presents, and took with them skilful measures which would lead to the entire destruction of the party of the king of Germany. On the other side, the criminal intercourse which the pope carried on with the empress Agnes, his mother, the duchess Beatrice, his aunt, and the countess Matilda, his cousin-german, assured to him still more perfectly the execution of his ambitious projects.

Beatrice possessed immense estates in Italy, and Matilda her daughter, the wife of Godfrey the Hunchback, was, through her husband, still more powerful than she; these two women after the rupture which had taken place between the altar and the throne, abandoned Henry, renounced the ties of blood, and loudly declared for Gregory.

Matilda, who was publicly recognized as the mistress of the pope, wished to force the duke her husband to embrace the cause of the Holy See; but he resisted all her seductions, and on the contrary raised troops which he led to the king. Hildebrand, fearful lest these re-inforcements should place his enemy in a situation to march on Rome, determined the princess to employ violence to deliver him from her husband, and Godfrey the Hunchback was assassinated in the city of Anvers on the night of the 20th of February 1076.

Gregory, in his turn, out of gratitude for the service which had been rendered him, resolved to disembarass himself of the dutchess Beatrice, the rival and mother of Matilda; he solicited from his former mistress the favour of a meeting, passed the night with her, and caused her to be strangled in the morning.

By this double crime the countess Matilda became the absolute sovereign of immense estates; she became the inseparable companion of Hildebrand, established herself in the palace of the Lateran, where she assisted with the cardinals at the private councils of the sovereign pontiff. Platinus affirms, that she followed him in all his journeys, served him in his bed, and frequently passed the nights in his chamber, to the great scandal of the chamberlains, who were not permitted to enter the apartments of the holy father.

Gregory had arrived at the height of his power; he feared no enemy; he trampled the people beneath his pontifical sandal; he abandoned himself to every license, pushed on provinces to revolt, named emperors, and declared the clergy and laity who remained attached to the unfortunate Henry, excommunicated. By his intrigues he soon formed a formidable league in Germany against the prince. Rudolph, duke of Suabia, Guelf, duke of Bavaria, Berthold, duke of Carinthia, Adalbert, bishop of Wirtzburg, Adalbert, bishop of Worms, and some other lords assembled at Ulm, and convened a general diet for the 16th of October, in the city of Tribur, near Mayence. They sent their decree to the lords of Suabia, Bavaria, Saxony, Lorraine, and Franconia, beseeching them, in the name of Christ, to abandon their private affairs and come to bring the aid of their intelligence, in taking suitable measures to re-establish the tranquillity of the kingdom.

On the appointed day the assembly commenced its session; the policy of the holy father was fully successful; the metropolitan of Mayence and a great number of ecclesiastics, who had been devoted to the prince, were obliged to unite with the Roman legates, under penalty of being regarded as enemies to the state. One of the ambassadors of the pope spoke and recounted the whole life of Henry; he dragged forth the crimes which had soiled his early youth; he accused him of having removed the lords from all participation in the government, in order to elevate men of low birth to the first dignities in the kingdom; he affirmed that the prince had singular and anti-christian ideas; that he wished to exterminate the nobility, destroy the churches and the monasteries, in order to employ their riches in solacing the people; and he concluded by presenting, as the only remedy for so many evils, the election of a king of Germany, capachurch had not already habituated us to see priests cause rivers of blood to flow, and become guilty of all crimes.

Gregory availed himself of the troubles which had broken out in Saxony, to try his strength with the sovereign, and for this purpose he addressed letters to Vezel, the metropolitan of Magdeburg, to Burchard, the prefect of Halberstadt, to the marquis Dedit, and other lords of that province, to bring about a suspension of arms, until the nuncios of the Holy See went into Germany to do them justice.

Before the departure of the legates he convoked a council, which regulated in advance the reforms to be exacted from the princes, and the concessions which it was useful to obtain for the interest of the Holy See. In this assembly the pope evinced an inflexible rigour. He decided against the marriage of priests; preferring, he said, a concubinary clergy, sodomites, and even incestuous persons, to those who contracted lawful unions. "Marriage," added Gregory, "attaches the clergy to the state in giving them families, and estranges them from the church, for which they should sacrifice every thing." He prohibited all the faithful, under penalty of anathema, from assisting at divine service which was celebrated by married priests; and he addressed this decree to the churches of France, Italy, England, and Germany.

The French clergy opposed this scandalous decision, and the bishops addressed this violent letter to him: "You are an heretic, most holy father, since you teach an insensate morality, contrary to the words of Christ and the doctrine of the apostle, who said, 'let him among you who cannot live in abstinence, marry; for it is better for him to marry than to burn.' As for you, sacrilegious pontiff, whose debaucheries with young monks, and adulteries with the countess Matilda and her mother are a public scandal, we learn that you would lead priests into your disorders, by forcing them to separate from their wives; but we declare to you that we would rather renounce the priesthood than our lawful wives."

In the same assembly Gregory accused the king of Germany, through bishops devoted to the court of Rome, and upon their complaints Henry was solemnly excommunicated. After the termination of the council, the bishops of Palestrina, Ostia, Coira and Como went to Germany on an apparent mission to pacify the troubles of that kingdom. Henry came as far as Nuremberg to meet them, but they refused to see him, and insolently informed him that they had orders to treat him as an excommunicated person, and that they could not confer with him until he had submitted to the penance which the laws of the church imposed on him, and had taken an oath of obedience to the pope.

The king, fearful lest his troops, in consequence of the excommunication launched against him, should abandon him at the moment when the Saxons were in full revolt, and were threatening to drive him from his kingdom, confessed himself guilty, consented to perform the penance indicated to him, engaged to remain submissive to the pontiff, and finally obtained absolution. In the confession which the nuncios of the Holy See caused him to subscribe with his own hand, Henry admitted "that he had not employed the sovereign power as a true servant of God, that he had usurped ecclesiastical domains, and sold churches to augment his treasures, and that he had massacred his subjects for the purpose of depriving them of their wealth."

But the German bishops, indignant at the cowardice of the prince, soon forced him to assume another attitude. A council having been convoked by the legates, they claimed the presidency of it as the representatives of Gregory the Seventh. The German prelates then declared that they opposed this proud pretension as contrary to the canons, and that they would never yield the right of presiding but to the pope in person, since the ecclesiastical rules formally indicated that provincial synods should be presided over by the metropolitan of the province in which the assembly was held, and that consequently they rejected the new usage which the court of Rome wished to introduce into Germany. Liemar, archbishop of Bremen, severely reprimanded the nuncios for their pride, saying that the metropolitan of Mayence and himself being the vicars of the Holy See, in accordance with the privileges granted to their predecessors, they alone had the right of representing the pontiff, which the bishops of Palestrina, Coira, Ostia, and Como could not do, who were the mere envoys of Rome, instructed to carry the orders of the holy father. Henry sustained this opinion with all his authority, and wished to take from them the confession which he had subscribed; unfortunately it was already in the hands of the pontiff.

As soon as Gregory was informed of the opposition of the prelates of Germany, he wrote to the metropolitan of Mayence: "We hoped, my brother, you would recollect how much you loved us before we were on the throne of the apostle, and we thought you would have preserved the recollection of the confidence with which we advised with you on our most secret affairs. We had even conceived great hopes of your piety, since you manifested a desire of retiring to Cluny. We now learn that you deceive our hopes, and we should be wanting in the sacred duty of friendship, if we failed to warn you of it. You will come to Rome, then, during the first week in Lent, and will bring with your suffragans Otho of Constance, Garnier of Strasburg, Henry of Spire, Herman of Bamberg, Imbrick of Augsburg, and Adalbert of Wirtzburg."

The holy father wrote at the same time to Liemar, accusing him of ingratitude; he suspended him from his episcopal functions, and ordered him to go to the synod to hear a definite judgment pronounced against him. He also addressed a letter to King Henry, which he besought him to make public; the following was its tenor: "We are informed, my son, that the Christians beyond the sea, persecuted by the infidel, and pressed down by the misery which overwhelms them, have sent entreaties to the Holy See, imploring our aid, lest during our reign, the torch of religion should be extinguished in the East. We are penetrated with an holy grief, and we ardently aspire after martyrdom. We prefer to expose our life to protect our brethren, rather than remain at Rome to dictate laws to the world, when we know that the children of God are dying in slavery. We have consequently undertaken to excite the zeal of all the faithful of the West, and to lead them in our train to the defence of Palestine. Already have the Italians and Lombards, inspired by the Holy Spirit, heard our exhortations with enthusiasm, and more than fifty thousand warriors are preparing for this far distant expedition, determined to wrest the sepulchre of Christ from the hands of the infidel. I have the more decided to conduct this enterprise in person, as the church of Constantinople asks to be re-united to ours, and that all the inhabitants may wait upon us to put an end to their religious quarrels. Our fathers have frequently visited these provinces, in order to confirm the faith by holy words; we wish in our turn to follow in their footsteps, if God permits; but as so great an enterprise needs a powerful auxiliary, we demand the aid of your sword."

Hildebrand wrote a general letter on the same subject to all the nations of the West, in which he excited the princes to the holy war against the infidel, beseeching them to send ambassadors to Rome, with whom he could arrange the execution of an expedition beyond the sea. Gregory, however, notwithstanding his obstinate perseverance in the project of conquering the Holy Land, could not put it in execution, in consequence of the refusal of the king of Germany to become an associate in this dangerous enterprise. The pope fearing the ambition of the prince, if he abandoned Italy to combat the infidels, renounced his designs, and applied himself only to augment the temporal grandeur of the Holy See.

Gregory, greedy of universal authority, which was the aim of his ambition, sought for every occasion of constituting himself absolute judge of sovereigns and lords. Thus, in order to punish Phillip the First of France, for his encroachments on the privileges of the churches, he took from him the right of investiture, and prohibited him, under penalty of excommunication, from undertaking any thing in future against the bishoprics and abbey of his kingdom. The pontiff addressed a vehement letter on this subject to the prelates of the Gauls, and in particular to Marquis of Rheims, Richard of Sens and Richard of Bourges. "All crimes," he wrote to these bishops, "are committed with impunity in your provinces—perjury, sacrilege, incest, murder, are regarded as pious actions—citizens pillage and massacre one another. Pilgrims going to or returning from Rome are despoiled, cast into frightful dungeons, or subjected to torture, in order to exact from them ransoms which ruin their fortunes: if they refuse to pay, they are murdered without pity.

"Phillip is the cause of these evils, that execrable Phillip, who does not deserve the name of king, but that of tyrant, and who passes his life in acts of infamy with his minions. Not content with having excited the divine wrath through his exactions, adulteries, rascalities, and murders, this avaricious wretch dares to rob foreign merchants who come into his states, under the guarantee of his royal word, to traffic.

"And you, unworthy bishops, why do you not resist the abominable prince who desolates your people? Are you willing to render yourselves accomplices of his outrages in the eyes of Christ? Do not believe that in opposing his depredations you are wanting in the fidelity and respect exacted from you; you would on the contrary prove your great devotion by drawing him back from the abyss into which he is plunged. Besides, we who are elevated as high above kings as heaven is above the earth, we give you absolute power over his person; no longer fear to resist him, and if you will unite in the defence of justice you will have a force capable of restraining him without any peril; and even though you may expose your lives in condemning him, should you hesitate to do your duty in the execution of our supreme will?

"Wherefore, by virtue of our apostolical authority, we order you to represent to your king how criminal his actions are. Engage him to abandon his habits of sodomy; to establish justice, and raise up again the glory of his crown. If he remains hardened in sin, without being willing to listen to you; if he shows no repentance nor compassion for his people, declare to him in our name, that the thunders of St. Peter will strike him, as God before struck Satan. Separate yourselves entirely from the communion of this reprobate; interdict, throughout all France, the celebration of divine service, and close all the churches.

"If this censure is not strong enough to bring him to us, asking for grace and pardon on his knees, publish immediately, that with the aid of God we will use our efforts to assemble troops, and come to deliver France from this abominable monster."

The threats of Gregory were inefficacious. The bishops of the kingdom, who partook with the king in the spoils of the unfortunate people, took his part, and Phillip continued his dilapidations, his debaucheries, and his massacres, with the full approval of his clergy. In his opposition to kings, Gregory was not moved by a religious sentiment of humanity, but by his insatiable desire for sway, which led him to extend his political vigilance into every country.

The council which the pontiff had convoked at Rome for the first week in Lent, assembled on the 24th of February. Gregory excommunicated five officers of the palace of King ters to the holy father, and asking him to come to their council and confirm the choice which they had made of Rudolph of Suabia as their sovereign. Finally, in order to crown his misfortunes, Matilda made a solemn donation of all her estates to the Holy See, to the prejudice of the house of Henry, who were her legitimate heirs. The king then, incited by despair, took an energetic resolve, and swore to draw down vengeance on Hildebrand, the author of all his ills. He traversed Lombardy, called to his side all the excommunicated, all who were enemies of the pope, and openly declared war on the Holy See.

In less than two months, the prince saw himself at the head of a numerous army, and made his dispositions to march on Rome. At the news of this levy of armed men, Gregory lost his arrogance, and tried negotiations, not daring either to declare against Henry, or abandon the cause of King Rudolph; and as it became impossible for him to go into Germany on account of the Lombard troops who guarded all the routes, he addressed letters to the Germans, expressing the doubts of his mind in regard to the rights of the two sovereigns.

The lords and bishops, surprised at this change, replied to the pope: "You know, holy father, and your letters, which we have preserved, are witnesses of it, that it was neither by our advice, nor for our interests, that King Henry was deposed; in that we obeyed the will of the Holy See. Since you prohibited us, under penalty of the most terrible evils, from recognizing him as king, we have executed your orders at the hazard of our fortunes and our lives; for the prince, after your sentence, exercised great cruelties against us. Our submission to your decrees first brought on us the ruin of our provinces; then the humiliation of seeing the sovereign of the country constrained to crouch at your feet like a dog, in order to receive absolution, and to obtain from your holiness permission to ravage our fields and our cities a second time, and to avenge himself on us for the ills you have drawn on him.

"After having left the kingdom for an entire year without a head, in conformity with your wishes, we have chosen a king whom you had yourself chosen; and now, whilst he is engaged for the good of his people, instead of confirming his nomination, you recognize two kings in the same country, and you send your legates to both. This indecision which exists in your mind, increases our divisions; for in your letters you call King Henry a prevaricator, and you ask from him a safe conduct to come to our meeting, as if he yet preserved some power. We are also informed that you listen favourably to those whom you have excommunicated with him, and yet you exhort us to remain faithful to Rudolph.

only see the deplorable results of your conduct. In managing the two parties, you light up a civil war. You incite pillages, incendiarism, massacres, and the destruction of the royal domain; so that the kings, for the future, will only live by rapine and robbery. These evils would not have existed, if you had not lighted in our provinces the fire of discord. It is the excess of our grief which induces us to speak in language so severe, because we are exposed to the rage of the wolves, for having obeyed the shepherd. And now, if the shepherd becomes our enemy, we shall no longer have faith neither in the pontiffs, nor the apostles, nor Christ; we shall regard popes and kings as the implacable enemies of humanity, and we shall devote them to the execration of the people."

Gregory did not reply to this letter, and received with equal honours the ambassadors of the two kings of Germany. He was then occupied in holding several councils at Rome, to renew the anathemas pronounced against the partizans of Henry, and to compel Berenger of Tours to make a solemn retraction of his doctrine concerning the eucharist. He excommunicated, during the same year, Boleslas, the king of Poland, and wished to force the king of England to submit to the Holy See. Finally, having learned that Henry was about to enter Germany to combat his rival, he determined to excommunicate him anew, and publicly to recognize Rudolph, duke of Suabia, as the sovereign of Germany.

In this remarkable decree, the pope addressed St. Peter and St. Paul in these terms: "Blessed apostles, you are witnesses that the German lords and bishops, without our advice, chose duke Rudolph as their king; and that this prince immediately sent ambassadors to our legate, declaring that he had undertaken, despite of himself, the government of the kingdom, and that he was ready to obey us in all things; offering, as a proof of his sincerity, to send us rich presents, and to give us as hostages, his son and that of duke Berthold. You know that Henry, at the same time, besought us to declare in his favour, against Rudolph, and that we replied, that we would act of our own will, after having heard these two princes in a council. But as soon as Henry supposed that he could overthrow his competitor without our aid, he repulsed our interference with contempt.

"It is therefore, most holy apostles, after having invoked your testimony as a guarantee of our sincerity, we employ your authority in condemning this sovereign and his accomplices. We declare Henry dispossessed of the crown of Germany and Italy; we anathematize him, and we invoke on his head the thunders of heaven; we beseech you to take from him all prudence in council, and to render him cowardly in battle, so that he may never gain any victory. We declare Rudolph the lawful king of the Teutonic states, and we grant to all who shall betray Henry, absolution from all their sins, and the blessing of Christ in this world and the next.

"Now blessed St. Peter and St. Paul, let the world know, by giving victory to Rudolph, that you can bind and loose in heaven; that you can give or take away empires, kingdoms, principalities, duchies, marquisates, countships, and the goods of all men; finally, that you take from the unworthy and bestow on the good, the pontificate, primacies, archbishoprics and bishoprics. Let the people learn that you judge spiritual things, and that you have an absolute power over temporal affairs; that you can curb the demons, who are the councillors of princes, and annihilate kings and the powerful of the earth. Display then your greatness and your power, and let the world now tremble before the redoubtable orders of your church. Cause especially the sword of your justice promptly to strike the head of the criminal Henry, in order that all Christians may learn that he has been stricken by your will."

This sentence was decreed at Rome, on the 7th of March, 1080, and Hildebrand sent it to King Rudolph, with a magnificent crown of gold enriched with precious stones.

Notwithstanding all the imprecations of Gregory, events gave a striking lie to him. Henry entered Germany at the head of a numerous army, and gained a signal victory over his competitor, in the famous day of Fladeheim; after which the prince convoked a synod at Brixen, to which he called all the bishops and lords of Lombardy, and a large part of the ecclesiastics and nobles of Germany.

In this assembly they accused Gregory of heresy, impiety, sacrilege, simony, extortions, adultery, murder and magic; they produced witnesses who proved that the pope had cast the holy host into the fire, whilst conjuring up demons; the priests of the interior of the palace of the Lateran declared that he had poisoned the seven popes, his predecessors, by means of his intimate confidant, Gerard Brazurus; finally, the fathers pronounced an excommunication against Gregory, deposed him from the Holy See, and proclaimed Guibert, the metropolitan of Ravenna, sovereign pontiff; who assumed the name of Clement the Third.

As soon as the pope was apprized of the election of Guibert, he hastened to send legates to Apulia and Calabria to draw off the population to his side. He thus expressed himself about these schismatics, "They have been forced to renew their old conspiracy; they have chosen as their chief an heretic, a sacrilegious person, a perjurer, an assassin who wished to wrest from us our tiara and our life—an antichrist—a Guibert!! In a cabal composed of cleromiacal and concubinary prelates, our enemies have even pushed their fury so far as to condemn us, because we refused to their entreaties and their threats pardon for their crimes. But God sustains us, he will make us triumph over the wicked, and we despise their anathemas."

Notwithstanding his apparent security, Gregory laboured actively to obtain the protection of William, king of England, whom he had excommunicated some months before; he also entered into treaties with Robert Guiscard, with Jourdain, the prince of Capua, and other Norman lords, whom he had before excommunicated. He granted to them absolution, confirmed them in possession of the estates they had usurped, and in exchange, concluded with them a treaty, by which they engaged to defend the Holy See against its enemies, and to unite with the lords of Tuscany, the vassals of the countess Matilda, in attacking the anti-pope in the city of Ravenna. At the same time, he addressed letters to Germany, exciting the people in favour of Rudolph, and affirming that the apostle Peter had appeared to him, and announced that a false king would die this year before the day of his feast. "If this prediction be not accomplished," adds he, "I swear before God and men, that I am unworthy to be pope."

Sigebert relates that the Saxons, full of confidence in this prophecy, induced Rudolph to try the chance of arms; he marched to meet Henry, with an army inferior in numbers to that of that prince. The affair took place on the borders of the river Ellestre, near to Mersburg, in Saxony. Five times were his troops repulsed with loss, and five times he led them back to the charge. Finally, in the last charge, Godfrey of Bouillon, pushed his horse right against Rudolph, wounded him with a blow of his lance in the lower part of his belly and overthrew him on the field of battle; at the same moment, a knight struck the unfortunate king with his sword and cut off his right hand; Rudolph died almost at once. The soldiers, alarmed at the loss of their chief, abandoned their ranks and took refuge in Mersburg.

Rivet informs us that Pope Gregory, in a public discourse, had announced anew in prophetic terms, the victory of Rudolph, and the death of Henry; but that, thanks to an active care, the assassins sent by the holy father had been arrested, and that Gregory then, in order not to compromise his dignity as a prophet, affirmed that the prediction only related to the soul of the king.

Bayle, in his dictionary, reasons thus singularly: "Either Hildebrand believed that his prediction would be accomplished, or he did not believe it. If he believed it, we must call him a false prophet, and if he did not believe it, an infamous impostor, because he sacrificed the holiness of religion to his temporal interests; from whence we must conclude," adds he, "that the popes have been more than once wicked hypocrites, worthy of the rope and fire."

After the decisive victory which he had gained in Germany over his competitor, Henry re-entered Italy and conquered the troops of his cousin Matilda, near Mantua. Thus, the countess found herself menaced with the loss of her states. Notwithstanding these checks, the intrepid Hildebrand assembled new troops to oppose the prince; but the latter drove these illy disciplined bands before him, and intrepid deacon entered the pontifical palace, put aside the guards, and going straight up to the holy father, said to him: "The emperor, my master, as well as all the German and Italian bishops, order thee to descend at once from the apostolic throne, which thou hast dishonoured by thy crimes." Then turning towards the Roman clergy, he added: "My brethren, I command you, in the name of the king, to go to him on the day of Pentecost, to choose a new pope in the place of him who has the audacity to preside here."

He had scarcely spoken, when the bishop John, and the prefect of Rome, at the head of his soldiery, precipitated themselves upon him to murder him; but Hildebrand was too skilful a politician to allow them to commit a crime which would have rendered him odious to all the world. He covered with his own body the ambassador of the prince, and prohibited any attempts upon his life.

He then calmly resumed his place, and addressed the assembly. "My friends," said he, "let us not trouble the peace of the church by becoming guilty of an useless murder. These are the dangerous times of which the Scriptures speak. We shall see proud, greedy, and cruel men, who would rend the bosom of their mother. Christendom must be filled with desolation; and Christ has sent us as sheep for the wolves. We should then have the mildness of the dove, and support with resignation the outrages of senseless men, who desire to betray the laws of God. The Lord wishes to water his house with the blood of the saints. Let us then prepare for martyrdom, and let our death assure the glory and triumph of the church, as God himself has revealed to us by sending us a mysterious sign, which we now place before your eyes." At the same time he showed them a hen's egg, found accidentally, he affirmed, near the church of St. Peter.

Upon this egg was engraved, in relief, a serpent armed with a sword and shield, which appeared to wish to elevate itself upon the upper part of the egg, although by a secret power it was constrained to writhe even to the lower. The pope gave an enigmatical explanation of this singular phenomenon, and thus concluded his disclosure: "This sign, my children, announces to us that we must now employ the sword of the word to strike the serpent in the head, and to avenge the church. Let us act, then, since God orders us, for we have already had too much patience."

The holy father then, with one of those contradictions which would be sufficient to demonstrate all the hypocrisy of his conduct, after having commenced his discourse with a feigned moderation, finished it with menaces of death against the sovereign. The council approved unanimously of the sentiments of Gregory; and all the bishops declared they were ready to endure the most terrible punishments in so holy a cause.

Gregory pronounced the following anathema against Henry and his accomplices: "St. Peter, prince of the apostles, hear thy servant, whom thou hast nourished from his childhood, and whom thou hast protected against the wicked who persecute me. You are my witnesses, you, holy mother of God, St. Paul, and all the saints of heaven, that the Roman clergy constrained me to govern them, and that I would rather have finished my days in exile, than have usurped your place by unworthy means. But since I have reached this throne by your grace, I believe that it is your will that Christian people should obey me, by virtue of the power which you have transmitted to me of binding and loosing in heaven and on earth. Thus, for the safety of the church, and in the name of God all powerful, the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, I prohibit Henry, who by reason of an unheard of pride, has elevated himself against us, from governing the kingdoms of Germany and Italy. I free all Christians from the oaths which they have taken to him, and I prohibit all from serving him as king; for he who would oppose our authority, deserves to lose his crown, his liberty, and his life. I burden Henry, then, with anathema and malediction; I devote him to the execration of men, and I deliver up his soul to Satan, in order that the people may know that the sovereign pontiff is the rock upon which the Son of the living God has built his church, and that the gates of hell shall never prevail against it."

Hildebrand sent to all the faithful in Germany, Italy, and Gaul, the sentence which he had pronounced against the sovereign of Germany. He addressed a circular to the German and Italian bishops and lords, in which he ordered them, in case Henry should persist in his revolt against the Holy See, to choose another king who would govern the empire in accordance with the laws of the church.

This decree of excommunication filled Germany and Italy with divisions, and was the cause of long and cruel wars. The prelates, however, openly treated the censures of Gregory with contempt. William of Utrecht, in particular, defended with much zeal the interests of the prince against the criminal enterprises of the pope. Every time that he mounted the pulpit, he preached against the pontiff, whom he called a simoniac, adulterer, robber and poisoner; and he renewed every Sunday the excommunication pronounced against Hildebrand by the German bishops. The Lombard prelates did the same. Guibert, the metropolitan of Ravenna, convened a new synod at Pavia, and a second time excommunicated the holy father.

Still, some ambitious lords detached some bishops from the party of the prince, who defended the Holy See, and maintained that no one had a right to anathematize the pope, since he was infallible. This miserable reasoning drew off a great number of nobles, who persecuted those who wished to remain faithful to Henry.

Gregory also employed all the resources of his policy to detach the refractory bishops from the party of the prince. He wrote the following remarkable letter to Herman, the prelate of Metz: "As for those who maintain that kings cannot be legitimately deposed by popes, I refer them to the words and the example of the fathers; and they will learn that St. Peter said: 'Be ye always ready to punish the guilty, whatever their rank.' Let them consider the motives which induced Pope Zachary to depose King Childeric, and to free all the Franks from their oath of fidelity. Let them learn that St. Gregory, in his decretals, not only excommunicated the lords and kings who opposed the execution of his orders, but that he even deprived them of their power. Let them not forget that St. Ambrose himself drove from the temple the emperor Theodosius, calling him a profane man, sacrilegious, and a murderer.

"Perhaps these miserable slaves of kings would maintain that God, when he said to St. Peter: 'Feed my lambs,' excepted princes; but we will demonstrate that Christ, in giving to the apostle power to bind and loose men, excepted no one. The Holy See has absolute power over all spiritual things: why should it not also rule temporal affairs? God reigns in the heavens,—his vicar should reign over all the earth. These senseless wretches, however, maintain that the royal is above the episcopal dignity. Are they, then, ignorant that the name of king was invented by human pride, and that the title of bishop was instituted by Christ? St. Ambrose affirms that the episcopate is superior to royalty, as gold is superior to a viler metal."

The astute policy of the pope drew off the greater part of the prelates and lords of Germany into the party of the Holy See; and Henry saw all his friends retiring gradually from his cause. Several bishops who had before subscribed to the condemnation of the pope, sent deputies to Rome to make their apologies. Others went in person, with naked feet, to the tomb of the apostles, in order to obtain their pardon.

Gregory received them all with great honours, loaded them with presents, and took with them skilful measures which would lead to the entire destruction of the party of the king of Germany. On the other side, the criminal intercourse which the pope carried on with the empress Agnes, his mother, the Duchess Beatrice, his aunt, and the countess Matilda, his cousin-german, assured to him still more perfectly the execution of his ambitious projects.

Beatrice possessed immense estates in Italy, and Matilda her daughter, the wife of Godfrey the Hunchback, was, through her husband, still more powerful than she; these two women after the rupture which had taken place between the altar and the throne, abandoned Henry, renounced the ties of blood, and loudly declared for Gregory.

Matilda, who was publicly recognized as the mistress of the pope, wished to force the duke her husband to embrace the cause of the Holy See; but he resisted all her seductions, and on the contrary raised troops which he led to the king. Hildebrand, fearful lest these re-inforcements should place his enemy in a situation to march on Rome, determined the princess to employ violence to deliver him from her husband, and Godfrey the Hunchback was assassinated in the city of Anvers on the night of the 20th of February 1076.

Gregory, in his turn, out of gratitude for the service which had been rendered him, resolved to disembarass himself of the dutchess Beatrice, the rival and mother of Matilda; he solicited from his former mistress the favour of a meeting, passed the night with her, and caused her to be strangled in the morning.

By this double crime the countess Matilda became the absolute sovereign of immense estates; she became the inseparable companion of Hildebrand, established herself in the palace of the Lateran, where she assisted with the cardinals at the private councils of the sovereign pontiff. Platinus affirms, that she followed him in all his journeys, served him in his bed, and frequently passed the nights in his chamber, to the great scandal of the chamberlains, who were not permitted to enter the apartments of the holy father.

Gregory had arrived at the height of his power; he feared no enemy; he trampled the people beneath his pontifical sandal; he abandoned himself to every license, pushed on provinces to revolt, named emperors, and declared the clergy and laity who remained attached to the unfortunate Henry, excommunicated. By his intrigues he soon formed a formidable league in Germany against the prince. Rudolph, duke of Suabia, Guelf, duke of Bavaria, Berthold, duke of Carinthia, Adalbert, bishop of Wirtzburg, Adalbert, bishop of Worms, and some other lords assembled at Ulm, and convened a general diet for the 16th of October, in the city of Tribur, near Mayence. They sent their decree to the lords of Suabia, Bavaria, Saxony, Lorraine, and Franconia, beseeching them, in the name of Christ, to abandon their private affairs and come to bring the aid of their intelligence, in taking suitable measures to re-establish the tranquillity of the kingdom.

On the appointed day the assembly commenced its session; the policy of the holy father was fully successful; the metropolitan of Mayence and a great number of ecclesiastics, who had been devoted to the prince, were obliged to unite with the Roman legates, under penalty of being regarded as enemies to the state. One of the ambassadors of the pope spoke and recounted the whole life of Henry; he dragged forth the crimes which had soiled his early youth; he accused him of having removed the lords from all participation in the government, in order to elevate men of low birth to the first dignities in the kingdom; he affirmed that the prince had singular and anti-christian ideas; that he wished to exterminate the nobility, destroy the churches and the monasteries, in order to employ their riches in solacing the people; and he concluded by presenting, as the only remedy for so many evils, the election of a king of Germany, capable of arresting the license and strengthening the tottering state.

The unfortunate Henry at first retired to Oppenheim with some faithful friends; then seeing that his cause was lost, he sent deputies to the diet, who offered in his name to abandon the government of the state to the lords, reserving only to himself the royal insignia and the name of sovereign. But the prelates were inexorable; they replied that they could not accept any of his offers, because they were not permitted to communicate with an excommunicated person, and that consequently they would proceed to his deposition, conformably to the orders of the pope. They consented, however, to refer the matter to the pontiff, if the prince would engage to come to the council of Augsburg to submit to the judgment of Gregory, in the presence of all the lords of Germany. They threatened to declare him for ever excluded from the throne, if he did not obtain absolution within a year and a day, and they ordered him, whilst awaiting the judgment of the pope, to send away all the excommunicated who were about his person, to disband the garrison of Worms, to re-install the bishop of that city in the exercise of his functions, and to retire himself to Spire with some domestics who were designated by the assembly. Finally, they enjoined on him to lead a simple, frugal life; to use no equipages, nor bear the tokens of imperial dignity, nor occupy himself with civil or religious affairs.

Henry acceded to these disgraceful conditions; he sent away from his camp the metropolitan of Cologne, the bishops of Bamberg, Strasburg, Basle, Spire, Lausanne, Ceitz, Osnabruck, and the other excommunicated; he disbanded his troops, went to Worms, and retired to the city which had been assigned to him, where he lived like a private citizen.

The legates immediately informed the holy father of the result of their embassy, and engaged him to go in person to the synod of Augsburg. Henry, in his impatience to be released from the anathema pronounced against him, was unwilling to wait for the arrival of Gregory, and determined to present himself as a suppliant at Rome, in order to obtain absolution. He departed secretly from Spire, some days before Easter, with the empress his wife, and his son, still an infant; he traversed Burgundy and arrived in Savoy, where he was traitorously arrested by Count Amedeus, the brother of his wife, who only restored him his liberty on condition of his surrendering a province bordering on the states of Germany.

The winter was, this year, very severe, and rendered the passage of the Alps extremely dangerous; no dangers, however, could suspend the execution of his project; he traversed snow and ice, and descended into Lombardy. The noise of his arrival had scarcely spread abroad, when the Lombard bishops and lords, who were discontented with the pope, came to meet him, and regardless of the excommunication, they rendered him great honour, and formed an imposing escort for him. Some lords even proposed to him to declare war on the Holy See, offering him succours of men and money; but the prince broken down by so great reverses, dared not accept their proposals, and continued his route to Rome.

Gregory had already quitted the holy city to go to Augsburg, accompanied by the countess Matilda, who followed him in all his journeys; but when he was informed of the arrival of Henry, and of the demonstrations on his behalf, made by the Lombards, he was alarmed, retraced his steps, and shut himself up in a castle called Canudium or Canossa, which belonged to his mistress, and was regarded as impregnable.

It was during this retreat, that he received the German bishops and several lay lords whom he had excommunicated. They had travelled to Italy with naked feet, and covered with sackcloth, to implore the pity of the holy father. The fear of a general rising in favour of Henry, rendered the pontiff indulgent to the pilgrims; he consented to receive them into the bosom of the church, always on condition that they would sincerely confess their crimes, and submit to pay a fine to the Holy See, and undergo a public penance. They declared their readiness to suffer every thing they were ordered to do. Gregory then commenced proving them by prescribing for them a rigorous fast, "a penance still more severe," adds Bayle, "since these prelates came from a cold country, where fasting is one of the severest mortifications that can be imposed, especially on priests, who are accustomed to make long meals, at which they gorge themselves with food and drink."

After proving them for some days, Gregory made them appear anew in his presence, addressed to them a severe reprimand, and gave them absolution; before, however, dismissing them, he ordered them not to communicate with the prince, until he had made an apology to the Holy See, except to exhort him to repentance.

Henry having arrived at Canossa, solicited a private interview with his cousin, the confidante of the pope; Matilda consented to receive him, and the result of this conference was, that she presented to Gregory on the following day, the countess of Savoy, mother-in-law of the prince, the count her son, the marquis Azon, and Hugh, the abbot of Cluny, in order that they might implore in his name the mercy of the holy father. The presentation took place, but Gregory replied to the solicitors, that it was contrary to the laws of the church to examine an accused, but in the presence of his accusers; that if Henry were innocent, he had nothing to fear by appearing before the synod of Augsburg, where he promised him he should receive ample justice, without permitting himself to be prejudiced by his enemies. The abbot of Cluny represented to the holy father that the king did not fear the judgment, but that he besought him to absolve him from the anathema launched against him, because the year of his excommunication had almost expired, and the prelates of Germany waited for that fatal term to declare him dispossessed for ever of the royal dignity.

The inflexible pontiff resisted all their entreaties; finally, gold was proposed to him, and he yielded to this powerful argument. He, however, exacted that the prince, in token of his repentance, should deposit his crown and other ensigns of royalty at his feet, declaring himself unworthy to reign. Henry consented to undergo this humiliation; he presented himself alone at the outer gate of the fortress, and waited with patience until the pope was ready to have them opened. When he had passed the outward entrance, he laid aside all his royal ornaments, unclothed himself entirely, and put on sackcloth; a broom and scissors were then placed in his hands as a sign that he consented to be whipped and shaven; he remained in this position for three days and three nights, with naked feet, during the most extreme severity of the winter, without covering, without taking any nourishment, shedding torrents of tears, and imploring, with many groans, the mercy of the pope!!!

Gregory, in one of his works, boasts of this conduct and avows that his justice resembled rather the cruelty of a tyrant, than the severity of a judge. At length the countess Matilda took pity on the prince and obtained from the pontiff the pardon of her cousin. Henry having been admitted to an audience of the pope, absolution was granted to him on condition that he should present himself at the diet of the German lords, and would reply to the accusations brought against him. Gregory wished him to engage to submit himself to the orders of the Holy See, whether he should lose his crown or not: and that in any case he should declare his lords relieved from the oath of fidelity they had taken to him, and perfectly free before God and men to choose another sovereign; he made him promise never to avenge himself for the judgment pronounced against him, whatever it might be, and to show himself entirely submissive to the orders of the pontiff on all occasions. Finally, he warned him, that if he should fail in a single one of these conditions, he would declare his absolution null, and give to the German lords the right of choosing another king. Henry signed these promises, and confirmed them by solemn oaths upon the gospels and the relics of St. Peter; the pope then declared him relieved from the sentence of excommunication.

On the next day they went together to the church of the city, in which Gregory celebrated mass in the presence of an immense crowd; when he had pronounced the words of consecration, he made the prince approach the altar, and holding the consecrated host in his hand, addressed these words to him: "King Henry, I received letters from you and your bishops, in which you called me an usurper, a poisoner of popes, incestuous and a sodomite; now in order to overthrow these accusations, and efface for ever even the shade of the scandal, I take the body of our Lord to witness my innocence, and I trust it will prove a poison to me if I am guilty." At the same time he took the host, broke it into two pieces, and communed. The stupid people uttered loud shouts of joy, praising God and the pontiff for so admirable an action.

Gregory having obtained silence, turned towards the prince: "Do in your turn, my son, that which you have seen me do. The German lords accuse you of exactions, adulteries, and murders; they maintain that you should be driven, for your crimes, from the communion of the faithful; and they ask that you should be judged by a council. You are not ignorant how uncertain are the judgments of men; take this other part of the host which I present to you; call down upon your head the wrath of Christ if you are guilty, and commune, as I have done, in the presence of all the assistants, in order that the proof of your innocence may destroy all the calumnies of your enemies."

Henry, surprised and confounded by so strange a proposal, asked for some moments to deliberate upon it with the lords who were with him. He then replied to the pope, that the opinion of his councillors was, that he should incur the chances of a general council. Hildebrand, satisfied with his victory over the superstitious mind of the prince, administered to him the communion, without exacting that he should pronounce the horrid imprecation of which he had himself set the example.

After the service, he invited him to dine in the fortress, and dismissed him with deference. Eppon, bishop of Ceitz, was instructed to accompany him, for the purpose of absolving those who had communed with the king during his excommunication; but the Lombard lords, and especially the bishops who knew the secret of all the pontifical tricks, refused the absolution, and chased off the legate, heaping upon him blows and insults.

A new provincial synod assembled in Lombardy. The bishops a second time excommunicated the monk Hildebrand. They renewed their terrible accusations against him; they accused him of having poisoned the seven popes, his predecessors; of having usurped the Holy See, and of having dishonoured it by adultery, incest, and assassinations. The king was declared a traitor to the country for having cowardly submitted to an heretic soiled with every crime, and for having abandoned their cause, when, in order to avenge him, they had openly declared against the court of Rome.

Henry soon became the object of universal contempt. The priests, the grandes, and the people, resolved to dethrone him, and conduct his son to Rome, by force of arms, to drive away Gregory, and to name a new pontiff, who should consecrate the young prince emperor of Italy. On the other hand, the metropolitan of Mayence, with the bishops and lords who were hostile to the king, assembled at Forsheim, in Franconia, and addressed letters to the holy father, and asking him to come to their council and confirm the choice which they had made of Rudolph of Suabia as their sovereign. Finally, in order to crown his misfortunes, Matilda made a solemn donation of all her estates to the Holy See, to the prejudice of the house of Henry, who were her legitimate heirs. The king then, incited by despair, took an energetic resolve, and swore to draw down vengeance on Hildebrand, the author of all his ills. He traversed Lombardy, called to his side all the excommunicated, all who were enemies of the pope, and openly declared war on the Holy See.

In less than two months, the prince saw himself at the head of a numerous army, and made his dispositions to march on Rome. At the news of this levy of armed men, Gregory lost his arrogance, and tried negotiations, not daring either to declare against Henry, or abandon the cause of King Rudolph; and as it became impossible for him to go into Germany on account of the Lombard troops who guarded all the routes, he addressed letters to the Germans, expressing the doubts of his mind in regard to the rights of the two sovereigns.

The lords and bishops, surprised at this change, replied to the pope: "You know, holy father, and your letters, which we have preserved, are witnesses of it, that it was neither by our advice, nor for our interests, that King Henry was deposed; in that we obeyed the will of the Holy See. Since you prohibited us, under penalty of the most terrible evils, from recognizing him as king, we have executed your orders at the hazard of our fortunes and our lives; for the prince, after your sentence, exercised great cruelties against us. Our submission to your decrees first brought on us the ruin of our provinces; then the humiliation of seeing the sovereign of the country constrained to crouch at your feet like a dog, in order to receive absolution, and to obtain from your holiness permission to ravage our fields and our cities a second time, and to avenge himself on us for the ills you have drawn on him.

"After having left the kingdom for an entire year without a head, in conformity with your wishes, we have chosen a king whom you had yourself chosen; and now, whilst he is engaged for the good of his people, instead of confirming his nomination, you recognize two kings in the same country, and you send your legates to both. This indecision which exists in your mind, increases our divisions; for in your letters you call King Henry a prevaricator, and you ask from him a safe conduct to come to our meeting, as if he yet preserved some power. We are also informed that you listen favourably to those whom you have excommunicated with him, and yet you exhort us to remain faithful to Rudolph.

only see the deplorable results of your conduct. In managing the two parties, you light up a civil war. You incite pillages, incendiarism, massacres, and the destruction of the royal domain; so that the kings, for the future, will only live by rapine and robbery. These evils would not have existed, if you had not lighted in our provinces the fire of discord. It is the excess of our grief which induces us to speak in language so severe, because we are exposed to the rage of the wolves, for having obeyed the shepherd. And now, if the shepherd becomes our enemy, we shall no longer have faith neither in the pontiffs, nor the apostles, nor Christ; we shall regard popes and kings as the implacable enemies of humanity, and we shall devote them to the execration of the people."

Gregory did not reply to this letter, and received with equal honours the ambassadors of the two kings of Germany. He was then occupied in holding several councils at Rome, to renew the anathemas pronounced against the partizans of Henry, and to compel Berenger of Tours to make a solemn retraction of his doctrine concerning the eucharist. He excommunicated, during the same year, Boleslas, the king of Poland, and wished to force the king of England to submit to the Holy See. Finally, having learned that Henry was about to enter Germany to combat his rival, he determined to excommunicate him anew, and publicly to recognize Rudolph, duke of Suabia, as the sovereign of Germany.

In this remarkable decree, the pope addressed St. Peter and St. Paul in these terms: "Blessed apostles, you are witnesses that the German lords and bishops, without our advice, chose duke Rudolph as their king; and that this prince immediately sent ambassadors to our legate, declaring that he had undertaken, despite of himself, the government of the kingdom, and that he was ready to obey us in all things; offering, as a proof of his sincerity, to send us rich presents, and to give us as hostages, his son and that of duke Berthold. You know that Henry, at the same time, besought us to declare in his favour, against Rudolph, and that we replied, that we would act of our own will, after having heard these two princes in a council. But as soon as Henry supposed that he could overthrow his competitor without our aid, he repulsed our interference with contempt.

"It is therefore, most holy apostles, after having invoked your testimony as a guarantee of our sincerity, we employ your authority in condemning this sovereign and his accomplices. We declare Henry dispossessed of the crown of Germany and Italy; we anathematize him, and we invoke on his head the thunders of heaven; we beseech you to take from him all prudence in council, and to render him cowardly in battle, so that he may never gain any victory. We declare Rudolph the lawful king of the Teutonic states, and we grant to all who shall betray Henry, absolution from all their sins, and the blessing of Christ in this world and the next.

"Now blessed St. Peter and St. Paul, let the world know, by giving victory to Rudolph, that you can bind and loose in heaven; that you can give or take away empires, kingdoms, principalities, duchies, marquisates, countships, and the goods of all men; finally, that you take from the unworthy and bestow on the good, the pontificate, primacies, archbishoprics and bishoprics. Let the people learn that you judge spiritual things, and that you have an absolute power over temporal affairs; that you can curb the demons, who are the councillors of princes, and annihilate kings and the powerful of the earth. Display then your greatness and your power, and let the world now tremble before the redoubtable orders of your church. Cause especially the sword of your justice promptly to strike the head of the criminal Henry, in order that all Christians may learn that he has been stricken by your will."

This sentence was decreed at Rome, on the 7th of March, 1080, and Hildebrand sent it to King Rudolph, with a magnificent crown of gold enriched with precious stones.

Notwithstanding all the imprecations of Gregory, events gave a striking lie to him. Henry entered Germany at the head of a numerous army, and gained a signal victory over his competitor, in the famous day of Fladeheim; after which the prince convoked a synod at Brixen, to which he called all the bishops and lords of Lombardy, and a large part of the ecclesiastics and nobles of Germany.

In this assembly they accused Gregory of heresy, impiety, sacrilege, simony, extortions, adultery, murder and magic; they produced witnesses who proved that the pope had cast the holy host into the fire, whilst conjuring up demons; the priests of the interior of the palace of the Lateran declared that he had poisoned the seven popes, his predecessors, by means of his intimate confidant, Gerard Brazurus; finally, the fathers pronounced an excommunication against Gregory, deposed him from the Holy See, and proclaimed Guibert, the metropolitan of Ravenna, sovereign pontiff; who assumed the name of Clement the Third.

As soon as the pope was apprized of the election of Guibert, he hastened to send legates to Apulia and Calabria to draw off the population to his side. He thus expressed himself about these schismatics, "They have been forced to renew their old conspiracy; they have chosen as their chief an heretic, a sacrilegious person, a perjurer, an assassin who wished to wrest from us our tiara and our life—an antichrist—a Guibert!! In a cabal composed of lemoniacal and concubinary prelates, our enemies have even pushed their fury so far as to condemn us, because we refused to their entreaties and their threats pardon for their crimes. But God sustains us, he will make us triumph over the wicked, and we despise their anathemas."

Notwithstanding his apparent security, Gregory laboured actively to obtain the protection of William, king of England, whom he had excommunicated some months before; he also entered into treaties with Robert Guiscard, with Jourdain, the prince of Capua, and other Norman lords, whom he had before excommunicated. He granted to them absolution, confirmed them in possession of the estates they had usurped, and in exchange, concluded with them a treaty, by which they engaged to defend the Holy See against its enemies, and to unite with the lords of Tuscany, the vassals of the countess Matilda, in attacking the anti-pope in the city of Ravenna. At the same time, he addressed letters to Germany, exciting the people in favour of Rudolph, and affirming that the apostle Peter had appeared to him, and announced that a false king would die this year before the day of his feast. "If this prediction be not accomplished," adds he, "I swear before God and men, that I am unworthy to be pope."

Sigebert relates that the Saxons, full of confidence in this prophecy, induced Rudolph to try the chance of arms; he marched to meet Henry, with an army inferior in numbers to that of that prince. The affair took place on the borders of the river Ellestre, near to Mersburg, in Saxony. Five times were his troops repulsed with loss, and five times he led them back to the charge. Finally, in the last charge, Godfrey of Bouillon, pushed his horse right against Rudolph, wounded him with a blow of his lance in the lower part of his belly and overthrew him on the field of battle; at the same moment, a knight struck the unfortunate king with his sword and cut off his right hand; Rudolph died almost at once. The soldiers, alarmed at the loss of their chief, abandoned their ranks and took refuge in Mersburg.

Rivet informs us that Pope Gregory, in a public discourse, had announced anew in prophetic terms, the victory of Rudolph, and the death of Henry; but that, thanks to an active care, the assassins sent by the holy father had been arrested, and that Gregory then, in order not to compromise his dignity as a prophet, affirmed that the prediction only related to the soul of the king.

Bayle, in his dictionary, reasons thus singularly: "Either Hildebrand believed that his prediction would be accomplished, or he did not believe it. If he believed it, we must call him a false prophet, and if he did not believe it, an infamous impostor, because he sacrificed the holiness of religion to his temporal interests; from whence we must conclude," adds he, "that the popes have been more than once wicked hypocrites, worthy of the rope and fire."

After the decisive victory which he had gained in Germany over his competitor, Henry re-entered Italy and conquered the troops of his cousin Matilda, near Mantua. Thus, the countess found herself menaced with the loss of her states. Notwithstanding these checks, the intrepid Hildebrand assembled new troops to oppose the prince; but the latter drove these illy disciplined bands before him, and chased them from several important places which belonged to the countess. On his route he arrested all pilgrims, and did not restore them to their liberty until he had exacted from them an oath not to lend assistance to the monk Hildebrand and his concubine. Finally, the king encamped in the meadows of Nero, half a league from Rome, with the archbishop Guibert, without being able, however, to penetrate into the city, which was then defended by Matilda. Not only did this courageous woman repulse his assaults, but she even obliged the king to raise his camp and retire into Lombardy.

During this whole war the countess exhibited surprising activity and energy. No sacrifice in men or money was too dear to her, in order to increase the means of defence to her lover. Her palace became the refuge of the Italian and German bishops, clergy, monks, and laymen, whom the king had driven away or despoiled; and she daily detached new partizans from the party of Henry. To some she granted fiefs; to others, money. The richer received in her arms the price of their devotion or their treason. The malcontents were pursued to extremities. Their domains were devastated, their serfs murdered, and their castles burned.

At length, as this struggle between the throne and the altar threatened to be indefinitely prolonged, Henry determined to strike a great blow; and, notwithstanding the bad success of his first effort, he led his army a second time beneath the walls of Rome. The summer passed by without his being able to do anything; and he was even obliged to retire during the extreme heat, leaving in the neighbouring castles garrisons which made frequent sorties and kept the city in alarm. When winter returned, he recommenced the labours of the siege, and pushed them on with vigour. The Romans, on their side, continued to defend themselves obstinately. Henry then resolved to change his tactics, and to contend with the holy father by hypocrisy. He set at liberty several prelates whom he retained as prisoners; he solemnly declared he would protect all pilgrims who went to Rome to visit the holy places; that the war was finished, and that he only wished to enter the city to receive the imperial crown from the hands of Gregory. The Roman lords manifested great joy at the pacific intentions of the prince; made a secret treaty with him and instructed some of their number to present it to the holy father, beseeching him to take pity on their country, and not to sacrifice it to his personal enemies.

The pope replied to the deputation: "We know too well the tricks of policy, to believe in the promises of a king. Still, if Henry will consent to ask pardon of God and the church, in the form which we shall prescribe, we will absolve him from all his sins, and grant the crown to him. Otherwise, do not hope to deceive me. If he refuse my proposals, and you still shall dare to implore our mercy for him, I declare to you, that I will put you all to death in punishment, and that Rome shall be engulfed beneath its rubbish before I yield to the emperor."

Fearful of a vengeance which they knew to be inexorable, the lords cast themselves at his feet, and avowed to him that they were bound by an oath to the emperor to oblige the pope to crown him or abandon the tiara. Gregory feigned to pardon their treason; and to reassure their consciences, he besought them to repeat to him the formula of the oath which they had taken. Having listened attentively, he observed that they had only engaged to give a crown, not a dignity. He consequently wrote to Henry in the name of the Romans, that he could come to seek the imperial crown which had been promised to him, and that it should be placed on his forehead with all the honours of consecration, if he would make amends to the Holy See; or that it should be cast to him as alms from the top of the dome of the castle of San Angelo, if he refused to submit. The king having rejected both these proposals, Hildebrand declared that the Romans had fulfilled their oath, and were freed before God.

Betrayed by the nobles, Henry then turned to the people, and caused it to be published that every inhabitant who should present himself at his camp, should receive a sum of money as an indemnity for the losses which he had sustained during the war. One hundred and forty-four thousand pence of gold were distributed in this way. Thus, this largesse having considerably increased the number of his partizans, the gates of the city were opened to him, and he was enabled to make his triumphal entry into Rome.

He went at first to the palace of the Lateran with the anti-pope Guibert, whom he caused to be consecrated sovereign pontiff by the bishops of Bologna, Modena, and Cervia, and who was enthroned by the name of Clement the Third. The new pope then solemnly crowned Henry emperor of the West.

Gregory shut himself up in the castle of St. Angelo with the lords who remained faithful to him, and continued to defend himself against the troops of the king. But, fearful of being compelled soon to yield to his enemy, he endeavoured to rid himself of him by a new crime. He was informed that Henry performed his devotions nightly in a church, in which he had chosen a solitary chapel, in order to pray with more meditation. He gained over the cardinal priest who served in this church. By his orders they pierced the beam which sustained the ceiling immediately over the place of the king, and masked this opening by an enormous stone, which could detach itself at a moment's notice and crush the prince.

These preparations were made with the greatest mystery. That night Henry came, in accordance with his custom, to kneel in the chapel. The cardinal immediately drew a cord which was fastened to the stone; but whether it was the violence with which the cord was drawn that caused the stone to deviate, or whether the prince was not in his habitual place, it did not touch him, and broke before him. Some splinters alone inflicted on him slight wounds. The guilty priest was seized at once, and cut to pieces by the guards. His dead body, after having been dragged through the streets of Rome, was cast into the sewers without the city. This attempt at assassination served to sink Gregory into disrepute, and almost all his partizans abandoned him to join the king.

But Henry, who feared a new effort against his person, was unwilling to prolong his stay in Rome, and retired into Lombardy, where the countess Matilda was carrying on a war of extermination. Germany also demanded his presence to resist the enterprises of the Saxons, whom the legates of the Holy See had excited to revolt. During his absence, Robert Guiscard yielded to the solicitations of the pope, abandoned Greece in order to come to his aid, disembarked in Italy, and presented himself before Rome. The gates having been closed, treason came to his aid. He penetrated into the city during the night, abandoned it to be pillaged by his soldiers, set it on fire in every quarter, and re-instated Gregory on a throne soiled with murders and carnage.

The proud pontiff found himself a second time the absolute master of Rome; he immediately held a new council, at which he reiterated the excommunication pronounced against the anti-pope Guibert, against Henry and their partizans; he then retired to Salerno, an impenetrable fortress, in order to place himself beyond the vengeance of the prince.

In the early part of the spring, Henry returned to Rome, where he was received with transports of joy; Guibert was forcibly re-installed in the palace of the Lateran and seated on the pontifical throne. On receiving the news of the victory of his competitor, Hildebrand became so enraged that he became sick; a burning fever seized him, the illness increased daily; finally, when he was at the point of death, the bishops who assisted him, and even his mistress, wished him to employ indulgences towards his enemies; he replied to them, "No, my hatred is implacable; I curse the pretended emperor Henry, the anti-pope Guibert, and the reprobates who sustain them; I absolve and bless the simple who believe that a pope has power to bind and loose." He died on the 20th of May, 1085, uttering this blasphemy. He had reigned almost eleven years.

Gregory the Seventh is the priest who laboured with the most boldness to elevate the pontifical power; he displayed on the throne of St. Peter all the qualities of Charlemagne, and showed himself worthy to found the empire of the church on the ruins of the empire of the West.

Bayle affirms, that the triumph of the church militant has been the result of a war of a thousand years, during which were displayed more courage and address than would have been necessary to conquer the whole world. "The power of Christian Rome is more extraordinary," adds he, "than that of pagan Rome, and it appears that Providence destined this city to be first, the mistress of nations by its arms and then by its intelligence. In fact we cannot consider without astonishment, that men, by the assistance of the Word of God, a Gospel which preaches disdain of grandeur, which exalts humility and poverty, have had the hardihood to aspire to absolute sway over the sovereigns of the earth. But what surprises us still more is, that the popes have been enabled to maintain this incredible sway during almost a thousand years; this conquest is more admirable than those of the Alexanders and Cæsars; and Gregory the Seventh, who is the principal author of it, ought really to have his place among great conquerors."

These paradoxical reflections have a certain amount of certainty; for Gregory was made rather for a captain and emperor, than priest and pope. He was a great statesman; his life as well as his maxims prove it in an incontestable manner: "God is a Spirit," says Gregory; "he rules matter; thus the spiritual is above the temporal power. The pope is the representative of God on earth; he should then govern the world. To him alone pertain infallibility and universality;—all men are submitted to his laws, and he can only be judged by God;—he ought to wear imperial ornaments; people and kings should kiss his feet; Christians are irrevocably submitted to his orders; they should murder their princes, fathers and children, if he commands it;—no council can be declared universal without the orders of the pope;—no book can be received as canonical without his authority;—finally, no good nor evil exists but in what he has condemned or approved."

VICTOR THE THIRD, THE ONE HUNDRED AND SIXTY-THIRD POPE.

[A. D. 1085.]

History of Victor before his pontificate—Intrigues for his election—Victor refuses the papacy—He is clothed, in spite of himself, with the pontifical ornaments—He abdicates the pontificate—Finally accepts the papacy—The countess Matilda protects Victor—Letter from the pope to the Germans—Diet of Spire—Death of the pontiff.

SOME days before his death, Gregory the Seventh, having assembled the cardinals around his bed, pledged them to choose as his successor, Didier, the abbot of Monte Cassino, and a cardinal priest of the order of St. Cecilia, who partook of his hatred towards the emperor, and wished with him to elevate the chair of St. Peter above thrones.

Didier was of the illustrious family of the princes of Beneventum. From his very infancy he assiduously frequented churches, listened with delight to the Holy Scriptures, and constantly associated with pious persons, in order to prepare himself for a religious life; but his parents, who were desirous of maintaining the splendour of their name, exacted a pledge from him that he would live in the world, and affianced him to a noble girl. Before the consummation of the marriage, the father of Didier, having been slain by the Normans, he resolved to retire secretly into a monastery, and he escaped from the residence of his parents, aided in his plans by a monk named Jacquint. Didier received the monastic garb from the hands of the holy hermit Santari; his family having discovered the place of his retreat, he was brought back by force to Beneventum, where he remained for a year, closely watched, in the castle of his mother. He escaped a second time and went to Salerno, to his cousin Prince Gaimar, to whom he said, "Since I cannot be a monk in my own country, permit me to be one in your's." The prince promised him his protection, since he positively wished to embrace a monastic life. Didier then entered the monastery of the "Trinity of the Cave," near to Salerno, where he remained until his mother granted him permission to become a monk, and to live in the convent of St. Sophia, in the environs of Beneventum. During the pontificate of Leo the Ninth, he entered the monastery of Monte Cassino; Stephen the Tenth appointed him abbot of that monastery; and finally, during the reign of Hildebrand, he showed himself an ardent defender of the privileges of the Holy See, and obtained new honours.

Thus, after the death of Gregory, the bishops, cardinals and lords who had remained faithful to that pontiff, besought Didier to accept the tiara; which he formerly refused to do in order to avoid inevitable dangers. He consented, however, to labour actively for the Roman church; he even engaged Jourdain, prince of Capua, Rainulph, count of Aversa, and Countess Matilda, to form a league with the Normans, for the purposes of opposing the anti-pope, and of nominating a pontiff worthy to govern the church. Under his directions the allied bishops and lords marched on Rome, and having become masters of the palace of the Lateran, they proceeded to nominate a pope. Didier was proclaimed as alone worthy of the tiara, and notwithstanding his active opposition to it, he was borne in triumph to the church of St. Luke, where he was consecrated in accordance with the canonical rule, by the name of Victor the Third. He was then clothed in the red cape, but they could not put the aube on him on account of his resistance.

The governor of Rome, taking advantage of the tumult which reigned in the city in consequence of the ceremony of consecration, seized upon the capitol, spread his troops through the streets, and forced the new pontiff to leave the city three days after his election.

Didier having arrived at Terracina, abandoned the cross, the cape, and the other signs of the papacy, and on some entreaties made to him, he refused to resume them, threatening to fly to the ends of the world, if they wished to do violence to his sentiments. The prelates and principal lords of Italy then determined to convene a synod at Capua, in which he consented to take a seat. At the close of the council, all those assisting at it besought him to accept the pontificate. Roger, duke of Calabria, Jourdain, prince of Capua, and a great number of bishops, cast themselves at his feet, beseeching him with tears to resume the tiara, and save the church from ruin. Didier finally consented to become pope, and decided to return to Rome with the princes of Capua and Salerno.

The anti-pope and the German soldiers undertook the defence of the church of the apostle, which was the most exposed point; but notwithstanding their efforts, it fell into the power of the enemy, and on Sunday, the ninth day of May, 1087, the pontiff, Victor the Third, was solemnly consecrated in this church, by the bishops of Ostia, Tusculum, Porto, and Albanum, in the presence of several cardinals, a great number of prelates, and a prodigious concourse of people. Didier remained some days in the city Leonine, whence he repaired to Monte Cassino.

Hugh, the metropolitan of Lyons, availed himself of this circumstance to excite the countess Matilda against the new pontiff, by misrepresenting facts. He wrote to her as follows; "You know that the election of the abbot Didier was accomplished before my arrival in Italy; and if my brethren and myself approved of it, it was in hopes that he would raise up the dignity of the church, and repair the ills which the enemies of God have caused us to endure. But we did not then know him; now that we are with him at Monte Cassino, we have penetrated into his true character, and have learned the fault which we committed in choosing him for our chief. Crafty and perfidious, he now condemns the conduct of Gregory the Seventh; he accuses that great pope of revolting crimes; he refuses to walk in his footsteps, and wishes to bestow on Henry the imperial crown."

The countess did not believe the accusations of the archbishop Hugh; on the contrary, she went into Italy, and besought Victor to come to her in order that she might have the consolation of seeing the best friend of him whom she had so much loved, promising to become the pledge of his safety, and to restore him to the palace of the Lateran. Didier, notwithstanding his bad health, acceded to her desires, and came up the Tiber as far as Rome. He was received on disembarking by the countess, and the enemies of the king of Germany, who, by the assistance of their troops, had seized upon all that part of the city called Trastevere, the castle of St. Angelo, the church of St. Peter, and the isle of Tiber, in which the pope took up his residence.

A great part of the nobles declared for Didier. The people took the side of the anti-pope Clement, who remained master of Rome, that is to say, of all the old city. He dwelt in the church of the Rotunda, then called St. Mary of the Towers, because it had two bells. The two factions came to blows daily, and combatted even in the churches.

Didier sent letters into Germany, to apprize the lords of that kingdom of his election, and to inform them that he confirmed the condemnation which Gregory the Seventh had pronounced against Henry and his adherents. These letters were read at Spire in a general diet, convened by the nobles and bishops who recognized Victor the Third as the legitimate pontiff; all pledged themselves to lend their assistance to the prince, if he wished to become absolved from the excommunication launched against him, but declared that on his refusal the revolt would become general and more violent than before. Ladislaus, king of Hungary, informed the diet, through his ambassadors, that he remained faithful to Pope Victor, and that he would go to Rome to the aid of the Catholics, with an army of twenty thousand horse.

Fortunately, the sickness of the pope, which daily increased, retarded the execution of this threat, and forced him to return to Monte Cassino, of which he had retained the government, notwithstanding the canons which prohibited the cumulation of benefices. When he perceived his end approaching, he named the deacon Ordericus abbot of his monastery. Then having called around him the bishops and the cardinals, he induced them to pledge themselves to choose, as head of the Roman church, Otho, bishop of Ostia. As this ecclesiastic was present, Victor took him by the hand, and presenting him to those who surrounded him, said to them, "accept him as your chief, and ordain him as sovereign pontiff of Rome."

Didier died on the 16th of September, 1087, after a pontificate of a few months; he was interred in the chapel of the monastery of Monte Cassino.

URBAN THE SECOND, THE ONE HUNDRED AND SIXTY-FOURTH POPE.

AFTER the death of Didier, the prelates, notwithstanding their desire to conform to the wishes of the pontiff, by nominating as his successor, Otho, cardinal bishop of Ostia, were forced to separate before having chosen him, on account of the diversity of sentiments in regard to the measures necessary to be adopted in order to re-establish peace in the church. But frequent deputations having been sent to them by the Romans, the Germans and the countess Matilda, beseeching them to give a chief to the clergy of the holy city, they assembled a second time, and drew up letters of convocation, pledging all the clergy and laity to assemble at Terracina during the second week in Lent, to proceed to the election of a pope.

The meeting was held in the cathedral dedicated to St. Peter and St. Cæsaire. At the opening of the session, the bishop of Tusculum read the decisions of Gregory and Victor for the government of the church. Ordericus, the abbot of Monte Cassino, the metropolitan of Capua, as well as the other prelates and lords who had been intimate with these two pontiffs, confirmed the exactness of these assertions. It was then decided that the fathers should, as usual, pass three days in prayer, fasting, and the bestowal of abundant alms, to obtain from God a manifestation of his will. On the following Sunday, they re-assembled anew in the same church, and after a secret deliberation, the three cardinals who governed the council, mounted the tribunal of the church, and declared that they had chosen Otho sovereign pontiff.

All the assistants approved of this choice by loud acclamations. The bishop of Albano then proclaimed him pope by the name of Urban the Second. They clothed him with a purple cape, and carried him on to the episcopal seat of Terracina; after which the holy father solemnly celebrated mass at the altar of St. Peter. The cardinals afterwards congratulated themselves on having nominated a pope who was as ambitious as his predecessors, and who laboured to increase their wealth at the same time that he extended the temporal power of the Holy See.

Urban was the son of the lord of Lageri, and was named Eudes, or Otho. He had been brought up in the church of Rheims, under the direction of St. Bruno, then the chancellor of that cathedral. He afterwards became himself the canon of that metropolis, and was ordained archdeacon of Rheims in 1070. Some time after his promotion, having been surprised one night in the cell of a nun, he was obliged to retire to the abbey of Cluny, where St. Hugh named him prior. Finally, Gregory the Seventh, having become pope, called him to Rome in order to consecrate him bishop of Ostia, in place of a prelate who had obtained from Henry the investiture of that See. Otho then became the principal confidant of the policy of Hildebrand. During four years he remained attached to the person of the pontiff; and it was he who published in Germany the last bull of excommunication launched by Gregory against the anti-pope Clement and Henry.

On the day succeeding his election, Urban addressed a circular to all the ecclesiastics of Italy and Germany, declaring to them, that he would follow in the footsteps of his predecessors. He then went to the monastery of Monte Cassino, and appointed the monk Gaëtan, deacon of the Roman church, attaching him in the capacity of a councillor.

This monk afterwards occupied, in his turn, the chair of St. Peter by the name of Gelasius the Second.

Induced by the councils of Gaëtan, the pontiff sent letters to the emperor Alexis Comnenus, to endeavour to bring about a reunion between the Greek and Latin churches. That prince listened favourably to these overtures, and replied to the holy father, that he could, however, decide on nothing until he had himself come to Constantinople to convocate a general council. But the schism supported in Rome by the anti-pope Guibert, was of more importance to Urban, and he was compelled to refuse the pacific overtures of Comnenus.

In Germany, Gebehard still laboured with the same zeal for the party of the Holy See, and drew off to it a large number of schismatics. As this prelate was desirous of pursuing the excommunicated vigorously, he wrote to the holy father, to obtain from him the names of those whom he should signalize for the reprobation of the faithful. Urban replied to him: "I place in the first rank of the excommunicated the heretic Guibert of Ravenna, the usurper of the apostolic throne, and the king Henry; then those who sustain them; and finally all the clergy or laity who commune with these two criminals. We do not, however, pronounce an anathema especially against all; but we do not admit them to our communion without imposing on them a penance, which we regulate according to the degree of sin, whether these guilty ones have acted from ignorance, fear, or necessity. We wish to treat with extreme severity those who have voluntarily fallen into the abyss. We confirm you," added the pontiff, "in the power of governing in our stead in Saxony, Germany, and the other neighbouring countries, in order that you may regulate all ecclesiastical affairs, in accordance with the interests of the church."

Whilst the pope was pursuing his intrigues in Germany, Italy, and even Greece, for the purpose of overthrowing Henry from his throne, the countess Matilda and Ordericus, the abbot of Monte Cassino, corrupted the partizans of the anti-pope Guibert, and drove him from Rome. Urban then re-entered the holy city; but, being desirous of strengthening his power and preventing the return of his competitor, he induced Matilda, who was then forty-three years old, to marry the young son of Guelph, the duke of Bavaria. The holy father then went into Apulia; and, on the 10th of September, 1089, held a council at Melfi, at which eighty Italian prelates and a great many lords, among whom was Duke Roger, did homage to the pope for all their states.

The assembly decreed sixteen canons, which confirmed the old ordinances in relation to investitures. They were prohibited from ordaining a sub-deacon under fourteen years of age, a deacon under twenty-four, and a priest under thirty. The acephali or independent clergy, and the vagabond monks, were condemned; lords were permitted to seize on the concubines of priests and reduce them to a state of slavery; and, finally, prelates were prohibited from admitting into the ecclesiastical ranks men of a servile condition, and from bestowing on monasteries, without the consent of the pope, the tithes or churches which belonged to laymen.

Henry, informed of the progress which the party of the pope had made in Italy during his absence, hastened from the interior of Germany to destroy the powerful league which had been formed against him. He immediately invaded Normandy, ravaged the states of Duke Guelph, the husband of the countess Matilda, and compelled him to sue for peace. But the dauntless countess broke off the negotiations, and recommenced the war more terribly than before.

On the subject of this war, the infamous reply made by the pope to Godfrey, bishop of Lucca, is cited, who consulted him to know what penance he was to inflict on priests who massacred the excommunicated. "Impose on them a light penance," wrote the holy father, "and one proportioned to the intent which presided over the murders, in accordance with the usage of the Roman church; for we do not declare those homicides, who, burning with an holy zeal for religion, have murdered some excommunicated." This system of morals was worthy of the confidant and successor of Gregory the Seventh.

Henry, having settled his affairs in Bavaria and Saxony, seized on Mantua and marched at once on Rome. The Italians, fearful of the wrath of the prince, hastened to send an embassy to the anti-pope Clement the Third, who remounted the Holy See after an interregnum of two years.

Urban did not, however, permit himself to be depressed by these reverses. He became bolder than ever; and, not content with filling Italy with anathemas, he lanced forth the thunders of the Vatican on France, on account of the marriage of Phillip the First with Bertrade, the third wife of Foulk, count of Anjou. Ives of Chartres wished to oppose this alliance, but his remonstrances had brought on him disgrace from the king, and a violent persecution. The pope, informed of this matter, wrote to the metropolitan of Rheims and his suffragans, to reproach them with their silence on so scandalous a crime. "We order you," added the pope, "to seek out Phillip, and to warn him from God and us, that he must free himself from so horrible a crime by a severe penance; for, if he despises our admonition, we shall be compelled to employ the spiritual sword against him. Use the same threats to him to compel him to set at liberty our brother Bishop Ives; and if he refuses compliance to our wishes, anathematize him, close the churches, put his castles and his lands under interdict, prohibit his servants, his wife, even his children, from holding intercourse with him. We must impress such terror on these kings, that they will no more dare to seize the persons of ecclesiastics without our permission."

Whilst the legates of the Holy See were on their way to France, Urban formed the project of pushing on the young Conrad to a revolt against King Henry his father. In fact, the prince raised the standard of revolt, and came to Milan to be crowned king of Italy by Anselm, the metropolitan of that city. The Italians ranged themselves in mass beneath the standard of the young king. Henry was constrained to fly before the arms of his son, and retired into Germany. The anti-pope was driven from Rome, and Urban established himself in the city, without being, however, master of all its quarters, the German soldiers being able to maintain themselves in the pontifical palace, and in the upper parts of the city. The partizans of Urban could not even freely traverse the streets; and Geoffry the new abbot of the Trinity of Vendome, having come to confer with the holy father, was obliged to disguise himself as a pilgrim in order to avoid the dangers he would have incurred without this precaution.

Geoffry remained with the pope during all Lent in the year 1094, and sent to him a large sum of money, which he employed in corrupting the troops of Henry. He concerted his plans so well, that a few days before Easter, the captain, Ferruchio, who commanded the guard at the palace of the Lateran, promised to give up to him the tower which commanded the castle, if he would give him a thousand pounds weight of gold. Urban, who had scarcely half the money, immediately called together the bishops and cardinals of his party, to obtain the money from them; but none of them could afford him the least aid, being, like himself, deprived of the revenues of their dioceses. His affliction was so great, he could not restrain his tears. The abbot Geoffry spoke, consoled the pope, and promised him that the traitor Ferruchio should be paid. In fact, the abbot sold his table equipage, his mules, and even his ecclesiastical ornaments. The sum was thus made up, and the holy father obtained possession of the palace of the Lateran. Geoffry was recompensed by being allowed to kiss his feet on the day of his installation, and with the rank of cardinal, with the right to transmit it to his successors, the abbots of Vendome, who preserved it for more than three centuries.

Letters from Hugh, the metropolitan of Lyons, were then received in Rome, who declared that he recognized Urban as the lawful head of the church, asking for his communion, and swearing eternal hatred against the schismatics. The pontiff was so moved by these protestations, that he not only admitted the prelate to his communion, but even made him his legate in France. From that moment Hugh became one of the most devoted partizans of the court of Rome; he renewed the anathema pronounced against Henry and against the anti-pope Clement, and lanced a terrible excommunication against Phillip the First, to punish him for having married Bertrade during the life of Bertha, his first wife.

The king of France, fearful of the fatal consequences of the censures of the church, hastened to send ambassadors to the holy father, to ask him to take off the excommunication pronounced against him by the archbishop of Lyons, promising to put an end to his intercourse with Bertrade; but Ives of Chartres having already forewarned the holy father, that his deputation was but a trick and artifice on the part of Phillip, the craftiest of kings, Urban was unwilling to grant him a delay, permitting him, however, to use the crown at the festival of the saints.

In order to understand the meaning of this authority, we must know that kings, in solemn ceremonies, appeared in public, clothed in royal ornaments, in order to impose on the stupid crowd, and received their crowns from the hands of a bishop, before placing it on their heads. Ives of Chartres, relates that the crown was presented to Phillip on Easter day, by the metropolitan of Tours, and on the day of Pentecost by a bishop of Belgium. This ceremony had no connection with that of consecration, which was only practised once, namely, at the commencement of each reign.

Urban at last consolidated his authority in Rome, and his partizans became so numerous that he could traverse Italy without fearing the faction of the emperor Henry, and the anti-pope Clement. He then went to Piacenza in Lombardy, at which place he convened a council, in order to render justice to the empress Adelaide. More than two hundred bishops of Burgundy, Germany, Bavaria, and Saxony, assembled in this city; they were followed by four thousand clergymen, and at least thirty thousand laymen. As there was no church large enough to hold such a multitude, they assembled in the open country without the walls. The unfortunate queen appeared as a suppliant before the council, and related the violences which had been committed against her. They excited the indignation of the assembly, and determined many schismatics, who had until this time supported Henry, to leave his party and range themselves on the side of the pope.

The condemnation of the errors of Berenger, in regard to the eucharist, was renewed in this council, and it was declared in formal terms, that the bread and wine after the consecration were changed, not only in spirit but in essence, and became the actual body and blood of Christ. Strange aberration of the human mind! A contradictory opinion will afterwards prevail, and another pope, also presiding over a council, will declare that the bread and wine after being consecrated by a priest, are changed in spirit and not in essence, and do not really become the body and blood of Jesus Christ!

The fathers condemned the heresy of the Nicolaites, that is of priests who maintained, relying on the authority of the gospel and the canons, that they were not obliged to preserve continence. They prohibited all clergymen stained with this error, from exercising ecclesiastical functions, and the people from assisting at divine service, when performed by these heretics; they then confirmed all the decrees previously made in regard to simony, in order to prevent priests from exacting any pay for administering the holy unction, baptism and funeral rites; and finally they declared the ordinations made by the anti-pope Clement the Third, and by the other intrusive or excommunicated bishops, null and void.

After the termination of the council, the pontiff went to Cremona to confer with Conrad on their political interests. The prince came to meet the holy father a mile from the city, and led his horse by the bridle as far as the palace; he then took an oath of fidelity and obedience to Urban, promising on the Gospels and the cross to preserve the life, members, and dignity of the sovereign pontiff. Urban in turn, declared him the son of the Roman church, and promised him his aid and council to maintain him on the throne of Italy.

The affairs of Lombardy were scarcely settled, when the holy father received letters from Anselm, the metropolitan of Canterbury, who informed him that England and King William the Red, recognized him as the lawful pope, and rejected his competitor Clement. In the joy which this news caused him, Urban immediately nominated legates for Great Britain, in order to send the pallium to the archbishop of Canterbury, and to compliment the English monarch. He then took his way towards France, went up the Rhine as high as Valence, and from that city went to Puy-en-Velay, where he celebrated the festival of the Assumption of Our Lady, and where he published the Bull which convoked the celebrated council of Clermont.

Whilst waiting for the opening of the session, the holy father visited Cluny, near to Macon, where he had been a monk. He consecrated the grand altar of the new church of the monastery: and on the same day caused three other altars to be dedicated by Hugh, the metropolitan of Lyons, Daibert of Pisa, and Bruno, bishop of Seigni. After the ceremony, Urban delivered the following discourse to the monks in the presence of the bishops and cardinals: "Our predecessors, my brethren, have particularly loved and protected this abbey, and they have done so justly, since the pious duke William, its founder, was unwilling that it should have any protectors after God, but St. Peter and his successors. I am by the will of Providence, of this number; but none of those who have preceded me on the apostolic chair, has honoured this place by his presence. Christ has doubtless reserved this grace for me, because my youth flowed by in this solitude, and I have returned to the cell in which I prayed when a child, and I avow that the wish to again see it is the first and principal cause of my journey to France...." The pope granted a territorial privilege to Cluny: and he himself marked out the bounds within which it was prohibited to exercise violence, pillage, capture, or mutilation. He then went to the council of Clermont, where he found already assembled, four hundred prelates who bore the cross, and thirteen me-impolitans, as well as a great number of lords and monks.

The first sitting was held on the 18th of November, 1095. They first confirmed all the decrees which the pope had made in the synods of Melfi, Beneventum, Troyes, and Placenza. After which they renewed the prohibition of the usurpation of the property of ecclesiastics at their death; they decided that their wealth should be reserved for the successors in their dignities, or be distributed in pious works, as was provided for in their last wills. They also prohibited a clergyman, who had not been a deacon, from being chosen archdeacon, nor who had not been a priest, an archpriest, and from elevating to the episcopate those who had not been deacons.

They also established as a rule, that curates could never have two prebends in two different churches, nor two dignities in the same church; they decreed that no one could take the communion without receiving separately the eucharist under the two kinds, bread and wine; and, finally, the truce of God was confirmed to be maintained from the beginning of Advent to the Octave of the Epiphany, from Septuagesima to the Octave of Pentecost, and for the rest of the year during Thursday, Friday, Saturday, and Sunday, in each week; it was declared to exist for ever for priests and monks, and for three consecutive years for farmers and merchants, on account of the dearth of provisions. Urban then declared "the king of France excommunicated, as well as all those who shall call him king, or who shall obey him while he remains in his shameful sin."

But the most remarkable of all the proceedings of this council, and that whose consequences were the most baneful for the nation, was undoubtedly the publication of the first crusade. Before investigating the secret policy of the popes, which excited the fanaticism of the people, and urged them on to these extravagant expeditions, in which millions of men perished, we must go back to the first cause of the crusades in order to remark their absurdity.

Among the pilgrims who, about the year 1093, undertook the journey to the Holy Land, was a monk, a Frenchman by birth, born in the city of Amiens, in Picardy, named Peter the Hermit. This monk, during his sojourn at Jerusalem, paid several visits to the patriarch of that city, who gave him an exaggerated account of the evils under which the Christians of Judea laboured from the sway of the Mussulmen. Peter, ambitious like all other monks, seized with avidity on the opportunity which offered itself to him, of acquiring a certain kind of importance, and promised the patriarch to ask aid from the pope against the infidels.

On his return to Italy, he presented himself at the court of Rome, which he found fully disposed to second his views, not from zeal for religion, but from secret motives of policy, as Urban already well knew all the advantages he could derive from an expedition, which was to take the lords from their domains, and leave the population to the discretion of the priests.

One historian, Jovian, affirms that Peter was not a hermit; that he never was at Jerusalem, and, that he was in the whole matter but an agent of the Holy See, charged with the successful issue of the knaveries of the pope. "He received," adds he, "a large amount of gold, for playing the part which he did in the end, and for depicting, in emphatic terms, the piteous state, in order to lead away senseless persons to the conquest of this land of Canaan, which, for three hundred years, was constantly watered by the blood of fanatical crusaders."

Christianity was then extinguished in the East; the Mussulmen had already conquered the greater part of Asia Minor; they attacked the pilgrims, took from them presents destined for the holy sepulchre, and constrained them to pay a ransom to redeem themselves from slavery. On the other hand, Alexis Comnenus, seeing his capital threatened by the infidels, had sent ambassadors to Europe, imploring the aid of the French, Germans, and English; but his entreaties had been treated with contempt, and the people of the West refused to combat for the cowardly Comnens. The wily Greek then turned to the Holy See, and bound himself by an oath to recognize Urban as universal bishop, and to submit all the churches of his empire to him, if he should determine the princes of the West to make an irruption into the East. The bargain was concluded, and the intervention of Peter the Hermit, or rather the intrigues of the politic Urban, led to the council of Clermont.

We cite as a model of furious eloquence and sublime hypocrisy, the harangue of the holy father on this memorable circumstance.

"We are, beyond doubt, happy to see our presence excite acclamations in this great and illustrious assembly; but we cannot conceal beneath the appearances of deceitful joy, the marks of profound sadness; and your hearts will see in bitterness, and your eyes will shed torrents of tears, when you regard with me, my brethren, the misfortunes of Christianity, and our negligence of the faithful of the East.

"Thanks be to God, we have almost entirely extirpated the heresy which desolated the Western church; we have exterminated obstinate schismatics by fire or sword; we have reformed the abuses and augmented the domains and riches of the Holy See. Notwithstanding this success our soul remains plunged in sadness, and we declare to you that we will taste of no repose until the implacable enemies of the Christian name shall be driven from the holy land, which they outrage by their impious and sacrilegious conduct.

"Yes, dear brethren, Jerusalem, the city of God, that heritage of Christ, which has been bequeathed to us by the Saviour, that venerated land, in which all the divine mysteries have been accomplished, has been for several centuries in the sacrilegious hands of the Saracens and Turks, who triumph over

God himself. Who can tell the horrible profanations which they commit in these holy places? They have overthrown the altars, broken the crosses, destroyed the churches; and if in their rage they have spared the church of St. Sepulchre, it was only from a sentiment of avarice, for they have speculated on the devotion of the faithful, who go from all parts of the world to the divine tomb. They exact a ransom from pilgrims to permit them to penetrate into the holy places; they then despoil them, when they permit to go away, and even attack them when they regain their vessels; in order to seize on their persons and reduce them to the harshest slavery.

"And we, children of Christ, contemplate the massacre of our brethren coldly and without indignation; we appear indifferent to outrages which the barbarians commit on God; we abandon quietly to them an heritage which belongs to us alone; we allow them peacefully to enjoy a conquest which is the shame of all Christendom, and we remain their tributaries without daring to claim our rights by force of arms.

"Christians, however, do not shun battle, since almost all Europe is almost constantly at war; but the swords which should exterminate the enemies of Christ are drawn against himself and strike his sacred members. How long will you leave the Mussulmen masters of the East? Arise from your lethargy, which has destroyed our holy religion? A single one of our armies could easily triumph over the infidel; but our quarrels and intestine wars constantly decimate us and add strength to our foes. What great things we could accomplish if the princes of the West were not obliged to keep their troops about them in order to defend them from the attacks of their neighbours, and if the Spirit of God would unite our efforts in so beautiful an enterprise! We hope that he will lend eloquence to our words, and will descend into your hearts that you may comprehend this important truth.

"We have chosen from preference this most Christian kingdom to give an example to other people, because we recollect that it was your ancestors, the Franks, who exhibited so great a zeal for religion, and because we hoped you would reply to the voice of God and draw all Europe in your steps. The people of the Gauls have already been formidable adversaries to the Huns, the African Moors and the Arabs; already under the leading of Charles Martel and of Charlemagne, have they exterminated armies of infidels more numerous than the sands of the sea; now your legions will be still more terrible, your victories more brilliant, because you will combat under the standard of the God of armies, who sends you to conquer the heritage of his Son, and who orders you to drive the infidels from the holy sepulchre.

"Follow, intrepid Franks, the chief who calls you to the succour of religion, to the succour of your brethren of the East, to the succour of Christ himself! See that divine Saviour who sallied forth victorious over the world, death, and hell; he is now a slave to the Saracens; he presents to you his cross; he gives it to you as the sacred emblem under which you are to conquer his enemies and acquire eternal glory. Do not forget that God, by my mouth, promises you the victory and abandons to you the rich spoils of the infidels. Those who shall shed their blood in this sacred war, shall receive the ineffable crown of martyrdom; if, however, fear of death . . ." Urban was about to continue, when he was interrupted by a general uproar; the assistants shed tears, struck their breasts, raised their eyes and hands to heaven, all exclaiming together, "Let us march, God wills it! God wills it!"

The pope taking advantage of this emotion, rose from his throne, extended his hand as if to demand silence, and added, "What more magnificent expression of the divine will can there be than these simple words, 'God wills it,' issuing simultaneously from every mouth. Dear children, you have followed the inspiration of the Holy Spirit, and we receive this revelation as an oracle which guarantees the success of a war which God himself comes to declare. Let this sublime expression be the device of the army; let us engrave it on our standards and our breasts, that it may become the cry of soldiers and chiefs in combat. Yes, God wills it! Let us march to the holy sepulchre; let us go to deliver Christ, and until the blessed day on which we restore him to liberty, let us carry like him, on our right shoulders, the holy cross, on which he expired to snatch us from the slavery of sin."

The holy father then declared, that the truce of God decreed by the council should last for the Crusaders during the whole expedition, and that before their return from the Holy Land they should not be attacked either in goods or person; he freed them from all the penalties against them, and granted to them unlimited indulgences for all the robberies and murders they had committed. He appointed as apostolic legate of the crusade, Aymar de Monteil, bishop of Puy, a prelate of consummate prudence, of heroic courage, and who had made the fervour of his zeal conspicuous by being the first of all in the council to ask for the cross, and permission to devote himself to the service of Christianity. Finally, the pontiff, on dismissing the assembly, ordered all ecclesiastics every where to preach the crusade for the deliverance of Jesus Christ.

Urban thus concealing his ambitious views beneath the veil of religion, excited the fanaticism of the people of the West, and promptly brought together an army of six hundred thousand foot and one hundred thousand horsemen. "Then," says Bosvius, "men went in crowds, without distinction of age or condition, after the princes who departed on the crusade; women even exhibited an ardour altogether martial, and an Amazonian intrepidity; miracles were not wanting to the priests in order to deceive the simplicity of the faithful, to urge them into the Levant, where they died by thousands, through famine or the pestilence." This period, adds the historian, has been more fertile in superstitions than any other; but independently of the religious motives which led so many men of honest faith, the greatest part of the Croises only went into Asia from love of pillage, and because there was nothing more to pillage in their own country.

Albert also affirms, that these bands of Croises were composed of perjurers, adulterers, incestuous persons, thieves, and assassins; and that with them pillage was the true end of this holy expedition. William of Tyre, the monk Guibert and the Jesuit Maimburg avow that they resembled an army of brigands. Finally, Bayle exclaims: "Who will dare maintain that these monsters, who exhibited so much ardour for the Holy Land, were the flower of Christendom? Could those wretches who abandoned their country, their wives and their children, to go and fight against the infidels, be called the soldiers of Christ? No, for those hypocrites who pretended to see angels and saints at the head of their armies, were but pillagers and assassins; they violated women, deflowered young girls, and murdered those who granted them hospitality. The cruelty and depravity of those barbarians were so great, that the Christians of Asia whom they went to succour, evinced more fear at their approach than at the arrival of Turks and Saracens. The crusades are assuredly the most hideous pages of the history of Christianity. . . ."

Whilst the emissaries of the Holy See were traversing all Christian kingdoms, preaching the crusade, the pope was traversing France, assembling councils, selling privileges, distributing indulgences, and promising the honours of martyrdom to all the faithful. Finally, he fixed the period of departure for Jerusalem, on the day of the Assumption in the same year, 1096.

Urban then came to Tours; he catechized the people on the banks of the Loire, in the presence of a great number of bishops and lords, among whom was Foulk, count of Anjou. He also held a council of the bishops of the province, and dismissed them on the fourth Sunday in Lent, after a solemn procession, in which he appeared in a crown of thorns, according to the custom at Rome. In this ceremony, the count of Anjou received the golden rose which the popes were accustomed to bless on that day. No trace of this practice is found previous to that century. It consisted in consecrating a rose which was full of musk and balm, and offering it after the ceremony to a prince or lord whom the Holy See wished to honour. The pontiff also visited Poitiers, Saintes, Bordeaux, Maguelonne and Nîmes, where he also convoked a council.

Finally, the day of departure for the holy land having arrived, the armies of the Croises began to move on all points; the first troop was commanded by Walter the Penniless, whose surname sufficiently informs us of the true motive of his ardour for the crusade. He departed on the 8th of March, 1096, with a multitude of persons clothed in rags, and on foot like himself. They took the route through Germany and stopped at Mayence and Cologne. "They there committed so many horrors and atrocities," says the monk Guibert, "that the citizens barricaded themselves in their houses to escape from the barbarity of these monsters. Mothers become furious, murdered the infants whom they nourished; husbands poinarded their wives, and young people put themselves to death, to avoid falling into the hands of those merciless fanatics who bore the cross on the shoulder."

These first bands were followed by forty thousand vagabonds, led by Peter the Hermit, and recruited in France or on the borders of Germany. A monk, named Gondescale, went by the way of Hungary, having as his train an army of fifteen thousand pillagers. They committed so many atrocities by the way, that the exasperated inhabitants rose in mass and massacred them to the last man. But this gallant nation was soon exterminated by two hundred thousand bandits, who fell upon its cities and plains.

Urban returned to Italy, escorted by a troop of French Croises, who had at their head Robert, duke of Normandy, and Stephen, count of Blois. By their aid the pontiff entered Rome in triumph, and drove the partisans of the anti-pope Guibert from the fortresses which they occupied, excepting the castle of San Angelo, which remained alone in the power of the enemy. On the other hand, the troops of the countess Matilda drove the army of Henry out of Lombardy, and forced it to fall back on Germany.

Whilst the pope was thus labouring to consolidate his sway in Italy, the crusaders embarked for Constantinople. The ambitious Bohemond, the son of Robert Guiscard, duke of Apulia, cherished the hope of conquering for himself the Greek empire, and of availing himself of the crusades to assure his entry into Constantinople. He asked permission from the emperor Alexis for seven thousand Knights to cross his states. Urban was charged by the prince with the negotiation; but the emperor who had already been informed of the acts of brigandage committed by the Croises on their route, and of the plans of the ambitious Bohemond, a crafty, implacable, and hypocritical man, conducted himself so prudently in his intercourse with them, that the leaders of the Western Christians found it impossible to favour the designs of Bohemond.

Before the arrival of the troops, Alexis was careful to send officers who established immense markets and furnished an abundance of provisions to the soldiery to prevent their pillaging. He attached to every corps, interpreters who understood the Roman tongue, which was then beginning to become the common language of the Gauls; he instructed them to put an end to any differences which might break out between the Franks and the Greek population, with the express recommendation not to spare money, to place all his ships at the disposal of the crusaders, and to heap great marks of honour on all the leaders.

Notwithstanding all these wise precautions, the crusaders sacked the environs of Constantinople, burned the dwellings, massacred the cultivators, forced the convents of the nuns, and, in their thirst for pillage, tore even the leaden roofs from the churches to sell them to the Jews.

Anna Comnena, the daughter of the emperor, relates, that Peter the Hermit was one of the most cruel and rapacious of the leaders of the crusade. "His soldiers," adds the historianess, "committed such frightful atrocities in the environs of Nice, that the other crusaders were indignant at them. 'They cut children to pieces to eat them in stews; they placed them on spits and roasted them alive; they forced the mothers of these victims to drink the blood which flowed from their bodies; they assuaged their brutality on these unfortunate females and then murdered them. Finally, they outraged nature with young people, and then hung them up by the hair, or the beard, and amused themselves with cutting off their arms or their legs by a single blow of the sword'"

Several French lords, eaten up by ambition, joined the army of the crusaders, in hopes of placing a royal crown on their brow, and concealed their projects under an hypocritical mask. Anna Comnena thus expresses herself concerning them.

"Hugh the Great, the brother of the king of France, was very proud of his birth; before his departure, he wrote to the emperor Alexis, 'Prince, you are invited to come with pomp and magnificence to meet me; for know, that I am the king of kings, and the greatest prince under heaven.' Our skilful emperor, after having read this letter, sent orders to John, the son of Isaac, the governor of Durazzo, and to Nicholas Maurocatocalan, who commanded the fleet to watch, in order to apprize him of the arrival of the French prince.

As soon as Hugh reached Lombardy, he sent to Durazzo twenty-four ambassadors, covered with cuirasses and cuisses of gold, to prepare lodgings for his train. They said to the governor, "Know, duke, that our master, Hugh the Great, is about to arrive in this city, having taken the standard of St. Peter at Rome. He is the generalissimo of the army of the Franks; prepare, then, to receive him in a manner suitable to his dignity, and to render him the honours he deserves, or you will have to dread the power of his arms."

Such were the soldiers and leaders whom the policy of Rome pushed into the East. This war of extermination was only profitable to the Holy See and the clergy, who took under their protection the domains of the crusaders, and seized on their revenues in their capacity of tutors or curators of the widows, pupils and minors. The Jesuit Maimburg, devoted to the court of Rome, never, that it augmer by the spoils of the crusaders. He relates that Godfrey of Bouillon, pledged all his patrimony in order to obtain the sums necessary to equip the troops whom he led to the Holy Land. "He sold," adds the historian, "his countships of Bouillon and Ardennes to Albert, bishop of Liege, whose successors remained possessors of them. Richer, bishop of Verdun, also availed himself of the crusades to purchase the city and castle of Stenay, with their dependencies and all the other domains which the brother of Godfrey surrendered to that lord. Thus, whilst secular princes were impoverishing themselves to serve Christ, churchmen took advantage of the religious enthusiasm to enrich themselves with their spoils"

An incredible number of crusaders perished miserably in Palestine, or were massacred by the infidel; some bodies of them, better disciplined, or better led, alone arrived at Jerusalem, on which they seized, after having suffered all the horrors of pestilence and famine.

Urban continued his intrigues in Italy, pushed on Roger, duke of Apulia, the son of Robert Guiscard, into a war with his uncle Roger, duke of Calabria and count of Sicily; he even came beneath the walls of Capua to confer with him on the means of assuring their sway forever in the peninsula; but on the news that their enemy was at Salerno with imposing forces, he betrayed his new ally, and made a treaty with the count of Sicily, whom he appointed legate of the Holy See, although he was a layman. This remarkable act conferred on Roger and his successors a kind of royal theocracy over Sicily; the following is its tenor:—"Count, in gratitude for the services you have rendered the church by your valour in extending the sway of the popes over the land taken from the Saracens, and particularly to recompense the devotion which you have always manifested to the Holy See, we give to you and your heirs, the power of governing, in the name of St. Peter, the spiritual and temporal affairs of Sicily." One author alone, Hamelot de la Houssaye, has maintained that this decretal is apochryphal; but all other historians, and among them, monks and priests, have recognized its authenticity, and relate that it was subscribed by Urban the Second, on the 5th of July, 1098, in the city of Salerno.

Thus, an infallible pope declared that it was not necessary to be an ecclesiastic in order to have the right of governing the churches of a kingdom, and of representing the Holy See; that is to say, of ordaining bishops, presiding over councils, anathematizing priests, and receiving the offerings and tithes which superstition wrenches from ignorant and credulous people. A pontiff has thus sanctioned the hereditary transmission of this unlimited power, and as the states of Sicily do not recognize the Salic law, he has given to females the right to be at once queens and popes; and the incontestable proof that this right was conceded by Urban is, that the ancient manuscripts of the sixteenth century recognize Jane the Simple by the title of most blessed, and most sanctified holy father. "During this century," says Sismondi, "there were four pontiffs and four sacred colleges in Christendom. One pope was seated at Rome, another at Constantinople, a popess in Sicily, and a popess in England."

Whilst the holy father was at Salerno, the faction of Guibert rose up again in Rome, and was soon sufficiently powerful openly to hold a council, at which eight cardinals, four bishops, six priests, and a great number of deacons and monks assisted. Urban was solemnly anathematized by the fathers, who made this decree: "We are unwilling to leave the faithful in ignorance, that we have assembled in council to destroy the heresies introduced into the church by the monk Hildebrand and the imitators of his policy. We consequently publish the condemnation of Pope Urban, and of all who recognize him. We, however, permit the guilty to plead their cause before us, promising them, even though they should be condemned, entire safety for their persons until the festival of All Saints, because we do not thirst for blood, and sincerely desire peace, truth, and unity in the church." This was the last effort of the party of the anti-pope. Urban, on his return, dispersed his enemies.

During the following year, the pontiff convened a general synod in the church of the Lateran, to the canonization of St. Nicholas Peregrini. One might be surprised to find saints in this age of corruption; but if we study the history of the church, we will discover that saints, like miracles, have been most numerous in proportion as ignorance and superstition have been most profound. Bizancus, the metropolitan of Trany, presented to the fathers, according to custom, the relation of the pious acts and prodigies performed by Nicholas Peregrini, and the pope made the following decree: "We place in the catalogue of saints the venerable Nicholas, surnamed Peregrini, and we order that he be honoured by the church." By virtue of this decision, the Archbishop Bizancus erected a church in honour of the new saint, and sold his relics to a community of monks, who exposed them to the veneration of the faithful, and made use of them to extort offerings and money from devotees.

The assembly then received a deputation of monks from the abbey of Molesme, who came to accuse Robert, their abbot, of having abandoned them in order to retire with some fanatics to a place called Cisterium in Latin, and Citeaux in the Roman tongue, which was five leagues from Dijon, which was a desert covered with woods and rocks. They had commenced clearing it, having dug out some cells in a rock, and having then built some others with branches of trees, covered with thatch. Robert gradually increased the number of his monks; and, authorized by Eudes of Burgundy and the archbishop of Lyons, he built a church, which was solemnly consecrated on Palm Sunday, in the year 1099, the day of St. Benedict. Such was the foundation of the celebrated abbey of Citeaux.

The monks of Molesme claimed their holy abbot, whose absence caused notable prejudice to their convent; and they obtained a decree which declared Robert deprived of his title of abbot, if he refused to return to his old monastery. Robert consequently returned to Molesme, and the new monks of Citeaux were compelled to proceed to an election to replace him.

After the termination of this council, chronicles make no further mention of the acts of Urban. We only know that he died on the 29th of July, 1099.

Pride, avarice, ambition and hypocrisy formed the character of Urban. He walked in the footsteps of Hildebrand; and, although he did not possess the energy and talents of that monk, he knew how, however, by means of a perfidious policy, to re-establish the authority of the Holy See, which the pride of Gregory the Seventh had strongly compromised.

THE TWELFTH CENTURY.

THE history of the church in the twelfth century affords a long train of horrible crimes and infamous corruptions. Cardinal Baronius, the zealous defender of the popes, himself avows, that it appeared as if antichrist then governed Christendom. St. Bernard, who lived in these deplorable times, wrote to Ganfrid: "Having had for some days the happiness of seeing the pious Nobert, and of listening to some words from his mouth, I asked him what were his thoughts with regard to antichrist. He replied to me that this generation would certainly be exterminated by the enemy of God and of men; for his reign had commenced."

Bernard de Morlaix, a monk of Cluny, their contemporary, also wrote: "The golden ages are past; pure souls exist no longer; we live in the last times; fraud, impurity, rapine, schisms, quarrels, wars, treasons, incests, and murders, desolate the church. Rome is the impure city of the hunter Nimrod; piety and religion have deserted its walls. Alas! the pontiff, or rather the king, of this odious Babylon, tramples under foot the Gospels and Christ, and causes himself to be adored as a God."

Finally, Honorius, the priest of Antron, expressed himself with still more energy concerning the clergy. "Behold," cried he, "these bishops and cardinals of Rome! these worthy ministers who surround the throne of the Beast! They are constantly occupied with new iniquities, and never cease committing crimes. Not only do these wretches abandon themselves to all kinds of depravity with young deacons, but they even wish to oblige the clergy of the provinces to imitate them. Thus, in all the churches, the priests neglect divine service, soil the priesthood by their impurities; deceive the people by their hypocrisy; deny God by their works; render themselves the scandal of nations, and forge a chain of iniquities to bind men. These are the blind who precipitate themselves into the abyss, and drag with them the simple ones who follow them."

"Look also at those monks! Knavery and hypocrisy shelter themselves beneath their cowls; the frock covers every vice: gormandizing, cupidity, avarice, luxury, and sodomy. Examine also those convents of nuns. The Beast has made his bed in those dormitories, all of whose couches are defiled by the most horrid debauchery. These abominable girls no longer choose the Virgin for their model; they take Phryna and Messalina; they no longer prostrate themselves before Christ, but before an idol of Priapus. The reign of God has finished, and that of antichrist has commenced; a new law has replaced the old; scholastic theology has sallied from the depths of hell to strangle religion; finally, there are no longer morality, tenets, nor worships—and lo! the last times announced in the Apocalypse have come! . . ."

Pascal the Second was worthy to occupy the apostolic throne at this deplorable period. Before he was pope, he was called Rainerius, or Regnerus. Italy was his country, and his father dwelt at Bleda, in Tuscany, eight leagues from Rome. In his childhood he had been sent to the abbey of Cluny, to be instructed in the sacred Scriptures, where he afterwards embraced the ecclesiastical state. At the age of twenty he was sent by his community to Rome, to treat of an important matter with the pope Gregory the Seventh, who was then reigning, surprised at the address and tenacity of the young monk, wished to retain him at his court, and attached him to his person in the capacity of scribe. Some time afterwards, he ordained him a cardinal priest; and finally the young Rainerius became abbot of St. Paul's during the pontificate of Urban the Second.

After the death of that pope, the cardinals, bishops, other ecclesiastics and notables of the city, having assembled in the church of St. Clement, to proceed to a new election, chose the cardinal Rainerius unanimously. The latter, in accordance with the custom of the successors of the apostle, immediately escaped from the church, in order to be brought back in triumph to the assembly. The prothonotary of St. Peter cried out three times—"Pascal is pope!" and the assistants replied by the same acclamations. They then clothed him with a scarlet cape and the tiara, and conducted him on horseback to the southern door of the palace of the Lateran.

He then dismounted, walked up the steps of the porch, and entered the saloon in which were the two porphyry chairs. A girdle was then fastened round him, to which were attached seven keys and seven seals, which indicated the seven spiritual gifts, by which the pope could bind or loose in heaven. He was then placed alternately, and half reclining, on each of the seats; and when all the proofs were gone through, the pastoral baton was given to him, and he took possession of the apostolic throne. On the next day, Pascal was consecrated by Otho, bishop of Ostia, assisted by four prelates.

Berthold affirms, that his election was miraculous and divine, and that it was revealed in several visions to a large number of ecclesiastics and monks. Some months after his election, the holy father received a letter from Palestine, which was addressed to all the faithful, and in which the crusaders gave a detailed recital of their conquests, from the capture of Nice to that of Jerusalem. Pascal wrote them a long letter, in which he dwelt principally on the discovery of the holy lance which had pierced the Saviour, and which was miraculously found at the siege of Antioch. He claimed from their piety the gift of several very precious relics, and of a great part of the true cross which had been disinterred at Jerusalem. He also advised them of the departure of his legate, Maurice, bishop of Porto, who was about to rejoin them, fortified with the necessary powers to regulate the interests of the Holy See in the churches which had been conquered by the infidel.

From the very commencement of his pontificate, Pascal continued the policy of his predecessors, and pursued Henry the Fourth, king of Germany, and the anti-pope Guibert, who was the creature of that monarch. He did this the more successfully, as he was sustained by Count Roger, who sent him seven thousand ounces of gold and a well disciplined army, in exchange for the spiritual and temporal sovereignty of Sicily.

The anti-pope was soon besieged in the city of Albano, his residence, and he was about falling into the hands of his competitor, when he was enabled to escape; but in his flight the unfortunate Guibert was poisoned by one of his domestics, gained by the gold of Pascal.

The death of Guibert could not, however, subdue the schismatics, and they chose a new pontiff named Albert. But treason still came to the aid of Pascal. The anti-pope was seized on the very day of his election and confined in the dungeons of the monastery of St. Lawrence. King Henry nominated the priest Theodoric to replace Albert. Three months after his consecration, the new anti-pope was also carried off by the agents of the Holy See, and confined in the abbey of Lava. The obstinate schismatics then chose the priest Maginulph, who was enabled to maintain himself for some days. Pascal drove him from Rome, and the unfortunate man died in exile.

Peace at last seemed restored to the church and Italy, under the government of Conrad, when death suddenly carried off that young prince. This unfortunate event became the signal for new disorders. Pascal published that Conrad had been poisoned by his father. He excited the people to avenge the martyr, and ordered the citizens to take up arms. But this new sedition was quickly stifled by the king of Germany, and Pascal was constrained to write to him, beseeching him to restore peace to the church, by assisting at a council which had been convoked at Rome.

At this period, England was a prey to the violent dissensions which had been excited by Archbishop Anselm on the subject of investitures. This prelate, devoted to the Holy See, had excited these quarrels in order to avenge himself on King William the Red, who had refused to recognize Urban the Second as the legitimate pontiff. The prince had in turn punished the metropolitan, by depriving him of the primacy of Great Britain, and by taking from him the benefices he had seized.

Anselm went to Rome, to obtain, by means of his intrigues, a bull which should constrain the king, under penalty of excommunication, to re-instate him in all his honours, and to re-install him in the enjoyment of the revenues of the See of Canterbury, and of the churches or monasteries dependant on that archbishopric, with which he had invested other bishops by royal ordinances. Pascal, faithful to his policy, approved of the conduct of the prelate; and, in a council held at Rome, he pronounced an anathema against all laymen who should bestow ecclesiastical investitures, or should receive presents to confirm them.

Notwithstanding the declaration of the holy father, William was immovable in his determination, and Anselm could not return to England until after the death of that prince. His successor Henry the First, having also refused to conform to the decisions of the court of Rome, the metropolitan loudly declared against the Norman kings; he threatened Henry with anathematizing him, in virtue of the canons of the last council of Rome; he demanded, in the name of the pope, Peter's pence; and excited the greatest part of the English clergy against the throne.

Pascal, informed by the archbishop of the progress which the insurrection was making, wrote to him, to congratulate him on his apostolic vigour, adding: "Robert, duke of Normandy, has laid before us his complaints against the king of Great Britain, his brother, who has seized upon the crown to his detriment by giving to the people a constitution, which he calls a charter of liberty. You are not ignorant that our aid and protection are due to Robert, who has laboured for the deliver ance of Asia. It is on this account that we are pledged to maintain the just rights of this prince against Henry. . . ." The king learned that the duke of Normandy was about to make a descent on England, hoping to be seconded in his plans by the nobles and priests.

The wary Henry then called to his court the metropolitan Anselm, and won him back to his party by brilliant promises. The archbishop, gained over by the presents of the monarch, laboured for his interests, re-affirmed in their duty the ecclesiastics whose fidelity was wavering, and brought back to the army of Henry the nobles whom he had detached from it. Thus, when Robert disembarked in England, those who had at first favoured his intentions showed themselves opposed to his pretensions, and he was obliged to accept a rental of three thousand marks of silver, which his brother engaged to pay him yearly for his renunciation of the crown.

Such was the end of that war which threatened Great Britain with a new revolution. As soon as quiet was restored, Anselm came to claim from Henry the price of his devotion, and the services which he had rendered him; but the monarch, who had no longer any need of the archbishop, replied to him harshly, that he had better retire as soon as possible to his diocese, if he wished to avoid the chastisement which his treason merited. At the same time, he spat upon him before all his court, and threw in his face a letter which he had received from Rome. This missive, which had so strongly excited the indignation of Henry, was conceived in these terms: "Anselm has informed us that you arrogate to yourself the right of investiture, and that you attribute to the royal power an authority which belongs to God alone; for Christ has said: 'I am the door.' A king, then, cannot be the door of the church; and ecclesiastics who enter the priesthood by the will of sovereigns are not shepherds, but robbers. Your pretensions are unworthy of a Christian, and the Holy See cannot approve of them. Do you not know, that St. Ambrose would have suffered every punishment, rather than permit Theodosius to dispose of the dignities and property of the church; and are you ignorant of his reply to that emperor: 'Do not think, Caesar, that you have any rights over divine things. Palaces belong to princes, churches to the pope. . . .'" The archbishop of Canterbury, furious at the signal insult he had received, quitted the court, and returned to his See to excite new enemies against the king.

Henry, on his side, pursued the metropolitan and his partizans with the greatest rigour; and threatened to refuse obedience to the pope, and prevent the collection of Peter's pence in his kingdom, if he did not recognize the right of ecclesiastical investitures to reside in the crown. In this extremity, Anselm convened a provincial council, at which the commissioners of the king assisted, at which it was determined to send deputies to Rome to confer with the pope, and put a final end to these deplorable quarrels. The ambassadors, having arrived in the holy city, were admitted into the presence of Pascal to explain to him the cause of their journey and the intentions of the king.

At first, the pope was unable to reply, so violent was his rage. He then rose from his seat, dashed it upon the floor, and exclaimed with frightful blasphemies: "Not if it were a question of my head, will the threats of a king force me to yield a single one of the prerogatives of the apostolic throne! Return to your master, and tell him to dread how he raises the holy anger of the vicar of God." He then wrote to the archbishop of Canterbury to induce him to resist more vigorously than ever the pretensions of the monarch.

Henry, irritated by the insolence of the pope, immediately assembled the lords of his kingdom at London, and caused the archbishop Anselm, the cause of the dissensions, to appear before it, in order that he might hear the royal sentence which exiled him from Great Britain. The metropolitan made no complaint, and embarked the same day for Italy.

This apparent submission of the proud prelate induced the monarch to fear fresh treason; and, in order to disconcert his machinations at the court of Rome, he sent immediately into Italy, and by land, William of Varevast, with full powers to put an end to all the differences existing between the crown and the Holy See. The ambassador used such speed, that he arrived in the holy city a month before the archbishop, and had time to gain to the side of the king a large number of the priests and cardinals. Finally, Anselm made his entry into the holy city, and, on the next day, Pascal convoked a council of the bishops, cardinals, and priests of all Italy, to hear the accusations of the metropolitan of Canterbury against Henry, and to judge of the reclamations which that prince had addressed to the pope through his deputy.

William of Varevast presented the case of his master with great skill, and displayed a rare eloquence, which excited the applause of the whole assembly. Anselm and the pope alone remained immovable, without permitting their sentiments to be known. William, interpreting the silence of the pontiff, as well as the applause of the other ecclesiastics, as certain signs of a victory, added with assurance: "All Italy must learn, that the sovereign, my master, will not suffer the investitures ever to be taken from him, when he would, in defence of this right, lose his kingdom." At these last words, the pontiff suddenly rose, and, looking at the ambassador with a fierce and imperious air, replied to him in a voice of thunder: "Know, then, ambassador of Henry, that Pascal, though it should cost him his life, and we swear it before God, will never permit a layman to govern the church." There was no need of more to change their minds, and the fathers, rising tumultuously, excommunicated the king, as well as the lords who elevated clergymen to ecclesiastical dignities.

Notwithstanding this victory, Anselm could not return to England, and was obliged to go to France, where he chose the city of Lyons for his residence, in order to be enabled to awaken, with more facility, the old hatred of the duke of Normandy to his brother, and to excite him to make a second descent on the shores of Great Britain. In consequence of his intrigues, the war broke out with more fury than ever between Henry and Robert; and, as the king feared least a single defeat might hurl him from his throne, he decided to send an ambassador to Italy, with large sums of money, in order to enter into an arrangement with the court of Rome. The prince then promised Pascal to discharge the churches of England from the rent which William the Red had imposed on them; he pledged himself to receive no pay for investitures; not to exact taxes from the curates, and to pay Peter's pence regularly. Anselm, also, received permission to return to his diocese of Canterbury; he recovered all his benefices, and was declared legate a latere to the Holy See. In this capacity he received, in the presence of the grandees and bishops of the kingdom, a decree of Henry's, in which it was said, that for the future, no one in England should receive an investiture of a bishopric or abbey, by the cross or the ring, in the name of a lord or of the king himself. On his side, Anselm declared that he would not refuse consecration to any prelates who should do homage to their sovereign. Finally, they were occupied with providing ecclesiastics for the churches of England, almost all of which had been without pastors for several years. Thus, an end was put in England to the quarrel of the investitures.

But in Germany the war broke out fiercer than ever. Towards the end of the year 1102 the pope had convened a council, at which were assembled the deputies of Italy, France and Bavaria; the emperor of Germany alone failed in the appeal which was made to him, to renew his submission to the Holy See. His absence was regarded as an irremissible crime, and the fathers decreed this formula of an oath against schismatics, or rather against the partizans of that prince. "We anathematize every heresy, and especially that which now troubles Christendom, and which teaches that we may despise the anathemas and censures of the court of Rome. We promise unlimited obedience to the pontiff Pascal and his successors, in the presence of Jesus Christ and the apostle; accepting, without examination, all that the church affirms, and condemning what it condemns; promising to sacrifice in its defence riches, friends, parents, and even our life, if it is required of us." They renewed the excommunication pronounced against Henry the Fourth by Gregory the Seventh and his successor Urban the Second. Pope Pascal himself mounted the pulpit of the church of the Lateran on Holy Thursday, the 3d of April, the same year, and in the presence of an innumerable crowd of the faithful, read the sentence, employing strange imprecations in order to impress terror on the coarse men of that period, who only judged of the value of things by their appearance.

In this same assembly, the countess Matilda accused the king of Germany of having stolen, by his agents, the act of donation by which she had made the Holy See the inheritor of all her property. This implacable woman, after eighteen years had flown by in strife and battle, still wished to avenge Gregory the Seventh, her lover, on Henry, whom she accused of his death. She made a solemn declaration, in which, disinheriting her family for ever, she made the Holy See the sole legatee of her immense domains.

We translate this singular act, in which the countess glories in her title of concubine: "In the time of the illustrious pontiff Gregory the Seventh, our most beloved and most dear, and of whom we were the greatest joy, I gave to the church of St. Peter all my goods, which I then had or might acquire; and I wrote with my own hand, in the chapel of the Holy Cross, in the palace of the Lateran, a writing which constituted this donation. Since then, this deed has been destroyed by the enemies of the Holy See and mine. Thus, fearing lest my wishes should be called in question after my death, I now declare, with the formalities usual in such cases, that I abandon all my property to the Roman church, without I or my heirs being ever able to claim it against my present will, under the penalty of a fine of four thousand pounds weight of gold, and ten thousand of silver."

Whilst the pontiff was triumphing in Italy and England, he also subjected France to his authority; and he sent the bishop of Albano as legate to the court of King Phillip, to absolve that prince and the infamous Bertrade from the excommunication they had incurred from the council of Clermont during the reign of Urban.

Ives of Chartres has left us the following relation of this ceremony, which he wrote to Rome: "We inform your paternity, that the prelates of the provinces of Sens and Rheims, convoked by Richard, your legate, assembled in the diocese of Orleans, in a city called Baregenci, to relieve King Phillip and Bertrade, his wife, from the anathema pronounced against them. The two guilty ones presented themselves in the assembly with naked feet, and covered with sackcloth, weeping and crying for mercy, and swearing they would renounce their nuptial intimacies, and ever speaking together, if your legate placed this condition on their absolution. They then placed their hands on the Gospels and swore never to fall into the sin of fornication with each other, and the anathema was raised.

"I ought also, most holy father, to inform you of an accusation brought against me in the council of Baregenci, and of which I am to justify myself. It is false that I have ever been guilty of simony. This crime is, in my eyes, one of the most hideous sores of the clergy; and since I have been a bishop, I have pursued it, as far as was possible for me to do through the whole extent of my jurisdiction. I ought, however, to inform you, that notwithstanding my recommendations, the dean, chorister, and other officers of the canons of Chartres, receive money from clergy and laity; they maintain that it is their right, and that they follow the usages of the Roman church, in which your chamberlains and the ministers of your palace receive rich presents from bishops and abbots, at the time of their consecration, under the name of offerings and benedictions. They maintain that the court of Rome gives nothing gratis, and is even paid for pens and paper. To this I could only oppose to them the words of the evangelist, 'Do as the pope commands and not as he does.' "

Pascal, whose policy was characterized by the perfidy of that of Urban and the violence of that of Gregory, seconded Matilda's schemes of vengeance, and sent prelates into Germany and Saxony, to publish the anathema against Henry the Fourth, and to excite the young Henry to revolt against his father, after the example of his brother Conrad.

The legates at first stirred the people by furious preaching; they represented the king as a renegade who had refused to take part with the faithful in the glorious enterprise of the crusades; they accused him of having excited bloody schisms since his advent to the throne, and of having desolated the church by persecutions worthy of the age of Diocletian. By way of contrast they exalted the merits and piety of his son; they spread gold profusely about, and when the young Henry, at their instigation, raised the standard of revolt, a formidable party rallied around him to combat the king of Germany. After this, Gebhard, the legate of the Holy See, the soul of all these intrigues, being desirous of increasing the pontifical influence by the splendour of an external ceremony, convoked all the grandees and clergy in a church. On the appointed day, in the presence of an immense crowd, he conducted the young Henry to the altar of Christ, gave him in the name of the pope, power to combat against his father, to dethrone him and put him to death by torture.

After this ceremony Henry entered Saxony at the head of the nobility of Bavaria, Suabia, the upper Palatinate and Franconia; he was received with transports of joy by the Saxons, who were worn out by the tyranny of the father. But the young chief, concealing under an apparent modesty, the ambition which devoured him, declared that he had not taken up arms from a desire of reigning, and would not submit that his lord and father should be deposed. "On the contrary," added he, "as soon as the king shall have determined to obey St. Peter and his successors, we shall immediately lay aside the sword, in order to submit to our father, as the humblest of his subjects; but if he persist in his disobedience to the orders of the vicar of Jesus Christ, as we devote ourselves to God before all things, we will put him to death with our own hand, if it be necessary, in defence of religion, as the pontiff Pascal has ordered us."

The king of Germany finding himself almost abandoned by his troops, dared not march against the rebels, and retired to his northern provinces. He then determined, in order to put an end to all pretexts for revolt, to replace the Teutonic kingdom under the authority of the Holy See, and to make his submission to the pope. For this purpose, an ambassador was despatched to Rome with the following letter: "The pontiffs Nicholas and Alexander honoured me by their friendship, always treating me as a son; but their successors, animated by a fury whose cause is inexplicable to me, excited our people and even our son Conrad against us; it is still the same, our only remaining child is infected by the same poison; he has raised himself against us in contempt of his oaths, urged on by knaves who seek to increase their wealth by injury to our crown. Several of our wise councillors have exhorted us to pursue him without delay by arms; but we have preferred to suspend the effects of our wrath, so that no one in Italy or Germany may impute to us the evils of such a war. Besides, we are assured that your legates themselves excited our subjects to rebellion, by accusing us of troubling the peace of the church. We, therefore, send to you one of our faithful friends to learn your intentions, and to know if you desire our alliance without prejudice to our rights, such as our ancestors exercised, and you preserving your apostolic dignity as your predecessors preserved it. Finally, if you wish to act paternally to us, send us some one in your confidence, carrying your secret letters, and who will inform us of your wishes; then we will send you ambassadors who will finish this great matter with you."

All these tokens of submission were useless; Pascal continued his dark schemes; he even purchased the treason of the officers who surrounded Henry the Fourth, and the old king of Germany was given up to his son at the castle of Bighen. In vain he cast himself at the feet of the bishop of Albano, the legate of the Holy See, imploring absolution from the censures of the church, he was despoiled of the ensigns of royalty and forced to abdicate the throne in favour of his son Henry the Fifth. He was then sent in chains to Ingelheim, where he was subjected to the most cruel treatment.

These barbarities excited general indignation; the lords, as well as the people of the cities this side the Rhine, declared in his favour and refused to recognize Henry the Fifth. One of the other side, Henry of Limburg, who possessed the Duchy of Lower Brittany, having been secretly informed that the court of Rome intended to strangle the old king, hastened to inform him of it. By the interference of this generous friend, the emperor was enabled to escape secretly from Ingelheim, where he was strictly guarded, and he descended the Rhine as far as the city of Cologne, from whence he went to Liege. From that place he addressed messages to all the princes of Christendom, and in particular to the king of France, imploring their assistance in the general interest of sovereigns, whose majesty the popes had violated in his person.

But the indignant Pascal, furious at the escape of the emperor, and at the manifesto which he had lanced in all courts against the Holy See, also wrote to the bishops, lords and princes of France, Germany, Bavaria, Suabia and Saxony, and to the clergy of Liege: "Pursue every where, and with all your strength, Henry the chief of the heretics," he said to them; "exterminate that infamous king! you will never be able to offer a sacrifice more agreeable to God than the life of that enemy of Christ, who would snatch their supreme power from the popes. We order you and your vassals to put him to death in the most cruel tortures, and if you faithfully execute our will, we grant to you remission of your sins, and an arrival after death at the heavenly Jerusalem."

*This sanguinary order disgusted even the ecclesiastics themselves, and the bishop of Liege addressed this reply to the Holy See: "We have searched in vain through all the texts of the Holy Scriptures, and of the fathers, and have found no example of a command such as you send us. We learn on the contrary from the sacred books, that popes cannot bind or loose any one without examination; from whence then comes this new law, which condemns a Christian to expiate in tortures an error of which he has not been convicted? from whence has the Holy See power to command a murder as a meritorious act, whose sanctity will efface not only crimes which are passed, but even bestow in advance absolution for incests, robberies, and assassinations? Command such crimes to the infamous hired assassins of Rome, we refuse you obedience."

"Did there formerly exist in ancient Babylon, a more horrible confusion than that monstrous mixture of barbarity, pride, idolatry and impurity which now reigns in the holy city? Alas! the words of the apostle are already realized; a frightful vision, coming from a horrible land, strikes my mind; I see an impetuous whirlwind rising in Rome which overwhelms the world, and in which the prince of darkness acts with his infernal cohorts. . ."

Notwithstanding the firmness of the bishop of Liege, the unfortunate king of Germany could not escape pontifical vengeance: he died, poisoned by the agents of the Holy See, whilst his son was besieging the city. The inhabitants of Liege having no longer the emperor to defend, and fearing the horrors of a siege, sent deputies to the camp of Henry to announce to him the death of his father and make their submission. This monster dared to demand that the dead body should be delivered up to the executioner to undergo the frightful tortures ordained in the sentence passed by the pontiff; after having committed this horrid sacrilege, he ordered that the shreds of the dead body should be deposited in a stone sarcophagus, which remained for five centuries before the porch of the cathedral, with this inscription: "Here lies the enemy of Rome."

At this period, bands of pillagers traversed the provinces of Gaul, sometimes under the leading of ruined lords, sometimes under the orders of plebeian adventurers, and frequently even under the command of debauched monks who had been driven from their monasteries. It is related that the famous Robert d'Abriessel commanded one of these troops, when, struck by an inspiration from heaven, he resolved to quit this life of crime, and retire to a pious retreat with the men and women of his band, in order to labour with their own hands. He impressed his sentiments on all his followers, and went to the extremity of the diocese of Poitiers, two leagues from Cande in Touraine, near to an uncultivated ravine, covered with rocks called Fontebrault. They first built cabins and a chapel; they then cleared the land, and when the young colony increased, Robert separated the men from the women, destining the one for prayer, the other for labour in the fields. He, however, permitted them to maintain intimate relations every Sunday. Such was the origin of the celebrated abbey of Fontebrault. Pascal confirmed the foundation of this establishment as well as the rule which permitted this multitude of men and women to live in the same enclosure.

At the beginning of this year (1106) the holy father resolved to travel over Italy, France and Germany, in order to consolidate his sway over these three kingdoms. He went first to Florence where he convened a council for the purpose of assuming to himself the right of rule over that church; but the bishop of that city destroyed his hopes by maintaining in the assembly in the presence of the pope, and of a crowd of priests and laymen, that antichrist was born, and that he wished to seize on the throne of the church. This opinion, from the application which was made of it to the pope, created so great a tumult, that they could neither decide the question nor terminate the council, and Pascal was obliged to escape from Florence to avoid being stoned by the people. The holy father then directed his efforts upon Lombardy, and held a general synod at Guastalla; at this it was decreed that the whole province of Emilia, with the cities of Parma, Modena, Placenza, Reggio and Bologna, should no longer be submitted to the metropolitan of Ravenna, who only retained Flaminia.

Pascal thus wished to diminish the influence of the archbishopric of Ravenna, whose titularies, for two hundred years, had constantly exhibited hostility to the Roman church. The council renewed the censures pronounced against laymen who pretended to have the right of investiture of ecclesiastical benefices. The deputies of King Henry the Fifth, then swore filial fidelity and obedience to the pope in the name of their master, and demanded that his holiness should authentically confirm the dignity of emperor.

The pontiff went from Guastalla to Parma, where he consecrated the cathedral of that city, in compliance with an invitation from the citizens, in honour of the Virgin. When the ceremony was finished, he declared the new church to be a dependency of the Holy See, and sold it to Cardinal Bernard, a cruel and sodomite priest, who was execrated throughout all Italy. Finally, Pascal started for Bavaria, where he was to wait for the festivals of Christmas; but having been informed on his journey that the people were not disposed to confirm the decrees against the investitures, and that the emperor was not as docile as he had appeared, he suddenly changed his determination and went towards France, contenting himself with simply informing Henry by letter of his new plan, and telling him that he was going into France, because the door of Germany was not yet open to him.

The holy father having arrived at the monastery of Cluny, with a numerous suite of bishops, cardinals and Roman lords, found the Count de Rochfort, the seneschal of the king of France, who had been sent as his guide through the kingdom. After having visited the convents of la charité and St. Martin of Tours, Pascal went to St. Denis, where he was received with great honours by the abbot Adam, who then ruled that abbey. He entered it, clothed in his pontifical ornaments, with his tiara on his head, in the midst of the cardinals wearing their violet coloured capes, and his bishops bearing the cross and mitre.

The most extraordinary part, says the abbot Suger, who was present at that ceremony, was, "that the pontiff, whose sordid avarice was well known to all the clergy, carried off neither the gold nor the silver, nor the precious stones of this monastery as the monks feared; he scarcely deigned to regard all this wealth, and prostrated himself humbly before the precious relics of the saint. He then lifted up his face bathed in tears, and asked the good monks, with the tones of a suppliant, if they would give a part of the garments tinged with the blood of the blessed martyr? "Do not refuse," said he, "to give us some little of the episcopal ornaments of him whom our apostolic See so liberally sent to you for an apostle."

Philip and his son came the next day to visit the pope and kissed his feet. Pascal raised them up and conferred familiarly with them on the affairs of the church, beseeching them pathetically to protect it as Pepin and Charlemagne had done, and courageously to resist the enemies of the Holy See, and particularly the king of Germany. The two princes swore a boundless submission to the pontiff, and as he expressed fears in relation to the conference which he was about to have with the ambassadors of Henry at Chalon-sur-Marne, they promised to place at his disposal a numerous escort which was capable of defending him against every enterprise.

When the holy father arrived in the city of Chalon, he found the envoys of the king of Germany, the bishops of Treves, Halberstadt and Munster, as well as several German counts and the terrible duke of Guelph. This lord went nowhere without an herald-at-arms carrying his long sword before him. His height, imposing stature, even the formidable sound of his voice, every thing about him appeared to indicate that he had been sent to intimidate the pontiff rather than confer with him. The escort of the French was fortunately composed of redoubtable warriors: and thanks to their presence, the negotiations could commence unshackled. The archbishop of Treves, who understood the Roman language, spoke in the name of his master, and offered to submit to the Roman See, saving the rights of the imperial crown, which consisted in bestowing a cross and ring on the pope chosen by the clergy and people, and whose nomination had been approved by the emperor.

The bishop of Placenza rejected this proposition, and replied in the name of the holy father, "The church, purchased by the precious blood of Jesus Christ, has conquered its liberty by the martyrdom of the apostle Peter, and that of many of his successors. We will not permit it to fall back into servitude, which would happen if we could not appoint a chief without consulting the emperor. To wish to constrain it to such subjection, is to commit treason against the divinity! I then pronounce an anathema on the prince who wishes to arrogate to himself the investiture of the sacred throne of the apostle! and malediction on the ecclesiastic who would receive the cross and ring from a king whose hands are empurpled by the sword."

The German ambassadors understood from this reply that it was useless to continue the negotiations, and the duke of Guelph exclaimed with a thundering voice, "It is not here by vain discourse, but at Rome, by blows of the sword, that we must settle this quarrel." After these words they all retired, without even taking leave of the assembly.

Pascal, although of an impetuous character, knew how to curb his anger; and he even sent some of his most skilful counsellors to Adalbert, the chancellor of Henry, to beseech him to listen quietly to the representations of the Holy See. But he could do nothing, as the ambassadors were ordered to make no concessions opposed to the right of investiture claimed by the emperor. The conferences were then entirely broken off, and the deputies returned to the court of Germany. The holy father, who counted on the assistance of the king of France, seized eagerly upon the opportunity which was afforded of kindling a war in Germany and following the example of his predecessors, he resolved to act against the son as they had done against the father. He went to Troyes in Champagne, where he held a council, in which the liberty of ecclesiastical elections was decreed, and the condemnation of investitures confirmed.

Henry, on his part, had foreseen the intentions of the pope, and his ambassadors declared, in the presence of all the French clergy, that the emperor possessed the right of investiture since the times of Charlemagne, which Adrian the First had confirmed by an authentic act, which they were ready to produce to the assembly. As the pontiff was unwilling to submit to the tenor of this writing, he affirmed by oath that it was apocryphal, and ordered the fathers to pass it by. The Germans protested that their master would never ratify any determination made by judges so unjust as to refuse the verification of an authentic act, and threatened the pope with all the wrath of their sovereign. Pascal at last, intimidated by this energetic opposition, broke up the session, and granted the king a whole year to plead his cause at Rome before a general council.

Henry was indignant at the Holy See; he, however, dissimulated his resentment, being occupied with subjugating Flanders, Poland, Hungary, and Bohemia; but when tranquillity was restored to his kingdom, and he was freed from a redoubtable adversary, Philip being dead, and the king, Louis the Gross, who succeeded him, having too many affairs of his own on hand to oppose his projects, he convened a general assembly of his estates at Ratisbon, and declared that he had resolved to go to Rome to receive the imperial crown from the hands of the pontiff, in accordance with the custom of his predecessors. He consequently ordered his princes, dukes, counts, all his nobility, even the bishops themselves, to join him at his court with their richest equipages, to render his train more imposing, and to follow him into Italy.

Pascal, informed of the hostile disposition of Henry, immediately went into Apulia, where he convened the Italian dukes, the prince of Capua, and the counts of these provinces. He made them swear to aid him against the king of Germany; he then returned to Rome and made the grandees and people take the same oath. All these steps were useless; the emperor entered Lombardy at the head of a powerful army, and was crowned king of Italy by the archbishop of Milan. After the ceremony, Henry hastened to send ambassadors to the Holy See to propose an accommodation, or rather to gain time; for his troops continued their march, ruining, on their passage, the cities which refused to recognize his authority.

Finally, the ambassadors of Henry and of the pontiff met on the 5th of February, 1111, on the porch of St. Peter, in the church of our Lady of the Tower, and made the basis of a treaty on the following propositions—On the day of his coronation the emperor was to renounce in writing all ecclesiastical investitures, and deposit the act in the hands of the holy father, in the presence of the clergy and the people; he was to engage to leave all churches at liberty, as also their oblations and domains, which they did not receive directly from the crown; he was to restore to the Holy See all the donations which had been made to it by Charlemagne, Louis le Debonaire, and the other emperors; he was to contribute neither by counsel, nor actions, to injure the pope in his pontificate, life, members, nor liberty. This last promise extended to the faithful servants who had guaranteed the execution of the treaty in the name of the Roman church. In addition, the emperor was to give as hostages his nephew Frederick, and twelve of the principal lords of Germany.

On his side, Pascal engaged to restore to the king on the day of his coronation, the lands and domains which belonged to the empire in the times of Lewis, Henry, and his other predecessors; he promised to publish a bull which should prohibit all bishops, under pain of anathema, from usurping regalities, that is to say, cities, duchies, marquisates, countships, jurisdictions, mints, marches, lands or castles, which were under the jurisdiction of the throne.

This treaty granted to Henry one of two things which he had demanded—the surrender of the great wealth which the priests possessed in his states, in exchange for the right of investiture; but foreseeing that the prelates would refuse to obey the pontiff, when he ordered them to give up their wealth, and that they would boldly maintain that no power could take from them the domains they possessed, the prince made an extremely adroit determination in order not to be himself despoiled and to be beyond the reproaches which might be made if he were forced to retain the investitures. He ratified the treaty, adding, however, as an indispensable clause, that the exchange which he made of the right of investiture for the royalties or property which the priests held from the crown, should be approved and solemnly confirmed by all the princes of the states of Germany.

After these preliminaries he came to encamp near Rome; as soon as he was beneath the walls of the city, the pontiff sent to meet him, the principal officers of the palace of the Lateran, the magistrates, the schools, an hundred young nuns veiled, and carrying torches, and a multitude of children who cast flowers in his way. When Henry had entered Rome, all the ecclesiastics surrounded him, singing hymns in his praise, and conducted him in triumph to the church of St. Peter, where he found the pope, who awaited him on the porch. The prince prostrated himself before the pontiff and humbly kissed his feet; they then entered the temple by the silver door amidst the loud acclamations of the people.

Pascal saluted Henry as Emperor of the West, and the bishop of Lavici pronounced the first prayer of the consecration; when it was finished, and before continuing the ceremony, the holy father demanded from the prince the oath, in writing, of his renunciation of the investitures; Henry replied, that he was ready to fulfil his promise, but that his conscience required he should first consult the German bishops, who had a great interest in the matter. He went in fact with his prelates into the sacristy to deliberate over the demands of the pope. The discussion was long and stormy: Pascal, impatient to know the result of their deliberations, sent to ask the emperor if he were willing to execute the convention which had been agreed upon. This step of the pope decided the question; the bishops immediately rose from their seats protesting that they would never suffer themselves to be despoiled of their goods, and went tumultuously towards the saloon of the wheel of porphyry, where the pope was seated, waiting for them. The pontiff endeavoured to calm them by addressing to them a long discourse to represent to them "that they should render to Cæsar that which belonged to him; that he who devoted himself to God, should not be engaged in temporal affairs; and that, according to St. Ambrose, worldly priests were unworthy of the priesthood." But they interrupted him quickly, saying to him, "Most holy father, we would enjoy the property of our bishoprics as you do the patrimony of the Holy See: and we would not permit the apostle himself to take from us the least part of our revenues."

During the discussion, the duke of Guelph, overmastering all other voices, exclaimed to the holy father, "what is the end of your discourse, priest of Satan? We have nothing to do with your foolish conditions. We wish you to crown our emperor, as his predecessors have been by yours, without your making any innovations nor taking from him or our bishops what belongs to them."

Henry then took the tone of a master, and said, "most holy father, it is our will that all these divisions should cease, and that you should finish at once the ceremony of our consecration." Pascal, humbled in his pride, replied, "the greater part of the day is past; the ceremony is long, and we shall not have time to crown you to day." The emperor, indignant at this obstinacy, caused the sanctuary to be surrounded by armed men, in order to reduce the pope to obedience. He manifested no fear, slowly mounted up to the altar of St. Peter and performed divine service, after which he wished to return to the palace of the Lateran. But the guards of the emperor presented to him the points of their swords and interdicted his passage; he then retraced his steps and seated himself in silence before the confessional of the apostle.

Suddenly a loud noise was heard in the church; the priests, who had mingled themselves in the crowd, cried, "to arms! to arms! they wish the life of the pontiff,"—and at their call, the faithful having assembled, charged the German troops furiously. These, obliged to defend themselves, drew their swords, struck without discrimination priests, women, and men, and drove all these fanatics out of the church. The emperor remained master of the field, and during the night he sent the pope to a fortress, the custody of which he confided to Altro, count of Milan.

The cardinals of Tusculum and Ostia, who had made their escape during the tumult, traversed the streets, exciting the citizens to punish the infamous treatment of the emperor. All flew to arms, fell upon the Germans whom they met in the streets, and on the next day, at daybreak, all the companies of the Romans advanced in good order under the leading of their captains, passed the gates and attacked the imperialists with such impetuosity that they slew a great number and put the rest to flight. Henry himself was thrown to the ground, wounded in the face, and would certainly have been massacred if Otho had not given him his horse and devoted himself to save him. The Romans seized the count, and, to punish him for his generous sacrifice, they cut him in pieces before the palace of the Lateran and made the dogs devour the bleeding morsels of his dead body.

Henry regained his camp, where he found the prisoners whom he had sent in advance, under a good escort; the next day he approached Rome and commenced the siege: his troops devastated the country, pillaged the convents and churches, burned the domains of the Holy See, and massacred the cultivators.

On his side, the bishop of Tusculum, to whom the defence of Rome was committed, did not remain inactive; he encouraged the people in their resistance, and his emissaries traversed Italy to engage its princes to come to the succour of the church: but all his efforts were useless. The emperor daily pressed the place more actively; and the cardinals, as well as the other prelates who were prisoners, finding themselves threatened with death or the mutilation of their members, if they refused to submit to the will of the prince and the German bishops, determined to confirm the privilege of ecclesiastical investitures in the crown, and besought Pascal to grant to the emperor the right which he claimed, since there remained to them no hope of succour or of escape from captivity. Finally, overcome by their urgency and their tears, the pontiff said to Henry that he was submissive to his will. "I will save my children," he added, "but I take God to witness, that I do for them, and the peace of the church, an act which I should have wished to shun at the price of my own blood."

The treaty was drawn up which accorded the investitures to the king; and in the act the pontiff solemnly engaged never to pronounce an anathema against the king, and never to disturb him for the violences which his soldiers had used in the states of the church. It was, besides, specified, "That the rights of the throne should be confirmed by a privilege contained in a bull in proper form, and prohibiting clergy and laity from opposing their exercise under penalty of excommunication; still more, that the emperor should grant investitures, as in times past, by giving a cross and a ring to the bishops and abbots who should have been canonically elected without simony, and with his consent; that metropolitans and even bishops should freely ordain prelates whom the king and his successors had invested with the privilege; but that the claimant should not be consecrated except with the authority of his sovereign

It was finally agreed that the pope should crown Henry without delay, and would faithfully aid him to preserve his states and empire.

On his side, the prince engaged "to set the holy father at liberty, as well as all the bishops, cardinals, lords, and hostages who had been seized with him; he promised to preserve peace with the Roman people; to restore immediately the patrimonies and domains of the church; and to swear obedience to Pope Pascal, saving the rights and honour of the kingdom and the empire, as the Catholic emperors had done towards the chiefs of the Holy See." These conditions were signed by the pope and the prince, and solemnly confirmed upon the Gospels.

Henry, however, who distrusted, with reason, the sincerity of the pontiff, was unwilling to surrender him, before the promulgation of the bull which bestowed on him the right of investitures. In vain did the pontiff make protestations of his good faith, and affirm that the seal of the Holy See remaining in the palace of the Lateran, he could not seal the diploma which the emperor claimed; for at the very moment a secretary came to present to him the seal, which had been found in his chamber. The bull was drawn up, and the pope was obliged to sign it. The face of Pascal was pale from rage at seeing his knavery unmasked; he however signed it. The following is its tenor:—"We grant and confirm to you the prerogative which our predecessors have granted to yours, to wit, that you should invest with the cross and a ring bishops and abbots of your kingdom, freely chosen and without simony; and that no one can be consecrated if he has not received the investiture by your authority; and that because your ancestors have given so much property of the crown to the churches, that prelates should contribute their first fruits to the defence of the state. The clergy or laity who shall dare to contravene the present concession, shall be anathematized, and shall lose all their dignities."

The emperor and pope then made their entrance into Rome. They went to St. Peter's holding each other's hand, in the midst of a triple line of German soldiers, who kept all the avenues in order to prevent any effort at sedition. Pascal crowned Henry and solemnly performed divine service. After the consecration, he took the host, broke it into two parts, and turning to the emperor, said to him, "Prince, behold the body of Christ: I give it to you in consecration of the peace we have made, and of the concord which should reign between us. But as this part of the eucharist has been divided from the other, so let him who shall seek to break the union be separated from the kingdom of God." The mass being finished, the pontiff left the church with his cardinals, and went to the palace of the Lateran.

On the following day Henry broke up his camp, and retook his way to Germany, full of confidence in the solemn oaths of the pope; but he soon learned how knavish are priests, and how they sport with the holiest things, and the most august ceremonies of religion. The cardinals who were at Rome during the captivity of Pascal, openly condemned the cession of the investitures which had been made to Henry, and refused to ratify it, declaring it contrary to the laws of the church. Fra Paolo relates that they were excited to this resistance by the pontiff himself, who went to Terracina that they might be able to condemn his acts. In fact, during the absence of the pope, they assembled under the presidency of John, bishop of Tusculum, and lanced a decree against the holy father and his bull. Pascal immediately addressed a letter to them, which he published, and in which he promised to annul that which was only done to avoid the ruin of Rome and of all the province. "I have failed in my aim, my fathers," wrote the hypocritical Pascal, "but I am ready to do penance for my fault, and repair the evil I have done."

Brunon, bishop of Segni, who presided over the council, replied to his letter in the name of the prelates: "My enemies publish, most holy father, that I have no affection for you, and that my words accuse you; they calumniate me, for I love you as my father and my lord; but I ought to love him more who has immolated himself upon the cross to ransom us from death and hell. In his name I have declared to you, that we do not approve of the bull granted by your holiness to the emperor, because it is opposed to religion. Your avowal then filled us with joy, when we learned that you also condemn it. What priest could approve of a decree which would destroy the liberty of the church, close on the clergy the only door by which they could legitimately enter the priesthood, and open several secret issues to robbers? The apostles condemn those who obtain a See or order through the secular power, because laymen, how great soever may be their piety and their power, have no authority to dispose of churches; the constitutions which you yourself before have made, condemn clerks who receive institution from the hand which bears the sword; these decrees are sent out, and no one who opposes their execution is a Catholic. Confirm, then, your old ordinances, and proscribe the thought which would destroy them, for it is an infamous heresy. You will then see tranquillity restored to the church, and all ecclesiastics prostrate at your feet. In vain will you oppose the sanctity of the oath which you have taken. You should violate it if the interests of religion demand it; and no one can condemn a pope who breaks his oath by order of God."

Pascal then returned to Rome, and convened a synod to decide on the measures to be taken to break with the emperor. The assembly commenced its sessions in the church of the Lateran on the 28th of March, 1112. Twelve metropolitans, one hundred and four bishops, and a great number of other ecclesiastics, were present. The holy father first spoke and said: "I have sworn by the bishops and cardinals, that I would never more disturb the emperor on the subject of investitures, and that I would not pronounce an anathema against him. I will keep this promise. But I declare the bull which I made from constraint, without the counsel of my brethren, and without their subscription, to be tainted with heresy, and I ask this assembly to correct it, that neither the church nor my soul suffer any harm." Gerard, bishop of Aquitaine, rising then, read the following decretal: "We all, the fathers of this holy council, condemn by ecclesiastical authority, and the judgment of the Holy Spirit, the privilege which the violence of King Henry wrested from the pontiff Pascal. We declare it null, and prohibit clergymen or laymen from conforming to it under penalty of excommunication." All replied: "Amen, amen."

The pope then rose, laid aside his tiara and cape, declared himself unworthy of the pontificate, and besought the council to depose him, inflicting the most severe penance, for having faltered before the sword of a king. The assembly refused to condemn the holy father, and cast all the blame on Henry, who was declared the enemy of God and the church, and a heretic, like his father. They finally pronounced an anathema on him and his partizans.

Pascal wrote immediately to Guy, the metropolitan of Vienne, and legate of the Holy See, to inform him of the decisions of the synod, and to exhort him to put them in execution. "Remain firm," added he; "resist the cajolements and threats of the excommunicated emperor; publish our sentence throughout Germany, being careful to avoid throwing the blame on me, lest I be accused of having betrayed the oath sworn upon the host and the Gospels. Declare to the faithful that the treaties made in the camp to which I was carried prisoner by means of the most odious tyranny, are null of right. . . ."

Guy faithfully obeyed the instructions of the holy father, and fulminated a terrible anathema against the king of Germany. The Saxons revolted at his word, and the ambitious lords, using the excommunication as a pretence, refused to obey the emperor. The pope, however, desirous of preserving the appearance of justice towards the prince, sent to him the following paternal advice: "The divine law and the holy canons prohibit priests from being engaged in secular matters, or from going to the court of princes, except when they are called to deliver the condemned, or to obtain pardon for the unfortunate oppressed. Notwithstanding these prohibitions of the church, ministers of the altar have become in your kingdom the ministers of the throne. Bishops and abbots clothe themselves in armour, and march at the head of their armed bands to devastate the country, and pillage and massacre Christians. They hold from the state duchies, marquises, provinces, cities and castles. From this has arisen the deplorable custom of not consecrating prelates until they have received an investiture at the hands of the king. These disorders have been justly condemned by Popes Gregory the Seventh and Urban the Second; and we confirm the judgment of our predecessors, ordering that ecclesiastics shall render to you, our dear son, all the royal rights which formerly belonged to the empire during the reigns of Charles, Louis and Otho, your predecessors. The churches, with their oblations and domains, shall always remain free, as you promised God on the day of your coronation."

Notwithstanding all the address of the pontiff not to declare himself in open hostility to the emperor, Henry had penetrated the secret intentions of the court of Rome, and determined to pass over into Italy a second time. Whilst preparations were making for this expedition, Pascal convened a council at Ceperan to judge the metropolitan of Beneventum, who had excited a sedition against the constable Landulph, whom the pope had sent to that city. At the opening of the synod the pope accused the archbishop of having seized on the regalia of St. Peter and the keys of the city of Beneventum; of having borne casque and buckler, and of having compelled the prefect Foulk to take an oath of obedience to the Normans, who had been introduced into the place. The prelate fiercely replied, that he had never received the regalia, but to pour the product into the treasury of St. Peter; that he had never had the keys of Beneventum in his power, and that the officer who kept them was always faithful to the court of Rome; that finally, it was false that he had introduced the Normans into the city; and that if Foulk, as well as the people, had sworn fealty to them, it was of their own accord, and not by his orders.

Pascal, exasperated at this reply, wished to have the archduke condemned of being guilty of high treason. In vain did Duke William, Count Robert, Peter de Leo, and a great number of bishops who were at the council, implore the clemency of the holy father, not to dishonour publicly the chief of the clergy of Beneventum; in vain did he himself offer, though innocent, to go as an exile from Italy. Pascal was inflexible, and declared that he wished the guilty man condemned with all the severity of the canons. The fathers of the council, who all feared the wrath of the pontiff, were compelled to condemn the venerable prelate, and though they had recognized his innocence, pronounced sentence of deposition against him. The archbishop, indignant at such cowardice, rose from his seat, tore off his sacerdotal garments, and having loaded the pope with imprecations left the council chamber.

Some months after, Canon, bishop of Palestrina and legate of the Roman church, convened a synod at Beauvais, at which Henry was excommunicated. This new bull was confirmed by a large number of German lords and bishops who had assembled at Cologne, under the presidency of Thierry, the cardinal legate. The king, irritated by this inconvenient manifestation, sent the bishop of Wirtzburg with orders to dissolve the council and pursue those who should refuse to leave Cologne at once as rebels. This mission resulted deplorably; the synod refused to receive the envoy of the excommunicated sovereign, and passed a decree which declared all those who remained in the service of the prince excommunicated and anathematized. The ambassador left Cologne in alarm, and did not dare to appear again at court. The fear, however, of losing his bishopric determined him to go to the prince, and he once more celebrated mass in his presence; but on the next day he felt so much remorse that he fled from the capital.

Henry, fearing the consequences of an anathema on the superstitious minds of his people, returned to Italy at the head of an army, with which he encamped in the environs of Pavia; before, however, recommencing hostilities he wished to try the effect of negotiations, and sent the celebrated Peter, abbot of Cluny, as his deputy to the pope. Pascal convened his clergy in council in the palace of the Lateran, to reply to the ambassador. At the opening of the session, the holy father thus spoke, "We have come, my brethren, through the greatest perils by land and sea, to treat of peace between the church and the throne. We declare at once in your presence, that it is to free the holy city from the pillage, incendiarism and massacres of the barbarous soldiers of the king of Germany, that we have signed a condemnable treaty;—we have committed this fault, because the pontificate does not bestow the privilege of infallibility, and because a pope is made of dust as other men. It is on this account we beseech you to pray to God to pardon us for this action; and with you we anathematize that infamous bull, whose memory should be odious to all Christians." The pope then renewed the decretal of Gregory the Seventh, which prohibited investitures by princes under penalty of excommunication.

The agents of Henry seeing that the synod shunned even raising the question of agreement between the prince and the pope, sought to excite a popular movement against Pascal, and availed themselves of the death of Peter the prefect of Rome, to declare his son his successor in this important office. This young man, who was scarcely grown up, appeared to be easy to seduce, and they hoped that he would enter readily into a plan of revolt against the Holy See. In fact, on Holy Thursday, whilst the pope was saying the first prayer in the divine service, the leaders of the imperial faction entered the church with the young prefect, and summoned Pascal to confirm the nomination of the people; the holy father did not reply, and continued the service. They then raised their voices and calling on God as their witness, threatened the pontiff with an approaching revolution.

On the next day, the seditious raised a mob and after having sworn not to lay aside their arms until they were victorious, attacked the clergy during a solemn procession, at which the pope was assisting. Several cardinals were seriously wounded. Pascal himself was struck with blows of a club, and he would have been murdered on the spot, if he had not formally pledged himself to ratify the election of Peter during the following week. This promise did not entirely satisfy the prefect. He gave orders to raze the houses of the lords who had declared against him, and even threatened to invade the palace of the Lateran if the pontiff did not proceed immediately to the ceremony of his installation.

Pascal, fearful that he could not resist the mob, judged it prudent to quit Rome, and he fled to Albano. His absence did not, however, suspend the civil war; they continued to fight furiously in the streets of the holy city; all the partizans of the pope were driven out. Convents were pillaged, churches burned, and the massacres did not cease in the country until the time of harvest. When Henry learned the success of his measures, he sent rich presents to the new prefect and the chiefs of his faction, informing them that he would come to Rome to recompense them for their zeal, as soon as he had completed the conquest of the estates of the countess Matilda, who was about to die. In fact he soon advanced towards the holy city at the head of a numerous army, forcing on his way all the small places and castles which held out for the pope.

On entering into Rome, the king of Germany was received in triumph by the prefect and Roman barons; he went to St. Peter's, and demanded the crown from the ecclesiastics, protesting that he had no other desire than to receive it at the hands of the pontiff, whose absence he regarded as a misfortune, since it deprived him of his blessing. He then received the imperial crown before the tomb of the apostle, from the hands of Maurice Bourdin, the metropolitan of Braga, who had been sent to his court some months previously in the capacity of legate, and regulated the principal political affairs with the senate and prefect, after which he repaired to Tuscany, in order to avoid the excessive heat, promising, however, to return at the end of the season, and leaving in Rome, from wise precaution, a large body of German troops.

A few days after the departure of Henry, the Normans, at the instigation of the holy father, made an attack on the city. This first expedition failed completely. Pascal, however did not lose his courage; on the contrary, anger doubled his energy; he made a second effort, entered Rome by the aid of a dark night, and on the next day his enemies were so frightened by his boldness that they submitted to him. The pope drove the Germans from the city and was at once engaged in constructing machines to besiege the fortresses to which they had retired.

At the termination of all these troubles Pascal fell seriously ill, and finding that his end was approaching, he convened the cardinals and bishops in the palace of the Lateran, and exhorted them to bid defiance to the factions of the emperor in the election of the new pope. He died during the same night, on the 18th of January, 1118. His body, embalmed and clothed in the pontifical ornaments, was borne, according to the usual ceremony, by the cardinals to St. John's of the Lateran, and deposited in a sepulchre of marble admirably made.

Pascal was of a perfidious, vindictive, and implacable character; his avarice was extreme, and he would beyond doubt have sold to Henry the right of investitures, if that prince had been rich enough to pay for it.

GELASUS THE SECOND, THE ONE HUNDRED AND SIXTY-SIXTH POPE.

[A. D. 1118.]

History of Gelasus before his pontificate—His election—He is maltreated by Cencius—The faction of the Frangipani makes him a prisoner—He is delivered by the prefect—He is enthroned—He escapes from Rome at the approach of the emperor—Election of the Anti-Pope, Gregory the Eighth.

GELASUS was of Gaëta, and of noble parents, who consecrated him from his infancy to the study of the Holy Scriptures. Ordericus, abbot of Monte Cassino, being informed of the progress which the young clerk was making in the sciences, took him to his monastery, where he soon distinguished himself by his aptitude and skill. He was still very young when Pope Urban ordained him a cardinal deacon, and soon after made him chancellor, charging him to restore to the works emanating from the Holy See, the elegance of style which had been lost in the church since the seventh century.

John of Gaëta, had shown great affection for Pascal, aiding to support him in all his afflictions and seconding him with indefatigable zeal in his plans of conquest over empires. The Jesuit Maimbourg says he was a man of holy life, of consummate prudence and skill, and the most learned of the sacred college.

The Holy See remained vacant for twelve days after the death of Pascal, whilst his funeral rites were celebrating; then Peter of Porto, who had for a long time occupied the first rank in the church, convened the cardinals, bishops and principal clergy in the pontifical palace, to proceed to a new election; in this caucus they agreed to choose Gaëtan pope. The father in consequence, wrote to him, he having retired to Monte Cassino after the death of Pascal, to beseech him to return among them to aid them with his wise councils. John mounted his mule and quitted the convent, ignorant of the decision to which the sacred college had already come. On his arrival in Rome, they re-assembled in a monastery of the Benedictines, called the Palladium, where Gaëtan was proclaimed sovereign pontiff by the name of Gelasus the Second, and enthroned notwithstanding his resistance.

Although this election was made with the greatest secrecy, Cencius, the head of the family of the Frangipani, was informed of what was taking place in the convent of the Benedictines. He immediately sallied in fury from his palace, followed by a band of armed men, broke open the gates of the monastery, and penetrated forcibly into the church in which they were celebrating the ceremony of adoration. He cast himself, like a madman, on the new pope, struck him with his gauntlets, threw him down on the steps of the altar, tore his face with his spurs, and dragged him by the hair to the threshold of the door; he then caused him to be bound and borne by his soldiers to one of the dungeons of his palace. A great number of bishops, cardinals, and even laymen, who assisted at the election, were also arrested by the satellites of Cencius.

This scene of violence exasperated the populace—they assembled in arms—the prefect, Peter de Leon, placed himself at their head, hastened to the capitol, and sent a deputation to the Frangipani to demand the liberty of Gelasus, threatening to sack the palace of Cencius if he refused to give up the pontiff. He, alarmed by the menaces of the clergy, went himself to open the dungeon of the pope, and set him at liberty. Gelasus was immediately placed on a white horse, and conducted in triumph through the streets to St. John of the Lateran, preceded and followed by banners, in accordance with the usage followed at the ceremony of the coronation. On the following day he gave audience to the counts, barons, and ecclesiastics who had business to transact with the Holy See.

These troubles at last appeared to be settled, when on the following night some priests hastened to the palace of the Lateran to warn Gelasus, that the Emperor Henry, whom they thought in Lombardy, was about entering the church of St. Peter at the head of armed men. At the same time they produced a letter from him which contained only these words: "If you confirm the bull published by Pascal, in favour of the investitures, we will recognize you as pontiff, and will take an oath of fidelity to you; if not, another pope shall be chosen, and we will put him in possession of the apostolic throne."

Gelasus who wished to pursue the policy of his predecessors, refused to yield to the wishes of the prince, and resolved to fly from Rome; he embarked on the Tiber, and reached Porto, where he was obliged to stop on account of the bad weather, which prevented ships from putting to sea. The holy father there underwent new dangers, finding himself in the alternative of having his vessel upset or run ashore before the city, from which the troops of Henry hurled poisoned darts at the people of his train. At last the tempest having calmed with the setting of the sun, the galleys ran, under cover of the night, into a covered place, in front of the castle of St. Paul of Ardea. Gelasus could go no further on account of his age and infirmities, and especially the fatigue which he had undergone. The cardinal Hugh d'Alatri, who was very strong, then took him on his shoulders and carried him to the castle. On the following night they disembarked, and two days afterwards arrived at Gaëta, the country of the pontiff.

As soon as the news of the arrival of Gelasus had spread through the province, a great number of bishops came to him: the emperor also sent ambassadors to him to beseech him to return to Rome to be consecrated, and who assured him that their master was very desirous of assisting at that ceremony, and would authorize it by his presence; they added that a single conference would infallibly re-establish concord between the altar and the throne. But Gelasus who had been already imprisoned with Pascal by Henry, was unwilling to expose himself a second time to the word of a king; he replied to the deputies, that he must above every thing else be consecrated pontiff, and that then the king of Germany would find him ready to treat with him wherever he pleased. As he was but a deacon, he was, on the following day, ordained a priest and bishop, in the presence of William, duke of Apulia, Robert, prince of Capua, and several other Italian lords who took the oath of obedience and fidelity to him.

Henry, irritated by the obstinacy of Gelasus, then resolved to cause a new pope to be chosen, and selected Maurice Bourdin, archbishop of Braga, the same who had crowned him emperor during the preceding year. This ecclesiastic was, according to Maimbourg, a wretch who regarded neither laws nor religion, so that he could satisfy his daring ambition. He relates that Bernard, the metropolitan of Toledo, on his return from Rome, during the pontificate of Urban, had taken Bourdin from a monastery of Limousin to ordain him archdeacon of his church; that he afterwards obtained the See of Coimbra, and finally the archbishopric of Braga. Maimbourg adds, that in his measureless ambition, he had aspired to the possession of the See of Toledo, to the detriment of his benefactor, and even went to Rome to confer with the pope on the subject; but that not having offered enough money to the pontiff, his claim had been rejected, and that this refusal was the cause of his hatred towards the Roman church, and his treasons in favour of King Henry, whom he followed in court and camp, where he led a very dissolute life.

Baluze gives a very different account of the life of this bishop, which appears to us to be the most authentic: "Bourdin," says this historian, "after his installation on the See of Coimbra, undertook the holy pilgrimage to Jerusalem, towards the year 1108. He stopped at Constantinople, where he was laden with honours by the emperor Alexis, and formed relations of friendship with several grandees of the empire. He had scarcely returned to Portugal, after an absence of three years, when he was chosen archbishop of Braga, to succeed St. Geraud who had died. This new appointment obliged him to go to Rome to have his translations approved, and to receive the pallium, which Pope Pascal granted to him in consideration of large presents. When Bourdin returned to his diocese, he found himself exposed to the jealousy of Bernard, the metropolitan of Toledo, and legate of the Holy See; he was even constrained to return to Italy to implore the protection of the pontiff against the vexations of the primate of Spain. During his sojourn at the court of Rome, in pursuing this important affair, Pascal, recognizing his superior abilities, appointed him his legate to treat of peace with the emperor Henry, who was in Lombardy: and it was in this capacity that he crowned the prince after the flight of the pope. His condescension having been imputed to him as a crime, he was excommunicated in the council of Benevento, which determined him to attach himself to the person of the king, who caused him to be chosen pontiff on the 14th of March, 1118, by the name of Gregory the Eighth.

GREGORY THE EIGHTH, ANTI-POPE.

[A. D. 1118.]

Letter of Gelasus against the emperor Henry and Gregory the Eighth—The anti-pope is recognized as the lawful pontiff in Germany and England—Gelasus re-enters Rome—Bloody revolt against him—He comes to France—Implores the aid of the Normans—Retires to the monastery of Cluny—His death.

GELASUS was still at Gaëta, when he heard that Gregory the Eighth was enthroned; he immediately addressed the following letter to the lords and ecclesiastics of Gaul: "We inform you my brethren, that after our election, the emperor Henry introduced himself furtively, at the head of his cavalry, into Rome, and obliged us to quit it. This prince pursued us as far as Gaëta, threatening, through his ambassadors, to use his power against us, if we refused to approve of the bull of our predecessors. We courageously replied, that we would do nothing adverse to the liberties of the church; he then placed the metropolitan of Braga on the Holy See, that intruder who had been excommunicated the year before by Pope Pascal at the council of Beneventum. We order you then to prepare to wrest the holy Roman Church, your mother, from the execrable tyranny of the king of Germany” He also wrote into Portugal that they should choose another metropolitan for the diocese of Braga, in place of Maurice; and, finally, he addressed a circular to the clergy and people of Rome, prohibiting all communication with the emperor and the anti-pope, who were both anathematized by the authority of St. Peter.

Whilst Gelasus was using all the resources of policy to excite the French, Spaniards, and other Catholic nations against his enemies, Gregory the Eighth seated himself in the palace of the Lateran, gave magnificent fêtes to Henry the Fifth, renewed the ceremony of the coronation, and consecrated him a second time emperor. The monarch was soon after obliged to return into Germany, whither the interests of his throne called him; Bourdin sent his bulls into every country, and was recognized as chief of the Holy See in Germany by Herman, the metropolitan of Augsburg, and in England by several bishops who regarded Gelasus as anti-pope.

Scarcely was Gelasus informed that the king had returned to his kingdom, when he hastened to re-enter Rome, where his friends had prepared a retreat for him in the church of St. Mary, situated between the palaces of his friends, Stephen the Norman, and Peter of the Lateran. Encouraged by this first success, he resolved to celebrate mass publicly in the church of St. Praxides, in opposition to the advice of several ecclesiastics, who represented to him that this church being located among the dependencies of the castle of the Frangipani, his most mortal foes, he ran the risk of an attempt upon his person. But all advice was useless; he followed the inspiration of his pride, and went to that church. He had but commenced divine service when the Frangipani made an irruption into the church with a numerous band, and attacked Gelasus and his party with stones and darts. Stephen the Norman, and Crescentius Gaëtan, the nephew of the pope, resisted their adversaries vigorously, and protracted the combat for a part of a day. The pope, taking advantage of the tumult, escaped through the presbytery, and escaped from Rome on a poor horse, without having had time to put off his pontifical ornaments. After the flight of the holy father, the combatants separated and retired to their fortified palaces.

On the next day the partizans of Gelasus sought for him and found him, worn out with fatigue, several miles from Rome, concealed behind a grove of trees, in which he had passed the night. They held a council in his presence, as to the measures to be taken under the circumstances, for re-entering the city; but the pontiff, who had scarcely recovered from the fright of the preceding day, stopped them in the midst of their discourse, “No, my brethren, it is better we should follow the example of the fathers, and the precept of the Gospel; and since we cannot live in this frightful Babylon, this abominable Sodom, let us fly into another city.” His cowardice disgusted his friends; no one urged him to change his decision, and they only asked him before going to appoint Peter of Porto vicar of the Holy See in his absence, and to designate a council of cardinals to direct the affairs of the church. He did all that was required of him. He confided the keeping of Beneventum to Hugh, cardinal of the holy apostles, and placed the singers under the direction of Nicholas; he left the prefecture of Rome to Peter, and intrusted the standard of the holy city to Stephen the Norman, the most influential personage of his party.

When these matters were settled, he embarked on the Tiber, and descended it as far as Ostia, where he took another vessel accompanied by six cardinals, twelve noble Romans and an imposing train. He stopped for some days at Pisa, and was received by the bishops of that city, and the principal inhabitants, with great honours; after a fortunate passage he disembarked in Provence at the port of St. Gilles, where the abbot Hugh received him in his monastery. During his sojourn in this abbey the bishops and nobles made him splendid presents. The abbot of Cluny, amongst others, offered him forty horses and their equipages. He received also large sums from Peter of Libranus, who had been sent from Saragossa by Alphonso of Arragon, and who had come to be consecrated metropolitan of that city by the pope himself.

After the ceremony of the consecration, Gelasus gave him a bull by which he granted plenary indulgences to the Spanish soldiers who were fighting the Moors, and to all the faithful who should aid in the conquest of the church of Saragossa, which had been in the power of the Mussulmen for four hundred years. Peter of Libranus found himself authorized by this bull to collect alms from the faithful, and to sell indulgences through the whole kingdom of Spain, on the sole condition of paying over a tenth of the proceeds into the treasury of the holy father. Gelasus was informed in the interval, that the king of England had convened a council at Rouen to regulate the affairs of his clergy; he availed himself of the circumstance to send an envoy into that city to create partizans. The young Conrad, whom he chose as his ambassador, spoke before the fathers with great eloquence; he drew, in a most masterly style, a picture of the miseries of the Roman church, surrendered to the profanation of the anti-pope Bourdin, and the tyranny of the emperor Henry. He represented the virtuous Gelasus as the sole and legitimate successor of the apostles; who had, however, been forced to fly from Italy, and to cross the Alps, to implore the succour of the French princes, and especially that of the king of England. He finished his speech by asking from the faithful of Normandy pecuniary aid to prevent the pope from being reduced to beggary.

As soon as King Louis the Sixth was apprised of the arrival of the holy father in Provence, he deputed to him Suger, a monk of St. Denis, who carried rich presents, to beseech him to go to Vezelay to confer with him on the pacification of the church. In compliance with the orders of the king, Gelasus quitted St. Gilles and went to Cluny, where he was received with great magnificence, as was becoming in lords so opulent as were the monks of that abbey. The prelates and lords of Burgundy also crowded to visit the holy father. He profited so well by their good will, that in less than a month he was enabled to fill all his trunks with rich offerings, and even to send some to Rome to his allies.

At length everything foretold the near triumph of Gelasus over his competitor, when he was attacked by a most violent pleurisy, which reduced him extremely in a few days. He then summoned the cardinals who had accompanied him around his bed, and designated the bishop of Palestine to them as his successor. That prelate, who was present, refused to accept it, observing, that the Holy See had need of a pope who could maintain his authority by great personal wealth and a high temporal position. "My nomination," added he, "would be prejudicial to the interests of the church, and I am unwilling to take upon myself a burthen which I have not strength to bear; I pray you, then, holy father, to elevate to the pontificate the metropolitan of Vienne, who alone can deliver the church from the tyranny of the emperor." Gelasus assented to his views, and ordered an express to be sent for the archbishop, but before the arrival of that prelate his illness increased, so that the pontiff only thought of dying. He made his general confession in a loud voice, before a large number of ecclesiastics and lords, received the communion, laid himself on the earth according to the monastic custom, and in this position died, on the 29th January, 1119, after a reign of a year. He was buried at Cluny, in the church of the monastery.

CALIXTUS THE SECOND, THE ONE HUNDRED AND SIXTY-SEVENTH POPE.

[A. D. 1119.]

Election of Guy, archbishop of Vienna—Council of Toulouse—The Emperor Henry renounces the investitures—Council of Rheims—Conferences of Mousson and Gison—Pope Calixtus enters Rome—Flight of the anti-pope—History of Abelard and Heloise—Punishment of the anti-pope Gregory the Eighth—Calixtus exercises the sole pontifical authority—Council of the Lateran—Complaints against the monks—Death of Calixtus.

Guy, the metropolitan of Vienne, arrived at Cluny fifteen days after the death of Gelasus. He was immediately proclaimed sovereign pontiff by the cardinals and bishops, and consecrated by the name of Calixtus the Second. He was the son of William, count of Burgundy, surnamed the Hard-head, and a relative of the emperors of the West, and the kings of France. His sister Wilhelmina had married Humbert the Second, count of Maurienne, and their daughter Adelaide, the niece of the archbishop, was the queen of France. Thus his election was enthusiastically approved of not only in Italy, but even in Germany. All the prelates of Germany swore obedience to him, and approved of the convocation of a council to be held at Rheims. The emperor himself promised to be present at this assembly, in order to bring about a re-union of the churches.

The holy father, however, judged it prudent to send ambassadors to Henry, to determine the basis of an alliance. Guiliam of Champeaux, bishop of Châlons, and Pons, abbot of Cluny, were sent on this delicate mission. They represented to the prince that it was impossible to establish perfect concord between the Holy See and the empire, whilst the crown preserved the right of investiture. After some conferences, the emperor declared his consent to yield his privilege to the pope, provided an equitable consideration was granted him. He then swore on the Gospels between the hands of the bishop and the abbot, to maintain the integrity of the engagement into which he had entered.

Pons and William, satisfied with the success of their negotiation, immediately returned to the holy father at Paris. Calixtus heard them with an air of incredulity, and exclaimed, "Thank God that the thing was already done." He, however, designated the city of Mousson as the place for the conference, and the definite signing of the treaty. The holy father then went to the council at Rheims, where he found assembled more than three hundred bishops from Italy, Germany, Spain, England, and France, as well as a great number of lay lords of all those countries.

At the opening of the sittings, the pope explained to the fathers the different causes they were called upon to examine. That of King Louis was the first called. He entered the saloon, followed by the principal lords of his court, and seated himself on the platform by the side of the sovereign pontiff. He thus spoke:—"We have come, my fathers, to lay before you the disloyal conduct of Henry the First, of England, who has not only invaded one of our provinces, Normandy, in contempt of treaties, but has even seized the person of one of our vassals, Duke Robert, his brother, and has confined him for some years in prison at London. I have frequently summoned him to give up his prisoner to me, without my entreaties, complaints or threats being able to change his resolve; and you now see by my side William, the son of that noble duke, who comes to implore the aid of your intelligence and justice in recovering his estates."

Hildegarde, countess of Poitiers, in her turn presented herself before the assembly with the ladies of her suite. She accused her husband, count William, of having abandoned her to live in disgraceful commerce with Maubergeon, the lawful wife of the viscount of Châtelleraut. The holy father ordered the count of Poitiers to be loudly called, that he might justify himself before the synod. The bishop of Saintes and other prelates of Aquitaine, his creatures, replied, that their lord was grievously sick. This excuse was admitted by the council, which granted a delay to the count to present himself at Rome, or to retake his wife, declaring him excommunicated, if he refused to obey one of these conditions. They then called up some affairs of minor importance; and then the holy father announced that the sitting was closed. He added:—"We are going to Mousson, my brethren, where the emperor waits for us to treat of the peace of the church. The archbishops of Rheims and Rouen, and some other prelates whose presence is necessary, will accompany us. We beseech you during our absence to address fervent prayers to God for the success of our enterprise. We will soon return to you, and recommence our sessions, before sending you in peace to your homes. Finally, when the council has terminated, we will go ourselves to find the king of England, our spiritual son, and our relative according to the flesh, and will pledge ourselves to put an end to the causes of discord which exist between him and William his nephew, and will inflict a terrible anathema on those who shall be deaf to our words."

Calixtus having arrived at Mousson assembled the prelates of his suite in council, and submitted to them the matters which had been concerted between him and Henry. After this examination, the cardinal of Crema, the bishops of Viviers and Châlons, and the abbot of Cluny were sent with them to the camp of the emperor, that he might give them his definite sanction. Henry at first denied having promised any thing of the kind; when William of Champeaux, no longer restraining his indignation, turned on the prince, called him a traitor and knave, and demanded from him if he were ready to swear on the host, that he had not placed this promise in his hands. The Emperor was obliged to confess that he had given a writing somewhat similar to it; but that he had not reflected that he could not execute the tenor of it without considerably weakening the royal authority. The bishop replied to him "prince, you still seek an excuse for your disloyalty; the pontiff does not pretend to diminish your power; he declares, on the contrary, that all your subjects, no matter of what rank, should follow you to war and serve you as heretofore, as was the custom under your predecessors. Do not think that your crown will be weakened, because you will be prohibited from selling bishoprics; on the contrary your authority will be more respectable in the eyes of the people, when you shall have renounced, of your own free will, a sacrilegious traffic." The emperor then asked time, until the next day, to confer anew with his barons, and to determine them to give their consent to his promise.

Calixtus, despairing of triumphing over the obstinacy of the king, wished to return immediately to Rheims, that he might avoid the snares which the German monarch might lay for him; he yielded, however, to the counsels of the count of Troyes and several other lords, and agreed to remain until the next day, in order to deprive Henry of all excuse from bad will. As soon as day dawned, the bishop of Châlons and the abbot of Cluny returned to the camp, and, having been admitted to the presence of the emperor, said to him "we might my lord have retired yesterday, but his holiness was unwilling to break with you about a delay of a few hours, and he still waits for your subscription to the treaties which are to assure tranquillity to the church. Here are the deeds; no obstacle can now oppose their ratification." Henry replied to the prelates, that they pressed him too urgently to subscribe to the treaty, and that he wished to await the general diet of his kingdom, which alone had power to decide on a question that interested all his lords.

William of Champeaux and Pons at once broke off the negotiations and retired without even taking leave of the prince. After their departure the emperor sent troops to besiege the castle to which the pope had retired: but Calixtus had already quitted the place and taken refuge in an impenetrable fortress belonging to the count of Troyes. Henry then sent a courier to him to urge him to retrace his steps, promising to sign the treaty definitely before the expiration of two days. The pope made this reply to the king. "I have done from a love of peace, that which was never done by any of my predecessors; I left a general council and came to find a man who has not in his heart any disposition for concord. I now retire; if, however, after the synod is terminated, Henry shall have learned that he ought to keep his promises, I will pardon him and receive him with open arms." He continued on his journey and arrived on the same day at Rheims, where he celebrated divine service in the cathedral.

The sessions of the council recommenced on the following day, and John, a cardinal priest, thus informed them of the result of the negotiations with the Emperor: "We went to Mouson my brethren, as we had announced to you, to conclude a peace with King Henry; we found that prince at the head of an army of thirty thousand men, as if he had come to war with numerous enemies. Thus fearing some sinister plans, we closed the gates of the castle in which the holy father was, and presented ourselves only at the camp of Henry. We several times demanded, in the name of the pope, a private interview with the prince, without being able to obtain it; and when at last this favour was granted us, we found ourselves surrounded by soldiers who sought to intimidate us by brandishing their lances and swords. We had, however, gone unarmed, as ambassadors instructed to treat of peace. The emperor spoke to us with a feigned mildness, asking to see the pope that he might render homage to him, he said; whilst we knew he wanted to seize on his person as he had done at Rome on the pontiff Pascal. Finally, all our hopes having been deceived, we hastened to return to Rheims to escape the troops whom the tyrant had sent in pursuit of us."

The fathers having heard this report, approved of the conduct of Calixtus, and passed several canons against simony and the investitures of bishoprics and abbeys. They also condemned the usurpers of the wealth of the church, and prohibited benefices from being bequeathed by inheritance, and the exaction of pay for administering baptism, the holy oil, extreme unction, and sepulture.

In the closing session they sung the hymn of the Holy Spirit; the pope exhorted all those present to concord and submission to the authority of the Holy See; he then caused lighted candles to be distributed to all the prelates who carried a cross. The gates of the church were opened, all the bells of the city were loudly rung, and, by the light of tapers, to the lugubrious sound of the bells, Calixtus standing upon the steps of the altar, pronounced a solemn sentence of excommunication against the emperor Henry, and the anti-pope Gregory the Eighth.

The council having terminated, the pontiff went to Gison to confer with the king of England. Henry the First received him with great honours, prostrated himself at his feet, and took an oath of submission and fidelity to him. Calixtus raised him kindly, and after having embraced him said to him, "As we must by the law of God, restore to every one that which belongs to him, we beseech you to restore freedom to your brother Robert, and the duchy of Normandy to his son." The prince replied, "I have not despoiled my brother of his estates, but I have freed that province, the heritage of my father, from the nobles who covered it with disasters. Monasteries were pillaged, monks massacred, virgins dishonoured, churches were burned, and the unfortunate, who sought an asylum in consecrated places, were massacred. I then came to the aid of this afflicted people; and as I found it impossible to stop the tyranny of the lords without employing the power of the sword, I was forced to make war. God favouring my designs, gave me the victory, and I re-established the reign of the laws and of public security. It was, however, necessary, in order to consolidate peace, that my brother Robert should remain a prisoner in England, where he is treated with all the honour and respect which his rank and the ties of blood demand of me. I have not forgotten that we are brothers, and if he had not taken his son from me, I would have educated him with my own."

Calixtus, satisfied with this reply, granted to King Henry a confirmation of the privileges which his father had obtained for England and Normandy; he promised, besides, not to send into his kingdom, in the capacity of legates, any prelates but those whom he should himself ask for; and, finally, he besought him to restore the prelate Tunstan to his friendship, and re-instate him in the archbishopric of York. But the prince observed that he had sworn upon the Gospels never to receive that metropolitan into favour.—"Is that all?" replied Calixtus. "Do as I ask you, without disquieting yourself; I am the pope, and I permit you to violate your oath."

After this conference, the pope determined to go into Italy to take possession of the Holy See. He went towards the Alps, and entered Lombardy, where the people received him with great veneration. He then traversed Tuscany, and came to Lucca, where the militia gave him a triumphal reception. At Pisa he was received with the same enthusiasm, and he dedicated one of the churches of that city. In proportion as he approached Rome was his cortège increased, by the crowds who came to meet him, and who accompanied his march.

This general manifestation alarmed the partizans of the emperor, and Gregory, who not daring to remain longer in the palace of the Lateran, fled to Sutri, and shut themselves up in the fortress, waiting for succours from Germany. After the departure of the anti-pope, the Roman militia advanced to meet Calixtus, three days march from the city; and when he approached the holy city, the schools, the lords, the magistrates, and the monks, came to receive him at the principal gates, all carrying branches in sign of joy, and singing hymns in his praise. The streets, richly tapestried, were strewed with flowers, and the crowd of people was so great, that the cortège employed ten hours in defiling before the palace.

On the day succeeding his installation, the holy father was engaged in the organization of an army, and the conclusion of an alliance with the Normans, in order to accelerate the ruin of the faction of the king of Germany and of Bourdin. By his care, troops were soon assembled, under the orders of John of Crema, cardinal of St. Chrysogonus, who laid siege to Suri, the residence of the anti-pope. It is related that Calixtus himself directed the labours of the siege, and mounted several times to the assault, with his casque on his head and his sword by his side.

At length, after a vigorous resistance, the German soldiers, decimated by sickness and the sword of their enemies, agreed to surrender, and delivered up Bourdin to his competitor. The pontiff had the cruelty to cause him to be shamefully mutilated by the hand of the executioner. His eyes were put out and his natural parts torn from him. The unfortunate man was placed backwards on a camel, the tail between his hands instead of a bridle, and a sheep-skin, reeking with blood, upon his shoulders, in mockery of the scarlet cape which the pontiffs wore. In this condition he was led to Rome, to prolong his humiliation, and to intimidate by this example of severity, the ambitious who would dare mount the Holy See.

The anti-pope was then confined in the monastery of Cava; the next year he was transferred to the convent of Janula, from which Honorius afterwards took him to confine him in the abbey of Fumon near Alatri, where he passed his days miserably. Such was the end of the unfortunate Maurice Bourdin, a prelate distinguished for his merit, and whose only fault consisted in having wished to place himself between the altar and the throne, at the moment in which these two powers were disputing for the pre-eminence.

In order to bequeath to posterity a monument of his victory, the pontiff caused a saloon of the palace of the Lateran to be magnificently decorated, in which he was represented trampling the anti-pope, Gregory the Eighth, beneath his feet. He caused the palaces of Censius Frangipani, and such other lords as had shown themselves to be his enemies, to be razed; he drove from their castles the Italian counts who devastated the domains of the church, and sought to re-establish an absolute government over all Italy. Having no more enemies to combat, he occupied himself with the religious quarrels of other churches, and sent his legate Conon and the archbishop, Ralph the Green, to Soissons, to judge in council a work on the Trinity written by Peter Abelard, one of the most remarkable dialecticians of the twelfth century.

This extraordinary man, whom his amours have rendered even more celebrated than his vast knowledge, was the son of a lord of a small city called Palais, situated in the neighbourhood of Nantes. He had surrendered himself, from his tenderest youth, with an incredible ardour, to the study of the sciences and of languages. Poetry, eloquence, philosophy, jurisprudence, theology, mathematics, the Greek, Hebrew and Latin languages, in fine, all human knowledge became familiar to him. Having arrived at man's estate, and being desirous of completing his studies, he went to the university of Paris, whose professors were regarded as the best rhetoricians in the world.

Among these, William of Champeaux, the archdeacon of Notre Dame, was styled the prince of scholastic logicians. Abelard studied under him, and profited so well by his lessons, that the master was frequently unable to resolve the subtle questions of the scholar. The teacher was at first attached to his learned disciple, but hatred succeeded friendship when he discovered that his proud pupil gloried in confounding him in argument. William even drove him from Paris. He retired at first to Melun, and then to Corbeil. Some years afterwards, Abelard became reconciled to his former master, and obtained permission to return to the capital to open a school of eloquence. His great talents soon caused all the academies to be deserted; and chroniclers relate that his auditors exceeded three thousand in numbers. The method which he pursued in his course, consisted of the praise of science, and the censure of men who, in these barbarous times, regarded ignorance as a title of nobility. He taught logic, metaphysics, physics, mathematics, and, finally, astronomy. He became the fashionable teacher, because he was the only one who united the science of philosophy with the eloquence of the tribune.

Abelard was much run after by the distinguished women of the day; but Heloise, the niece of the canon Fulbert, was alone able to attract the attention of the professor. Although he was now thirty-nine years old, and she only seventeen, he conceived so violent a passion for her that he resolved to do every thing to gain her love. Historians say he was admitted into the house of the canon as a boarder, by paying a high board, and that he then obtained permission from the greedy old man to educate his niece without receiving any pay therefor. The confidence of the canon was so great, that he not only left the two lovers entirely alone, but even, before leaving home, would recommend to the master to chastise his scholar if she were neglectful of her lessons.

There was no necessity for so great severity to control Heloise, for she responded with equal ardour to the passion of Abelard. These tender lovers passed a whole year in the ineffable joys of requited love. Abelard, formerly so ambitious of glory, so greedy of renown, entirely deserted his school, and consecrated all the time he could to his mistress, and to composing songs in her praise. Heloise herself informs us of these particulars in one of her letters. "Among your brilliant qualities," she wrote to him long afterwards, "you possessed two which moved me more than all the others: the grace of your language and the sweetness of your song; and no other woman would have been less touched than I. The melodies which you composed, in simple measure or in rhyme, had an irresistible charm which compelled me to sing them, on account of the sweetness of the expressions and the softness of their amorous poetry. The most insensible women could not refuse you their admiration; and as your verses celebrated our lives, my name was soon spread through the whole world, and all women envied the happiness of Heloise."

The canon Fulbert at length discovered the criminal intercourse of his niece and Abelard, but it was too late to break off the intimacy of this connection. Heloise carried within her a pledge of their love. According to the chroniclers of the time, the canon wished that marriage should stop the public scandal; but Heloise having declared to her uncle that she wished to be the mistress of Abelard, and not his wife, he became violently enraged, and swore to be avenged. To appease the chagrin of the canon, the two lovers consented to a private marriage, which took place in the presence of the canon and some witnesses. Fulbert, not being yet satisfied with this reparation, demanded that the marriage should be public; and on the refusal of Heloise, retook his plans of vengeance. During the night masked men entered the chamber of Abelard, and whilst four of them held him by the arms and legs, the canon, armed with a razor, subjected him to a horrible mutilation, which separated him for ever from Heloise. Abelard concealed his tears and his shame in the abbey of St. Denis, and Heloise took the veil in the convent of Argenteuil.

Time soothed the grief of Abelard, and he yielded to the solicitations of his admirers, who besought him to recommence his admirable teaching. Soon, as formerly, he found himself surrounded by numerous pupils; but with his success also appeared the envious. Two powerful enemies, Alberic and Leotulph, theologians of Rheims, denounced to the council of Soissons, in 1122, a treatise which he had composed upon the Trinity, and which had been received with general enthusiasm. As unfortunate in his literary career as in his amours, Abelard was condemned by the fathers of the synod, and forced to burn his book in the presence of the assembly. He was then confined at St. Medard, and afterwards at St. Denis, and placed under the supervision of the abbot. Some years afterwards he determined to escape, and retired to Nogent on the Seine, where he built a convent at his own expense, which he dedicated to the Holy Spirit, and which he called the Paraclete, or the Consolation. Heloise, and some other nuns of Argenteuil, came to dwell in this retreat, and it was there that the lovers met for the first time after a separation of eleven years.

Abelard was then made abbot of St. Gildas; but his enemies pursued him even in the silence of the cloisters, and accused him of heresy. The illustrious professor wished to go to Rome to justify himself; but on his arrival at Cluny, the venerable Peter dissuaded him from the journey, and even retained him in the abbey. Two years afterward, worn out by the injustice of men, he determined to finish his days in retirement, and shut himself up in the priory of St. Marcel, near Châlons in the Saône, where he died in 1142, aged sixty-three years. He was at first interred in the convent, but afterwards, at the entreaty of Heloise, his remains were transported to Paraclete.

This unfortunate lover lived twenty-two years longer, mourning him whom she had loved so well. After her death, her body was deposited near that of her spouse; and the chroniclers of the times relate that Abelard opened his arms to receive her when they raised the stone which covered his coffin. Since then a new translation has changed the place of the monument which contained their dust; but the last wishes of Heloise have been religiously respected, and the tomb which has been erected to them in the cemetery of Père la Chaise, still re-unites the two lovers.

Calixtus having affirmed his authority in Rome, was desirous of exercising the most absolute despotism over other kingdoms. For this purpose he gave to a monk of Cluny, named Peter, the legation of France, Great Britain, Ireland, and the Orkneys, for the purpose of subjugating the church of England to the court of Rome, and of re-establishing the affairs of the Holy See in France. But Louis the Fat had already protested against a judgment of the pontiff in the following violent letter: "By suspending the execution of the sentence which you had pronounced against the metropolitan of Sens you have, holy father, moderated our anger. But we are not yet satisfied, for the ambiguity of your decision leaves to the archbishop of Lyons the hopes of obtaining from us the satisfaction he demands. Since I must tell you all I think on this subject, I will avow, that I would rather see my kingdom in flames and my life in danger, than obey that priest.

"We beseech you, then, to preserve to the church of Sens the freedom which it now enjoys, and to prevent it from suffering any harm by the subjection which they would imprudently impose on it. The privileges of a See belong to it, and not to the prelates who govern it, and if the metropolitan of Sens has alone disposed of a property to which he had no right, his church should not be punished for the fault of its chief, and lose the prerogatives of its former freedom. Besides, holy father, be careful lest the city of Lyons, which belongs to the emperor, is not strengthened to our injury; and fear, lest by desiring to subjugate our cities to a foreign jurisdiction, you break the peace which exists between King Henry and our crown. We, moreover, declare to you, that if our wishes were treated with contempt in so simple a matter, we would not longer expose ourselves to the shame of a refusal, nor the scorn of our dignity, but would do ourselves justice."

No reply was made to this letter; the legate of the Holy See only presented himself at the court of France to hold out hopes which were evasive and in conformity with the policy of Rome. The monk of Cluny then went to England, whither he had been preceded by skilful envoys, who knew how adroitly to excite the curiosity of the nation about the ambassador. But the king did not partake of the general disposition, he even sent Bernard, bishop of St. David's, and a clerk named John, to meet the legate, with orders to prohibit his entrance into Great Britain, if he refused to promise not to stop at the monasteries or the churches, and to pay all his own expenses. Peter accepted the conditions which were imposed on him, and went to court in hopes of changing the sentiments of the king. He soon discovered his error. Henry received him with great coldness, and was unwilling to permit him to exercise any act of authority. This prince maintained, with reason, that a legate should make no attempt on the established customs of a kingdom, especially when they were consecrated by the manners of the inhabitants and the wishes of the people. Peter learned that it would be dangerous to enter upon a struggle with a monarch so absolute in his decisions; and, baffled and humiliated, he retook the way to Rome.

If the enterprises of the pope failed in France and England, they were crowned with entire success in Germany. The archbishop of Mayence, by publishing the decree of anathema against Henry, had drawn all Saxony into revolt, and the emperor had been constrained to assemble a formidable army to subdue the rebels. But as the two parties alike dreaded the chances of a general battle, they agreed to enter upon negotiations before coming to blows. For this purpose, twelve lords of each party signed a truce, by which they engaged to suspend hostilities until the termination of a diet of the kingdom, which was fixed to be held on the day of the festival of St. Michael, in the city of Wurtzburg. The assembled at first discussed a mode of putting an end to the schism which separated the churches; they then decreed an absolute peace through all Germany, ordering the belligerent parties to restore, under penalty of death, all usurped property, whether by ecclesiastics, princes or lords. On the subject of the excommunication of the emperor they decided that the bishop of Spire, and Arnold, abbot of Fulda, should go to Rome to refer it to the pontiff, and obtain the convocation of a great council, in which this important matter should be definitely judged.

These ambassadors discharged their mission with great zeal; they entirely changed the hostile disposition of the pope, and took back with them as legates, Lambert, bishop of Ostia, Gregory, a deacon, and Suxon, a priest, with full powers to assemble a synod and relieve Henry from the excommunication if he would renounce the investitures.

A general diet was convened anew at Worms, for the month of September, 1122, and after a conference of ten days it agreed upon the following: "We, the legates of the Holy See, grant to the emperor the power of causing the bishops and abbots of the kingdom of Germany to be chosen in his presence, without employing violence or simony, and under the auspices of the metropolitan and co-provincial prelates. The elected shall receive from the prince the investiture of the regalia by the sceptre, and not the ecclesiastical regalia, and he shall perform such duties to his sovereign as are imposed on him by his title of subject. By virtue of this treaty we grant to Henry a durable peace, and the same to those who embraced his side during the unhappy times of our discords."

The prince in turn replied by a writing, in which he thus expressed himself: "For the love of God, and the holy Roman church, of Pope Calixtus, and the safety of our soul, we renounce the privilege of investitures by the ring and the cross, and we grant to all the churches of our empire, canonical elections, and free consecrations. We restore to the Holy See the lands and royalties on which we have seized during our divisions, and we promise our assistance to the pope to recover those on which our subjects have seized. We will also restore to the churches, lords, and citizens the domains which are in our possession. Finally, we grant an entire and durable peace to Pope Calixtus, the holy Roman church, and all those who have aided it during our discords."

These two deeds were read and exchanged on a plain on the left bank of the Rhine, where tents and an altar had been erected. Thanks were then returned to God, and a solemn mass celebrated by the bishop of Ostia, at which he admitted the emperor to communion, and gave him the kiss of peace. He also gave his absolution to the troops who surrounded them, and to all those who had taken part in the schism. Thus the pope and the king cemented their union, after having devastated Germany and Italy, and murdered the people of Saxony, Bavaria, Lorraine, and Lombardy, for half a century, for a miserable quarrel about investitures.

Deis says, on this subject, "We see clearly, that matters which overturn states and cost so many tears and so much blood to the people, are but puerilities or pretexts employed by the ambition of priests and kings. From the time of Charlemagne to Henry the Fourth, investitures were given by the cross and ring, as a matter of perfect indifference to the state and church; but under this last emperor, the popes thought of making of the cross and ring a sacred palladium, which the impure hands of laymen could not approach; and by the assistance of this futile pretension, they overthrew society, increased their wealth, and murdered more than three millions of men."

During the following year, (1123), the pope held a new council in the palace of the Lateran, to confirm the treaty concluded with Henry, and to prohibit the usurpation of the property of the church, particularly that of Beneventum. They granted to the crusaders who should go to Jerusalem, an entire remission of sins; they declared their houses, families, and property under the protection of St. Peter; they prohibited laymen, under penalty of anathema, from carrying off the offerings which were placed on the altars of the churches, and they interdicted to the lords the right of fortifying churches, so as to make them fortifications; and, finally, they condemned in general all the alienations made without the consent of the clergy. They ordered abbots and monks not to visit the sick, not to celebrate divine service outside of their monasteries; and not to call in other prelates than their diocesan bishops to administer the holy oil, to consecrate clerks, and to dedicate new monasteries.

The bishops who composed this assembly, complained strongly of the monks, and thus expressed themselves: "The glory of the canons and of other ecclesiastics, has been entirely obscured, since the monks, departing from the rules of their orders, seek, with an insatiable ambition, the privileges of the bishops, and refuse to live by the labour of their own hands, as the rules of St. Benedict prescribe. They possess churches, lands, and houses; they levy dimes and oblations on the faithful, and, finally, there is only left to them to take from us the cross and the ring, in order to have completely despoiled us."

After the termination of this council, the pope, always alive to the consolidation of the authority of the Holy See, sent into France as his legates, Gregory, a cardinal, and Peter de Leon, who convened several synods at Chartres, Clermont, Beauvais, and Vienne to confirm the acts of the council of the Lateran. But at the moment, when the holy father, having arrived at the apogee of his power, was congratulating himself on the success of his policy, he was suddenly attacked by a violent fever which carried him off in a few hours. He died on the 12th of December, 1124, after a pontificate of five years and ten months.

HONORIUS THE SECOND, THE ONE HUNDRED AND SIXTY-EIGHTH POPE.

[A. D. 1124.]

Preliminaries to the election of Honorius—Celestin, chosen pope, is forced to abdicate—Schism in the monastery of Cluny—The abbots Peter and Pons go to Rome to be judged—Pons is confined in a tower by the order of the pope—Honorius turns the sincere piety of the prior Mathew into derision—Schism in the convent of Monte Cassino—The treasurer Nicholas chosen abbot—He robs the treasury of the convent—Honorius causes another abbot to be chosen—War between the pope and Count Roger—Affair of Stephen bishop of Paris—Death of Honorius.

On the death of Calixtus, two factions were immediately formed for the election of a pope; Leo, of Frangipani, wished to elevate Lambert, bishop of Ostia, to the pontificate, and the other party demanded the cardinal, Saxon of Anagina. The adroit Leo, in order the more easily to deceive the cardinals, employed a very singular ruse; he feigned to abandon his protégé, and on the eve of the election, went very mysteriously to the residence of each cardinal, to engage their chaplains to go to the conclave, on the following day, with a red cape concealed under their black ones, in order to be able to clothe their masters with it, thus leaving each of them to suppose he would be chosen pope. On the following day, all the prelates assembled in the chapel of St. Pancrace, in the palace of the Lateran; Leo of Frangipani was alone absent. They proceeded, however, to an election, and on the proposal of Damian and Jonathan, they clothed with the red cape, Thébald, a priest of St. Anastasius, who was proclaimed pope by the name of Celestin, amidst the acclamations of the nobles, and despite the active opposition of the cardinals, who all counted on the papacy.

At last quiet was restored, and they were even commencing to sing the Te Deum, in sign of rejoicing, when suddenly the Frangipani entered the church with their partizans, exclaiming, "Lambert, bishop of Ostia, is pope by the will of St. Peter." They immediately clothed him in the pontifical ornaments, and ranged themselves around him, with their drawn swords in their hands. Then the venerable Celestin, fearing the deplorable consequences of a combat in the church, devoted himself for the safety of all. He advanced between the two parties, despoiled himself of the cape and purple, and yielded the tiara to his rival, who took the name of Honorius the Second.

Notwithstanding the voluntary renunciation of the throne of the apostle by Celestin, the ecclesiastics, the people, and the majority of the lords continued to regard him as the sole pope, and declared the election of Honorius to be irregular and sacrilegious. The latter discovering this state of affairs, employed all his resources to create partizans to himself; he made rich presents to the cardinals, distributed money to the people, showed himself gracious to the principal citizens of Rome, and pushed his hypocrisy so far as to publish that he wished to renounce the papacy. He accordingly convened all the electors in the church of St. John, of the Lateran, and laid down the tiara in their presence, seven days after he had been proclaimed pontiff. The assistants, deceived by this trick, and being fearful, besides, of introducing a dangerous precedent into the elections by nominating a new pope, declared him to be the lawful chief of the church. The cardinals, nobles, and people, accordingly prostrated themselves at his feet and swore obedience to him.

The pontiff was originally from the county of Bologna; his parents were poor farmers, who had placed him when very young in the cathedral of Bologna, where he distinguished himself among the young clerks by his love for study and great regularity of morals. The metropolitan having conceived an affection for him, had ordained him arch-deacon of his church, and afterwards pope Pascal called him to Rome, where he consecrated him bishop of Velletri or Ostia. As soon as he reached the pontificate, he sent Otho, bishop of Bamberg, to accelerate the conversion of the people of Pomerania, who were governed by Bratians. This mission was entirely successful, thanks to the duke of Poland, Boleslaus the Third, who forced the Pomeranians to embrace the Christian faith by massacring them by thousands.

In the following year (1125), the church was strongly agitated by a schism, which broke out in the abbey of Cluny. The former superior of the monastery, Pons, had some time before laid down the abbatial baton to undertake a pilgrimage to the Holy Land, not from devotion, but in the hopes of becoming archbishop or governor of a province of Palestine. His desires not being realized, he resolved to return to Italy, and stopped in the diocese of Treviso, where he built an oratory some miles from that city. He lived in this retreat with extreme rigour, praying, fasting, and imposing on himself the most rigorous macerations. His hypocrisy on this occasion, however, not having yet drawn to him the honours which he believed to be due to his great merits, he determined to return to his old monastery. He then wrote to France to obtain the expulsion of Peter his successor, and pledged himself to his partisans to distribute among them the wealth of the convent, if they would reinstate him in the dignity of abbot. His intrigues having created powerful protectors for him, he went secretly to Cluny, and taking advantage, one day, of the absence of the abbot Peter, he entered the convent and drove out the prior Bernard, a venerable old man, and the monks who refused to submit to his authority; he then gave up the monastery to pillage, he took the crosses, the chalices, the candelabras, the reliquaries, caused them to be melted into ingots, and drew from them enormous sums which he distributed to the lords of the vicinage and the men at arms who had joined his cause.

Once master of the abbey, he employed himself in reducing the farms and country houses which were dependent on it; his efforts were turned principally against the prior Bernard, who had taken refuge in the fortified oratories with the monks, who held out for the abbot Peter. This war of the monks lasted for an entire year; at length Honorius being advised of all these disorders, sent the cardinal Peter Defontaines as his legate into France, who pronounced a terrible anathema against Pons and his partisans, enjoining on them to go to Italy with the abbot Peter to be judged by a council.

The intrepid Pons went to Rome accompanied by some nobles of his faction; Peter, his competitor, came, having with him Mathew, the prior of St. Martin des Champs. But as Pons was excommunicated, and consequently, by the canons, incapable of appearing for judgment before the pope, a legate said to him, when introducing him into the council chamber, that he ought to prepare to receive absolution. The proud abbot, raising his voice, replied, "I have nothing to do with your absolution, since no man living, I care not what is his rank on earth, has power to excommunicate me; since I have received plenary indulgences for my sins, past, present and to come, by undertaking the journey to the holy land; the apostle alone can judge me when I shall present myself before him to be introduced into the kingdom of Heaven."

Honorius was indignant at such a reply, as were all the Roman ecclesiastics who were present, and he flew into a rage with the abbot, calling him a schismatic, an heretic and antichrist; he caused him to be put out of the hall. They then demanded from those who had accompanied this monk, if they wished to imitate his example, or do their duty by asking pardon from the Holy See, in order to be relieved from the censures which had been pronounced against them. All declared that they were ready to give entire satisfaction to the holy father, and presented themselves at the palace of the Lateran, with naked feet, covered with ashes, striking their breasts and crying for mercy. Having received absolution, they were admitted to plead their cause; the prior Mathew spoke the last in favour of the abbot Peter, and he made himself remarked for his profound erudition and eloquence.—After the pleadings were over, the pope retired with his cardinals to a privy council, to deliberate on the matter.—At the end of some hours, they returned to the great hall, and the bishop of Porto pronounced the following sentence:—"The holy Roman church deposes for ever from every dignity, and all ecclesiastical functions the usurping, sacrilegious, schismatic, and excommunicated Pons; it restores the church of Cluny, the monks and all the dependencies of the convent, to the abbot Peter, here present, who has been unjustly despoiled of them."

This judgment was loudly applauded by the assistants, and those who had separated from Peter immediately came to make their submissions to him; thus was checked the schism which had scandalized the holy abbey of Cluny. Pons alone wished to protest against the decision of the fathers; he was then confined in a tower, where he died some months afterwards of a contagious malady, and in final impenitence. — The pontiff, however, caused him to be honourably interred from regard to the frock of the monks.

Honorius retained the prior Mathew, whose talents he admired, about his person, and created him bishop of Albano; this new dignity did not change the habits of the monk, he continued to lead the chaste and sober life of the convent in the midst of the luxury of the court of Rome, notwithstanding the sarcasms of the pope, who turned the holiness of the prelate into ridicule, calling him his anchorite, and snubbing him that he had not like the other bishops, mistresses, palaces and horses.

Scarcely was the dispute of the monks of Cluny terminated, when a new schism broke out in another celebrated abbey, the monastery of Monte Cassino. This time the pope was the author of the deplorable division. Whilst Honorius was but the simple bishop of Ostia, when flying from the persecution of the anti-pope Gregory the Eighth, he had taken refuge in this convent, and had besought the abbot, Oderisus the Second, to grant him, as an asylum, a priory which was dependent on the monastery, as his predecessor, Leon de Marsique, had obtained. Oderisus refused this demand, through fear, lest as a consequence, the prelates of Ostia might use it as a precedent to seize on this cloister. Lambert retired in fury, and from that moment vowed an implacable hatred to the abbot.

On the day succeeding his advent to the pontificate, he demanded from Oderisus a considerable sum for the wants of the Roman church. The latter, who was a cardinal, replied, that not having participated in the election of their master, he ought not to contribute to his support. Honorius, exasperated at this new insult, summoned the abbot to appear immediately before him at the castle of Fremona, where he was with a numerous court, and there, in the presence of his cardinals, in a public audience, he reprimanded him severely; he accused him of dissipating the property of the monastery in shameful debauchery; reproached him with bearing the casque and the sword more frequently than the mitre and the cross, and finally treated him as a rebel, and drove him from the assembly. Not content with having subjected the abbot to such an humiliation, Honorius, on his return to Rome, subjoined false witnesses, who presented themselves with Adenulph, count of Aquin, the mortal enemy of Oderisus, and affirmed before the council of the holy father, that the abbot, in contempt of the canons, exercised the papacy in his monastery. The bishop of Terracina was immediately sent to Monte Cassino, to order the abbot to come to Rome, and reply to the accusations against him; he refused to obey. The holy father then assembled a council, and after having three times called the rebel with a loud voice, and no one having replied, he pronounced a sentence of deposition against him. The abbot, without disquieting himself about this pontifical decree, continued to sit in the chair of his church, with the cross in his hand, which led to his excommunication, and that of those who supported him.

This last censure divided the monks and the people of the city of St. Germain, a dependency on the abbey, into two parties; their minds became excited; they flew to arms, and after several bloody combats, the people having become masters of Monte Cassino, constrained the monks to drive out Oderisus, and choose another abbot. They elected Nicholas, who was the treasurer of the convent. But the pope, whose only intention was to seize on the riches of the monastery, disapproved of this election, under the pretext that Nicholas had been promoted to the dignity of abbot at the close of a sedition, and he ordered the fathers to proceed to the nomination of another superior, whom he designated to them. Nicholas, foreseeing that his reign would be of short duration, wished to use the time to advantage; he filled several chests with money, and embarked for Greece with the treasures of the convent. His flight was so skilfully executed, that the monks did not even know of it until it was too late to seize the robber.

Honorius caused the prevost of Capua, named Seignoret, to be elevated to the place of Nicholas, and wished to compel him to take an oath of obedience to him; but the monks forcibly opposed this new pretension, which placed the keys of Monte Cassino under the dependency of the bishops of Rome, and openly violated their privileges. The holy father despairing of overcoming their resolution, at length consecrated the new abbot, only exacting from him a large sum of money.

Shortly afterwards, William, duke of Apulia, having died without children, Roger, count of Sicily, his great uncle and heir, came to Salernum to be recognised as sovereign prince by the inhabitants, and to be consecrated by Albanus, bishop of Capua; he then went to Reggio, where he was proclaimed duke of Apulia, after which he returned to Sicily. His vanity not being yet satisfied with the title of duke, he sent ambassadors, laden with rich presents, to Honorius, to obtain the title of king and the investiture, by the standard of the provinces which William had possessed, promising, in return for this favour, to surrender to the Holy See the cities of Troies and Montefosco. The pontiff, who had for a long time aspired to the possession of the provinces of Apulia and Capua, profited by this step of the prince to establish it as a principle that Roger was not the lawful heir to the estates of his nephew, since he had taken possession of them before having received the investiture from the Holy See, and he rejected his demand.

Roger, indignant at this reply, which unveiled all the ambitious views of the court of Rome, resolved to punish the pontiff; he immediately levied troops, invaded the territory of Beneventum, and advanced as far as the Campagna of Rome, devastating all the domains of the church. Honorius, on his side, judging that the moment was favourable for seizing on Apulia, went to Capua, where he consecrated prince Robert, who had entered into secret engagements with the Holy See. After the ceremony the pope harangued the people; he represented Roger as the enemy of religion; he dwelt on the evils he would inflict on the faithful, and swore, with horrid imprecations, that he would never receive him into favour. He finished by shedding a torrent of tears, and imploring the aid of those around for his own defence and that of the church. He promised a plenary indulgence to those who died in this expedition, and a simple indulgence to those whom death spared.

Roger, in defiance of the ecclesiastical thunders, continued his march across Apulia, but retiring towards the mountains, and shunning the army of the pontiff, which was superior in numbers to his own. The duke hoped by these tactics to fatigue the troops of the pope, who, being new recruits, could not long endure the fatigues of marches and counter-marches. His predictions were verified. The partizans of the holy father, tired of keeping the field, and suffering from want of provisions and clothing, were obliged to disperse and return to their homes. Honorius seeing his forces almost reduced, by the desertion of his soldiers, to only the bands of Robert, determined to regain Beneventum. Roger, in his turn, took the offensive and blockaded him in the place. After the trenches had been opened some days, he summoned the pope to surrender himself a prisoner, or grant him the investiture of Apulia. The holy father, before a danger so imminent, forgot the oaths which he had taken never to pardon him; he sent him the standard, and the treaty of peace was signed on the 22d of August, 1128.

Honorius, on his return to Rome, found ambassadors from Robert de Senlis, the chancellor of France, who, four years before, had been elevated to the dignity of metropolitan of Paris. They were instructed to bear to the pope the complaints of their master against the king, Louis the Fat, whom he accused of sustaining the disorders of the French clergy, by extracting from them benefices prejudicial to ecclesiastical liberty. Stephen even accused the prince of having seized on the property of his church, and of having even wished to murder him, by his soldiers, at the moment he was leaving his palace. Honorius replied to him, that he should immediately lanch a decree of anathema against the sovereign, and place the kingdom of France under interdict. The metropolitan obeyed the Holy See, and drew to his party the bishop of Sens and a large number of prelates.

Alarmed at the consequences of a revolt of the clergy, the king immediately sent ambassadors laden with rich presents to Rome, who bought from the Holy See the absolution of the anathema and the suspension of the interdict, after which he was able to continue his persecution of Stephen, and the dilapidation of the churches. Saint Bernard and Geoffrey, bishop of Chartres, addressed eloquent letters to the court of Rome on the same subject, but they were unanswered. Stephen of Senlis discovered that the justice of his cause would always be despised if he did not fortify his complaints by a large sum of money; he then collected all his resources, sold the chalices of his church, borrowed from the Jews on pledges of the sacred ornaments of the metropolis, and sent to Rome four thousand deniers of gold in exchange for the protection of the pope. Honorius did not resist so conclusive an argument; he granted authority to Stephen to assemble a council at Rheims, to judge the king of France, and to anathematise him in the name of the apostle, if he refused to restore the property he had seized. Louis did not wish to encounter the bishop of Paris again; he perceived that it was better in this matter to have a good understanding with him, and peace was made between them without the intervention of the pope.

Soon after this the holy father became very sick, and as he felt death approaching, he was carried to the monastery of St. Andrew, where he died on the 14th of February, 1130. His remains were deposited in the church of the Lateran.

INNOCENT THE SECOND, THE ONE HUNDRED AND SIXTY-NINTH POPE.

ANACLET THE SECOND, ANTI-POPE.

THE cardinals and principal citizens of Rome, seeing the end of Honorius approaching, and being desirous of preventing the disorders which took place at the election of the pontiff, agreed to assemble secretly in the church of St. Mark, and proceed together, in accordance with the canons, to the election of a new pope. But the chancellor Aimeri and some other cardinals of his party, fearful of losing the influence which they had in the government of the church under Honorius, resolved to nominate a pontiff who was devoted to their interests and would retain them in their honours and dignities. For this purpose, as soon as Honorius had expired, and before even making public his death, they hastened to choose as his successor Gregory, cardinal of Saint Angelo, and having clothed him in the pontifical ornaments, they conducted him to the palace of the Lateran, and proclaimed him the supreme chief of the church, by the name of Innocent the Second.

The Roman lords, the other cardinals and bishops, furious at this great knavery, in their turn assembled with the people in the church of St. Mark and elevated Peter, the cardinal of St. Mary of Trastevere, to the dignity of sovereign pontiff, by the name of Anaclet the Second. Platinus endeavours to show that this second election did not take place immediately, but some months after, on account of the war which the pope wished to make on Duke Roger, who claimed the title of king of Naples and Sicily, and also the sacerdotal as well as political authority over these two provinces, by virtue of the privilege granted by Urban the Second to the countship of Sicily. "Innocent," adds he, "not only rejected the pretensions of Roger, but even endeavoured to take the city of Naples from him. It was a very common thing in that age to see popes at the head of armies plunge their cruel hands in Christian blood to satisfy their insatiable ambition. But this expedition was not fortunate, and the holy father, with three of his cardinals, fell into the power of the count, who retained them prisoners until the pope had decided to confer on him the royal crown of Naples and Sicily. It was during the captivity of Innocent that the Romans elected Pope Anaclet the Second. . . ." This version is not true, and it is impossible to find it in the chroniclers to whom Platinus has referred us.

Innocent the Second had been in early life a monk of St. John's of the Lateran, then abbot of the convent of St. Nicholas and St. Primitivo, which was located without the walls of Rome. Urban the Second had ordained him a cardinal deacon, and Calixtus the Second had sent him to France as his legate. Arnulf affirms that he always evinced extreme regularity of morals, and that he joined to great affability, mildness, eloquence, and an evangelical humility. According to this historian Innocent wished twice to renounce the pontificate, to put an end to the schism, but the cardinals who had chosen him, prevented him from putting his good designs into execution.

Anaclet, the anti-pope, was the grandson of a converted Jew, who had been baptized by pope Leo the Ninth; this Jew, by his talents and great wealth, became very powerful at the court of Rome; his son, Peter de Leo, still further increased his credit and reputation by serving the Holy See usefully in the quarrel about the investitures. As a recompense the popes gave to him the government of the Tower of Crescentius, or Castle of St. Angelo, and increased his fortune by marrying him to the heiress of one of the most powerful families of Rome. He had several children by his marriage, of whom Anaclet was the eldest; he destined him for literature and sent him to the University of Paris as a student.

After passing some years in the schools, the young Anaclet finding himself called to a religious life, went to the abbot of Cluny, who admitted him into the number of his monks. At the entreaty of his father, Pascal the Second afterwards called him to his court and created him a cardinal. During the pontificate of Calixtus he was sent to France with Gregory in the capacity of legate, and he exhibited in several councils an imperious character, which gave a foresight into what he would in the end become. In fact, as soon as he was nominated as Pontiff, he pursued his competitor to extremities, drove him from the territories of the church, and obliged him to take refuge with the Frangipani, whose fortresses placed the unfortunate Innocent beyond the reach of his wrath. Not being able to reach his enemy in his inaccessible retreats, he turned his rage upon the Romans, drove out the clergy from the church of St. Peter, carried off the sacred ornaments, as well as the statues of gold and silver, pillaged the church of St. Maria Majora and the other temples which were esteemed the richest. As he could find no Christians impious enough to lay a sacrilegious hand upon the tabernacles, he called to his aid the ancient co-religionists of his family and caused them to break to pieces the pixes, chalices, and crucifixes, which were converted into gold and silver money. These depredations considerably increased his private fortune, which came from the inheritance of his father, and the exactions which he had committed at the court of Rome and in his legations; he was thus enabled to bestow largesses on his partizans and to subsidise assassins.

Innocent was soon forced to quit Italy, to avoid falling into the power of his cruel enemy. He embarked secretly on the Tiber with several cardinals, reached Ostia rapidly, from whence he went to Pisa, where he was received with all the honours due to his dignity. The holy father remained for some time in this latter city to regulate the ecclesiastical affairs of Tuscany, and to choose the ambassadors whom he sent to the kings of Germany and France, to inform them of the schism which had broken out in the holy city.

Anaclet, on his part, displayed all the resources of his policy, and was prodigal of the basest flatteries to princes and lords, to induce them to recognise him as the lawful pontiff. He addressed the following letter to Lothaire the Second, the successor to Henry the Fifth, after having reminded him of the former friendship which united their families:—"Dear prince: We have been canonically elected and consecrated by the bishop of Porto, before the altar of St. Peter, in the presence of other prelates, before all, and with great solemnity; whilst the schismatics chose their pope in darkness, and were compelled to fly from Rome during the night, to conceal their shame, and shun the wrath of the people. As we have been chosen by all the Romans, clergy and laity, we freely exercise the pontifical functions, and consecrate bishops and cardinals without difficulty. Do not, then, grant your confidence to the ex-chancellor Aimeri, that robber-priest, that shameless and simoniacal wretch; no longer place confidence in the soft words of John of Crema, who is an infamous man, a veritable Nicolaite; but be convinced by the voice of the people, which designates us as the sole, true, and lawful successor of the apostle." He joined to his letter a bull of the clergy of his party, signed by twenty-seven cardinals, the archpriests, abbots, dean and suffragan bishops of Rome. "We write to you," said they, "as well as to the other princes of the East and West, to dissipate the calumnies of the schismatics, who accuse the pontiff Anaclet the Second of not having been chosen canonically, and of having seized upon the Holy See by violence, and with effusion of blood."

In the embarrassment in which he found himself, in regard to which of the two popes was the usurper, Lothaire took the wise part of replying to no one. Anaclet, annoyed by his silence, wrote to him again, by the prefect and principal lords of Rome, in the name of the whole city. He complained of the contempt Lothaire had shown for the Holy See by not answering his letter, and pledged himself to take him under his protection, if he himself desired to be recognised as emperor of the Romans.

Whilst he was thus seeking to assure himself of the support of Germany, he sent into France Otho, bishop of Lodi, with the title of legate, and charged with several letters, in which he reminded the king of the friendship with which he had honoured him in his youth, and of the affectionate cares with which he had laden him. Another legate, Gregory, a cardinal-deacon, was sent into Aquitaine, to remit to the abbot and monks of Cluny, the sentences of anathema pronounced against those whom he called schismatics; that is, against all those who refused to recognise his authority. Finally, other ambassadors were sent to John Comnenus, emperor of the East, and to the bishop of Drivasto, in Albania, as also to the king of Jerusalem.

But all these embassies resulted unfavourably. In Italy only were the intrigues of Anaclet fully successful. The greater part of the lords took the oath of obedience and fidelity to him. He even concluded an alliance with Duke Roger, to whom he gave his sister in marriage, granting to him the title of King of Sicily, and the right to be crowned by the metropolitans of his kingdom. He surrendered to him, besides, the principality of Capua and the lordship of Naples; and he authorised the archbishop of Palermo to consecrate the prelates of Syracuse, Girgenti, Mazaria, and Catania, without the approval of the court of Rome. This bull is dated on the 27th September, 1130, and forms the first authentic title of the royalty of Sicily.

Whilst the anti-pope, sustained by the arms of his brother-in-law, caused himself to be recognised, either willingly, or by force, in all the provinces of Italy, Innocent had embarked at Pisa, and gone towards the coast of France. He disembarked at St. Gilles, in Provence, and from thence went to Viviers, then to Puy, in Auvergne, and finally to Clermont, where he held a council, at which Eribert and Conrad, archbishops of Munster and Salzburg were present. The pope then went to Cluny to thank the monks who had sent him, on his disembarkation, sixty horses, with suitable equipages for himself and his cardinals. Innocent remained eleven days in this opulent retreat, where he dedicated a new church which was built in honour of the apostle St. Peter. This solemn reception by the monks of Cluny gave him a great preponderance throughout all France, and even in Germany, where his election was adjudged to be canonical.

During the sojourn of the holy father at the abbey of Cluny, king Louis sent Suger, abbot of St. Denis, to present him his best compliments. He then went himself, with the queen and princes, as far as St. Benedict, on the Loire, to meet the pontiff. As soon as he perceived Innocent, he dismounted from his horse, prostrated himself at his feet, took an oath of obedience and protection to him, and pledged himself, by oath, to overthrow the enemies of the church, and exterminate the schismatics. Saint Bernard, the celebrated abbot of the Citeaux, was then sent to the court of Henry of England, to induce him to recognise Innocent. The pious monk was received with great coldness, which taught him, that the English prelates, corrupted by the gold of Anaclet, had already alarmed the king by threatening him with eternal damnation. Bernard was at last able to overcome the scruples of the prince, by reasoning, and in a last audience to convince him by saying to him—"What do you fear my lord? Is it to burn in hell for having recognised the pope? Fear not; only think of obtaining pardon from God for your other sins; I take that to my own account." The king of England had no reply, and at once recognised the pontiff. On the next day he assembled an imposing train and went as far as Chartres to meet Innocent.

All had been prepared in advance for this first interview; Henry, following the example of the king of France, prostrated himself at the feet of the holy father, and swore filial obedience to him in his own name and that of his people. He then conducted him in triumph to the city of Rouen, where the pope received considerable presents from the king, the lords, and the Jews. During his sojourn at Rouen, the holy father received from his legate Ganthier, the metropolitan of Ravenna, the proceedings of the council of Wurtzburg, which informed him of the favourable turn his affairs were taking in Germany, and at the same time a letter from king Lothaire and the prelates of his kingdom, who besought him to go to Liege to preside over an assembly of Saxon, German, Bavarian, and Lorraine bishops and lords which was to be held on the 22d of March, 1131.

Innocent went at once on the invitation of the prince, who came to meet him, three miles from Liege, with the queen his wife, and a numerous train of priests and nobles. It is related that Lothaire accompanied the pontiff as far as the cathedral, holding in one hand a rod to keep off the people, and with the other leading his horse. After the celebration of divine service, the pope went to the council to preside over its session; but Lothaire, who had intended to profit by the division in the church to regain the right of investiture, wished them above all to deliberate on this important question, and urged the holy father to restore to the crown a privilege which had been wrested from the emperor Henry, by the necessity of the circumstances.

At this proposal the cardinals, and the pontiff himself, grew pale, fearful lest they had fallen into greater danger at Liege, than that which they had so fortunately shunned at Rome. All were silent and bowed their heads. Saint Bernard, indignant at the cowardice of the pope, alone spoke; he remonstrated with the king of Germany on the dangers of a new strife between the altar and the throne, and forcibly represented to him, that he would commit an irremissible crime by reducing the churches, and compelling the prelates to become simoniacs. Lothaire, moved by the eloquence of the monk, desisted from his pretensions, only exacting a promise from the holy father to crown him emperor in the cathedral at Rome. All the conventions having been agreed on and signed, the council terminated its sessions, and Innocent returned to France to celebrate the festival of Easter at St. Denis, as he had engaged to do. Suger went in procession at the head of the community to receive him, and on Holy Thursday the pope solemnly officiated.

Three days afterwards Innocent performed a magnificent ceremony which was called the largesses of the presbytery. We find the following details of this day in the chronicles of Suger: "On the next day as soon as the light appeared, the pope left the abbey mysteriously, and went to St. Denis de l'Estrée with his suite. The cardinals were all clad in their Roman ornaments. The pope, wearing a tiara, bordered and adorned with a circlet of gold, enriched with precious stones, advanced mounted on a white horse covered with scarlet housings; the cardinals, wearing their violet coloured mantles, followed him, two and two, mounted on horses whose reins and trapping were of glittering whiteness; then came the barons, the vassals of the church of St. Denis, and the Castellans, who marched on foot and served in turn as squires to the pontiff. Heralds at arms preceded them with large baskets filled with pieces of gold and silver, which they scattered freely among the crowd which pressed around the cortège. When the pope was near St. Denis, the nobles, the principal magistrates of Paris, and even the rabbis and wealthiest of the Jews, advanced to meet him to do him homage. Having thus passed on, he reached the great church through streets hung with tapestry and strewed with flowers, where gold, silver, and precious stones glittered around. Innocent celebrated a solemn mass, assisted by the abbot, gave his blessing to the people, and returned to the monastery with his magnificent train. All the walls of the convent were adorned with rich hangings, and the saloons had been transformed into refectories to receive the guests; they first ate the pascal lamb, half reclining in the ancient fashion: the festival then proceeded according to the usage of ordinary ceremonies."

After the three days of Easter, the pope came to Paris to thank the king, and to ask permission from him to travel through France. This permission having been granted to him, he started immediately on his journey. He ransacked pitilessly the churches and monasteries, under the pretext that they ought to defray the expenses of his court, and his avidity threatened to ruin the southern provinces entirely; when, fortunately for the people, he was arrested in his exactions by the death of Philip, the eldest son of the king, who was killed by a fall from his horse, at the age of fourteen. The monarch wrote to the pontiff to retrace his steps immediately, to convene a general council at Rheims, and solemnly consecrate Louis, his second son.

Innocent obeyed the prince, and fixed the time of this assembly for the 18th of October in the same year. The assembly was composed of thirteen metropolitans, two hundred and sixty-three bishops, and a great number of French, English, German, and Spanish abbots, clergy, and monks. The pope first caused his own election to be approved by the council, and excommunicated Anaclet; he then decreed seventeen canons of ecclesiastical discipline, which present nothing of importance. At the second session Louis entered the assembly, accompanied by his relative Ralph, count of Vermandois, and several other lords of his kingdom; he explained in a few words the sad accident which had snatched prince Philip from him, and besought the assembly to proceed to the coronation of his other son. The holy father replied to the prince, exhorting him to submit himself to the immutable will of the King of kings and Lord of lords, after which he gave the royal unction to Louis, the second son of the French monarch.

At the end of the ceremony, the archbishop of Magdeburg presented to the pontiff letters from Lothaire, in which that prince declared that he was disposed to invade Italy. Hugh, the metropolitan of Rouen, also produced letters of obedience from king Henry of England; and Spanish ambassadors came to offer like letters, written by the two sovereigns of the Iberian peninsula. Innocent received these marks of submission with feigned humility, and replied to the ambassadors of the different sovereigns that he was preparing to re-enter Italy to obey them.

Before, however, crossing the Alps, as he well knew the power of gold over the Roman clergy, he determined to make some fresh visits to the monasteries, to place them under contribution. For this purpose he went to Clairvaux, where he was received with great respect by the monks who came to meet him poorly clad, and carrying a wooden cross. This ostentation of poverty discontented Innocent, and his deception was still greater when he saw the church without any ornaments; the saloons of the convent, the refectories, the dormitories, destitute of furniture, and when they told him that gold and silver were proscribed in that retreat. Black bread, milk, and herbs, were served up to the cardinals and the train of the pontiff, whilst some boiled fish, which were regarded by the good fathers as a very choice dish, were reserved for the holy father. Innocent did not sojourn long in the abbey; and on the same day he went to Cluny, and celebrated the festival of the purification of our Lady. On the next day, he confirmed the privileges of this monastery, particularly the immunity of the place which guaranteed it against the violences of the lords. He also granted to Saint Bernard, for the abbey of the Citeaux, and in consideration of the services which the abbot had rendered him, a new charter in the following terms:—"We prohibit all Christians, under penalty of anathema, whatever their rank, from exacting, or even receiving from you and your brethren, dimes for the lands which you cultivate with your own hands, nor dimes for your beasts, declaring your congregation entirely freed from such servitude."

Before quitting France, Innocent imposed on all the clergy a kind of tribute, under the name of cueillette, for the pious work of the conquest of the apostolic throne. At last the holy father entered Lombardy by the mountains of Genoa, and came to Placenza, where he convened in council the prelates of that province, whilst waiting the arrival of the troops of king Lothaire; the assembly confirmed the election of Innocent, and the prelates took the oath of fidelity and obedience to him. As soon as the pope was apprised that Lothaire had entered Italy, he pursued his route, entered Tuscany, and established himself at Pisa. By his exertions, the inhabitants of this city concluded a peace with the Genoese, and swore to submit to his decision in regard to the difficulties which had caused the war. Saint Bernard, who had followed the pontiff in his new journey, was the mediator of this treaty. He negotiated the peace with great skill, and determined Innocent to put an end for the future to any return of the difficulty, by erecting the city of Genoa into a metropolis, as was the city of Pisa, and to give the pallium to the bishop Syrius, with three prelates of the island of Corsica as his suffragans.

Lothaire joined the pontiff at Pisa, accompanied by only two thousand horsemen. Notwithstanding the weakness of this army, they both decided to march on Rome, the one being impatient to seat himself in the chair of the apostle, the other to be crowned emperor. After a march of two days they encamped beneath the walls of the holy city, near to the church of St. Agnes, whither Thèbald, the prefect, and some nobles, came to receive them. Anaclet, fearing treason, retired with his partizans into the fortified houses of Rome, and abandoned the palace of the Lateran to his competitor, who immediately installed himself there. On the next day, Innocent proceeded to the consecration of the emperor Lothaire, and the empress Richilda, his wife; but he was constrained to perform this august ceremony within the church of the Saviour, because the anti-pope remained master of the church of St. Peter, and the greater part of the quarters of Rome.

Before receiving the crown, Lothaire swore, as usual, to preserve safe the life and limbs of the sovereign pontiff and his successors, to defend the Holy See, to maintain the pope in the enjoyment of the regalia of St. Peter, and to use all his power to re-establish him in the provinces which had risen against him. Innocent, on his side, engaged not to excommunicate the prince, and to surrender to him the usufruct of the domains of the countess Matilda, for himself, his daughter, and his son-in-law, Henry, duke of Bavaria. This deed is dated on the 8th of June, 1133.

Anaclet remained for some months confined in his towers, from whence they hurled darts and stones at the people of the emperor, without permitting their own to come to an engagement; he obstinately declined any conference with the prince, and would not listen to any proposition, tending to cause him to abandon his dignity. As Lothaire had not sufficient force to reduce the castle of San Angelo, and the other fortresses of the anti-pope, nor to engage King Roger, who was advancing with a numerous army, to deliver Anaclet, he was obliged to return towards Germany and abandon the holy father. The latter not being longer in safety in the holy city, after the departure of the prince, was obliged to return to Pisa, where he assembled a new council. His competitor, Anaclet, was anathematized for the fourth time, as were all his defenders, especially Roger, king of Sicily, whose kingdom was declared to be under interdict. The pope also excommunicated the Milanese, to punish them for having followed the party of Anaclet, and for having declared in favour of Conrad, the usurper of the crown of Italy. Such is the justice of princes! Lothaire had pardoned his rebellious subject and received him to his friendship; whilst the destruction of the unfortunate city, which had been led into rebellion, had been sworn. The Milanese having no other resource to save their city and their lives, than to submit to Pope Innocent, declared themselves subjects of St. Peter; they wrote to Saint Bernard to beseech him to become the mediator between them and the pontiff, and entreated him to come to Milan to take off the anathema pronounced against the city.

The holy abbot, in his reply, congratulated them on their return to the unity of the church, and the desire which they evinced to restore peace to their province; he excused himself for not being able to go immediately to them, and assured them he would come as soon as possible. In fact, when all the proceedings of the council of Pisa had been expedited into different kingdoms of the East and West, Saint Bernard went to Milan, accompanied by Guy, bishop of Pisa, and Mathew the prelate of Albano, to give to the inhabitants absolution from the anathema they had incurred. This ceremony was celebrated with great solemnity, and all the people took the oath of obedience and fidelity to the sovereign pontiff.

During the following year, (1135), Lothaire returned into Italy at the instigation of Innocent, to confer with him on the means to be employed to extirpate the party of Anaclet, and especially to detach King Roger from his alliance with the anti-pope. They consulted on this important matter with Saint Bernard, who was the pillar of the church, and who possessed the art of causing strange paradoxes to be admitted as incontestable truths. The latter engaged to write a circular letter to the schismatics, and to bring over the largest part of the partizans of Anaclet to the holy father. All these intrigues met with no great success, but it was the absolute want of money which led to the ruin of the anti-pope. His court became deserted; his festivals were no longer resplendent as in the first days of his power: his servants badly clothed, appeared enfeebled by forced abstinences, and the sad state of his dwelling announced his approaching fall.

Innocent, informed by his spies of the penury of his enemy, resolved to march a second time on Rome, and was preceded by the son-in-law of the emperor, who commanded three thousand horsemen. On his way, the pope carried by assault the cities of Albano and Beneventum, seized even on the famous monastery of Monte Cassino, and obliged the ecclesiastics, lords, monks, and people of that province, to take the oath of obedience to him.

Whilst the pontiff was conquering Campania, the emperor was chasing Roger from Apulia and Calabria. Innocent rejoined him with his army in the city of Bari, where the ambassadors of John Comnenus, emperor of the East, who had been sent to the camp of Lothaire, to congratulate him on his victory over the king of Sicily, waited for him. Unfortunately for the holy father, there was among them an audacious monk, who publicly censured the conduct of Innocent, and cast discredit on his court. In his preaching he maintained, that the pope was a Pagan Emperor, and not a Christian bishop, and affirmed that the Roman clergy was heretical.

Bernard endeavoured, uselessly, to strive with the monk; the latter turned on the holy abbot himself, and demanded from him for what motive he had abandoned his convent, instead of consecrating himself solely to prayer, and a renunciation of the world, to live in solitude as he had vowed; he reproached him for living in camps, in the midst of combats and disorders; he accused him of prevarication, adultery, and sodomy. "What then, false monk," said he, "darest thou defend this pope, whose hands, armed with the sword, are red each day with the blood of his brethren? and, instead of anathematising such a wretch who wishes to usurp the Holy See, thou art the first to rise up to shield his infamies by that sacrilegious falsehood . . .” Several historians affirm, that the emperor, alarmed by the declamations of the Greek monk, had resolved to abandon the side of the pontiff to embrace that of his competitor, but he was suddenly seized by an unknown malady, which carried him off in two days; he died in a cottage near the city of Trent, on the night of the 3d and 4th of December, 1137.

When this was known, Roger re-assembled in haste a new army, invaded Apulia a second time, carried fire and blood every where, sacked the cities, pillaged the churches, and put the inhabitants of Capua to the edge of the sword. He then marched on Beneventum, which submitted and recognised the anti-pope anew. But Anaclet had not the satisfaction of seeing his triumph; for whilst his protector was advancing on Rome by forced marches, he died of poison. He was secretly interred by his friends, who feared lest Innocent should pursue his vengeance on the dead body of his victim.

Arnulph represents the anti-pope as an infamous man, who was soiled by the greatest crimes; he accuses him of all kinds of excesses and debaucheries, and even of incest with his sister, the wife of Roger. After his death, the schismatics, by the orders of the king of Sicily, chose the cardinal Gregory as sovereign pontiff; but they soon renounced their schism to avoid the fate of the unfortunate Anaclet, and made their submission to Innocent, who received them graciously, and loaded them with presents. The new anti-pope, abandoned on all sides, in his turn left the camp of Roger during the night, and came to seek Saint Bernard to beseech him to obtain his pardon; the abbot conducted him immediately to the palace of Innocent, who pardoned the past and re-instated him in his old dignity.

Thus terminated the schism on the 29th of May, 1138; the strife between the popes had lasted eight years; it had filled Italy with blood, ruined France, and carried off from Germany the elite of its people. Innocent was at last victorious over his enemies and absolute master in Rome.

His first care was to convene a general council, at which more than a thousand bishops were present. In this assembly Rome was declared to be the capital of the world, and the pontiff the supreme dispenser of ecclesiastical dignities. The canons of the council of Rheims were confirmed, and particularly the one against tournaments; the ordinations made by the anti-pope Anaclet, were declared null, and the pope terminated the session by a terrible sentence of excommunication against King Roger and all his partizans.

After the termination of the synod, Innocent assembled some troops and marched against his enemy, whom he met at the foot of Monte Cassino. Both parties sent deputies to propose a treaty of alliance, in order to avoid the effusion of blood, but as the negotiations were long drawn out, the son of the king, at the head of a thousand horse, made a skilful counter-march, took the army of the pope in flank and made him prisoner.

Roger treated the holy father with the greatest respect, and proposed to him peace in exchange for his liberty; the latter not daring to refuse any thing to his conqueror, invested him by the standard with the kingdom of Sicily, gave Apulia to his eldest son, and the principality of Capua to the younger. The two princes took the oath of fidelity and obedience to him on their knees, as was the custom. Innocent then received permission to go to Beneventum, where he was received as if he had been St. Peter himself; he at length re-entered Rome on the 6th of September, 1139.

It is believed that it was during this year that Leo Styriot, the patriarch of Constantinople, condemned in a council the heretical work Chrysomalus, at the entreaty of John Comnenus, who wished by this step to restore the unity of the Eastern and Western churches. But the Greeks persisted none the less in their hatred to the Latins, and the emperor found himself, notwithstanding his opposition to it, dragged into a war with the Christians of the West.

Several historians place at this time the new interdict, which was lanced against the kingdom of France, on the occasion of the election of Peter of Chartres, archbishop of Bourges, who was consecrated by the pope without waiting for the consent of Louis the Young. The king, irritated at the audacious prelate, sent troops into Berry, ravaged the province, destroyed the cities, and compelled Peter of Chartres to take refuge with Thibault, count of Champagne. The intrepid archbishop, in his turn, raised troops, placed himself at their head, gave battle to the army of the king and re-conquered his metropolis. Louis the Young threatened to invade Berry a second time with new armies; Peter of Chartres wrote to Rome, and claimed the aid of the Vatican. Louis was deposed and excommunicated by the authority of St. Peter, and the kingdom of France placed under interdict. In that age, the consequences of an anathema were terrible to kings, and Louis hastened to recognise the archbishop of Bourges, that the holy father should take off the sentence of excommunication.

In Italy, Arnold of Brescia, a disciple of Abelard, commenced preaching on the effeminate lives of the priests and the disorders of the monks. This bold man, the precursor of reform, spoke strongly against the ecclesiastical debauchees; he reproached them with their sordid avarice, their unrestrained love of grandeur, their hypocrisy, and their lubricity; at last, by his eloquence, he raised a powerful party against the clergy. The holy father endeavoured, but in vain, to annihilate him with the thunders of the Vatican; but his doctrines had touched men's minds, and they spread through all the cities with incredible rapidity. Rome especially, divided between the two parties of the Guelphs and Ghibelines, embraced with ardour the doctrines of the excommunicated; the citizens rose against the pope, assembled in the capitol and re-established the ancient institution of the senate, which had been abolished for some centuries.

Innocent was so chagrined at not having been able to arrest the effects of a revolution which struck so severe a blow against the pontifical authority, that he was attacked by a dangerous sickness, to which he succumbed on the 24th of September, 1143. He was interred in the church of St. John of the Lateran.

CELESTINE THE SECOND, THE ONE HUNDRED AND SEVENTIETH POPE.

[A. D. 1144.]

Election of Celestine—Letter of the pope to Peter, abbot of Cluny—Reply of the monk—Death of Celestine after a pontificate of five months.

On the very day of the death of Innocent, the Guelphs, the partizans of the popes, and the Ghibelines, the supporters of the emperor, disputed for the right of choosing a new pontiff; but during their discussions, the people and principal magistrates of Rome elevated Guy of Castel to the pontifical throne, and proclaimed him by the name of Celestine the Second.

As soon as he was installed on the throne of St. Peter, the new pope addressed a letter to Peter, abbot of Cluny, with whom he was on terms of friendship; he informed him that his election had taken place in the church of St. John the Lateran, amidst the acclamations of the clergy and people; and that he had only accepted the chief dignity in the church to reform the disorders of the Italian ecclesiastics and monks. Peter, in his reply, encourages the holy father to repress with severity the licentiousness of the priests, and bestows great eulogiums on Arnold of Brescia; he finishes his letter by announcing to the pontiff that he will undertake the journey to Rome to renew their former friendship. But he could not realize this plan, for the pope Celestine died on the 9th of March, 1144, after a reign of five months and a half; he was buried in the church of St. John of the Lateran.

Some months before the death of Celestine, the patriarch Michael Oxitus renewed in the east the persecution against the Bagomiles, who had been already proceeded against, during the reign of the emperor Alexis Comnenus. Their doctrine taught that the oldest son of God, named Satanael, having revolted against his father, had drawn very many angels into rebellion; that having been exiled to the earth for this crime, he had created all things visible, and deceived Moses by giving him the old law; that God the Father had afterwards engendered a second son called Jesus Christ, who came to destroy the power of Satanael, and to shut him up in the abysses of hell, taking from his name the angelic syllable, so that he was now called Satanas. According to the Bagomiles, the incarnation of the Word, his life upon earth, his predictions, his passover, his death, his resurrection, were but deceitful appearances, and they regarded it as a folly to make them religious dogmas.

Michael found that the most expeditious mode of arresting the progress of the heresy, was to hand over the monk Niphon, the head of the doctrine, to punishment. By his orders they tore from the poor monk, one by one, all the hairs of a magnificent beard, which fell even to his sandals; they put him to torture, plucked out his eyes, and then made him mount the scaffold.

LUCIUS THE SECOND, THE ONE HUNDRED AND SEVENTY-FIRST POPE.

[A. D. 1144.]

Election of Lucius the Second—His history before his pontificate—Truce with King Roger—Differences between the archbishop of Tours and the bishop of Dol—The primacy of Toledo—Consequence of a revolt of the Romans against the papacy—The citizens seize on the revenues of the city—Letters from the pope and the seditious to the Emperor Conrad—He listens favourably to the envoys of the pontiff—Lucius places himself at the head of his troops, and besieges the Roman senators in the capitol—He is slain by a stone in the mêlée.

On the day succeeding the death of Celestine, the cardinals and nobles of the Guelph faction, having secretly assembled in the palace of the Lateran, chose, without the participation of the clergy and people, Gerard, a cardinal priest of the order of the holy cross, as sovereign pontiff, and consecrated him by the name of Lucius the Second.

This pontiff was from Bologna, and had been destined to the ecclesiastical state from his infancy. Honorius had brought him to Rome, on the recommendation of one of his relatives, and made him a cardinal and librarian of the church. Gerard afterwards reconstructed the church of his order, augmented its revenues by extortions, and founded there a community of regular canons. Innocent the Second, who knew his skill, created him chancellor after the death of Aimeri; he afterwards made him chamberlain, and confided to him the guardianship of the treasury of St. Peter.

Instead of seeking by prudent conduct to cause his fraudulent election to be forgotten, he showed himself to be proud, avaricious, vindictive, and sought to re-establish the pontifical despotism in Rome. Before, however, entering upon an open contest with the people, he judged it prudent to assure himself of the protection of the emperor, and the other princes of Italy. He first concluded a truce with Roger, king of Sicily, whom he induced, by the payment of an enormous tribute, to send him the aid of the royal troops to subjugate the Romans to his odious tyranny; he then sent embassadors to the kings of France, England and Germany, to implore their aid.

Whilst his legates were on their way to the different courts of Europe, the holy father appeared to be entirely occupied in restoring harmony between the prelates of Gaul and Spain. He terminated the differences which had existed since the pontificate of Urban the Second, between the Sees of Tours and Dol, in relation to the jurisdiction of the bishoprics of Brittany, which Hugh, the metropolitan of Tours, had always claimed, by virtue of the ordinance of Pope Urban, without being able to obtain it. Innocent the Second had given, some time before, to Geoffrey the prelate of Chartres, his legate, full powers to settle it: but the death of the pontiff having prevented the matter from being definitely arranged, the bishop of Dol obtained a new reference to the Holy See, to have a definite judgment pronounced. Lucius published the following decree on this subject: "We have examined in council the title of the metropolitan of Tours, and particularly the bull of our predecessor Urban; and after having advised with our bishops, cardinals, abbots and lords, we have invested, by the episcopal baton, the archbishop Hugh, with the right of absolute jurisdiction over all the prelates of the province of Brittany. We, however, declare that our brother Geoffrey, chief of the clergy of Dol, shall, so long as God shall spare his life, govern his diocese, without being responsible to any other authority than that of the Holy See; and we send him the pallium in recompense for the obedience he has always shown. Done at the palace of the Lateran, on the 13th of May, 1144."

Lucius rendered a second judgment in favour of the metropolitan Raymond of Toledo, to whom he accorded the primacy over all Spain, and the churches which had lost their prelates in consequence of the invasion of the Saracens. In the same session he received from the archbishop the deed by which Alphonso, Duke of Portugal, agreed to pay to the court of Rome an annual tribute of four pounds weight of gold, in exchange for the title of king.

But, if foreigners appeared submissive to the Holy See, such was not the case with the Romans, who showed themselves each day more hostile to the papacy. At last the preaching of Arnold of Brescia excited their spirit. A new revolution broke out; the people assembled in arms, declaring themselves to be independent of the jurisdiction of the pontiffs, and appointed a patrician to govern Rome. This eminent dignity was bestowed on Jourdain, the son of Peter de Leo. All the citizens took an oath of fidelity to him, as if he had been absolute sovereign, and in the same manner that their ancestors had done to Charlemagne and Otho the Great. The senate then went in a body to the palace of the Lateran, and reclaimed from Lucius all the regal rights on which the popes had seized; and declared to him, that in future he must content himself for his support with the offerings of the faithful, as the gospel commanded, and the bishops of Rome had practised for more than six centuries. Jourdain also seized the revenues of the city, appointed officers to replace the creatures of the pope, and administered justice in the name of the citizens.

The holy father and his cardinals wished to oppose these dangerous innovations. As they were destitute of force, they were constrained to yield to the wishes of the people. Lucius sent new legates to the emperor Conrad, with letters filled with flatteries and falsehoods, in order to induce that prince to come to the aid of the Roman church. The senate, on their side, informed of the secret measures of the pope, sent ambassadors to the court of Germany, with letters written by the principal Ghibelines. "We are desirous," said the senators to the prince, "to re-establish the Roman empire, as in the days of Constantine and Justinian, that it may be worthy to have you for its supreme chief. We have taken by force the fortified houses and towers of the lords who refuse to recognise your authority. Some have been razed: the most important are still standing, and ready to receive your troops. We beseech you to establish your residence in our city, because you will be able to rule with an absolute authority over all Italy; and you will be able to chastise the insolence of the priests, who have so often turned your kingdom upside down. Finally, we consider it our duty to inform you, that Lucius has made a treaty with Roger, king of Sicily; that he has given to him the baton and the pastoral ring, the dalmatics, the tiara, and the sandals; and the right to be no longer dependent on the Holy See in ecclesiastical affairs."

Conrad the Devout refused to admit the deputies of the Romans into his presence, and gave no reply to the letter they had sent him. On the other hand, he received the legates of the pope with great honour; among whom were Guy of Pisa, the cardinal-chancellor, the most consummate statesman of the age. Guy obtained from the emperor an assurance of his protection, and permission to levy a numerous army for the defence of the church.

But their minds were in such a state of exasperation at Rome, that the pope, excited by the Guelphs, did not even wait the return of his envoys. He hastily assembled some troops, placed himself at their head, and went to attack the senate in the capitol. It is related, that Lucius, axe in hand, himself struck the gates of that edifice to break them, and that they were already shaking beneath his blows, when he fell, struck by a stone in the forehead. He died on the next day, the 3d of February, 1145, after a pontificate of about a year.

During his pontificate, appeared a very remarkable work, by Peter of Cluny, the celebrated friend of Celestine the Second. It was divided into two parts: the first was a refutation of the errors of Mohammed; the second was composed of the statutes for the government of the convents of his order, whose discipline was very much relaxed, if we are to judge by the statutes themselves. The following are some of them:

"The monks of Cluny are prohibited from eating water-fowl and wild ducks on Fridays, under the plea that these birds are aquatic. They are prohibited, after the evening repast, from using hypocras, that is, wine mixed with sugar, honey, and spices. They are prohibited from making more than three repasts a day; from wearing ornaments and precious stuffs; from having more than two domestics; and from remaining in the parlors with young women during the hours of night. They are prohibited from playing for gold, raising monkeys, and retiring to the cells with the novices under the pretext of instructing them to pray. They are prohibited from receiving young monks, without the special authority of the abbot, because it might fill the abbey with vagabonds and infamous debauchees.

"The abbots should endeavour to re-establish manual labour, as soon as possible; because it is deplorable to see to what extent idleness prevails in the cloisters. These residences, which the pious Saint Benedict reared to moralise Christian society, have abandoned the holy mission of their founder, and become the dwelling of corruption and infamy...."

EUGENIUS THE THIRD, THE ONE HUNDRED AND SEVENTY-SECOND POPE.

[A. D. 1145.]

Election of Eugenius—Arnold of Brescia again returns to Rome—He induces the Romans to revolt in the name of liberty—The pope escapes from the holy city—He then takes refuge at Viterba—Deputation from the bishops of Armenia—Second crusade—The pope returns to Rome—He escapes again and takes refuge in France—Combat between the officers of the pope and the canons of St. Genevieve—Ill success of the crusade—Council of Paris against Gilbert of Poree—Condemnation of Eon de l'Etoile—The king of Castile accuses the pope of having sold the title of king of Portugal to Henriquez Alphonso—Journey of Eugenius to the abbey of Clairvaux—Treaty between the emperor and the pope—New dissension between the two sovereigns—Jourdain of Ursini is sent into Germany as legate—Origin of archbishoprics in Ireland—Death of Eugenius.

AFTER the tragical end of Lucius the Second, the patrician Jourdain, the senate and the people, met to choose a pope favourable to the new revolution. But the cardinals had already secretly assembled in the convent of St. Caesar, and proclaimed the abbot, Peter Bernard, sovereign pontiff, by the name of Eugenius the Third. This monk, born at Pisa, had been at first vidame of the cathedral of that city; he then took the monastic habit at Clairvaux, under the direction of Saint Bernard. Afterwards, Atenuiph, abbot of Farsa in Italy, having asked from the saint for some monks to found a community of the order of the Citeaux, Bernard of Pisa was sent to him, with several French monks. Pope Innocent brought them to Rome and gave them the church and abbey of Saint Athanasius.

Bernard had been for several years the abbot of his convent, when they came after him to conduct him to the palace of the Lateran. The cardinals and bishops, desirous of accomplishing the ceremony of the consecration, had already made all their preparations in the church of the apostle, when a deputation from the senate came to summon them to break off an election which had been made without their consent, and to choose, in conjunction with them, a pope who would take an oath to obey the laws, and maintain the new constitution. The cardinals asked for time until the next day to give their reply, but during the night they escaped from Rome with the pontiff, and took refuge in the fortress of Monticello.

On the next day, Eugenius was conducted by them to the monastery of Farsa, where he was consecrated on the following Sunday, the 28th of February, 1145. After the ceremony, he returned to the holy city, determined to strive against the partizans of popular liberty, and to employ force to subjugate the Romans to the yoke of the Holy See; but he found, that during his absence a redoubtable adversary had introduced himself into the place. It was the famous Arnold of Brescia, who had come to Rome a second time, to defend the interests of the people.

This intrepid reformer preached in the streets, in the public places, and exhorted the citizens in the name of the ancient republic, to reconquer the liberties which had rendered their fathers the masters of the world. He adjured the people to break the debasing yoke of popes and priests; he loudly announced that the time was come in which ecclesiastics and monks should really renounce the world to be engaged in the things of God, and that if they refused to follow the precepts of the gospel they should be constrained to do so. His eloquent discourses animated their minds; the Romans ran to arms, attacked the palace of the Lateran, and were on the very point of forcing the pontifical residence, when they learned that Eugenius had escaped beyond the walls by a secret outlet, and had reached Viterba in the disguise of a pilgrim. The populace then turned their rage towards the supporters of the tyranny; the palaces of the cardinals, bishops and nobles, who had declared in favour of absolutism, were pillaged, burned, and sacked. The crowd then went, armed with lances and clubs, to the church of St.

Peter; the offerings of pilgrims, which were destined for the pope, were distributed to the poor, and the priests, who wished to resist this act of justice, pitilessly massacred.

Calm succeeded this first outbreak; a new oath of fidelity was taken to the patrician by the senate and the magistrates; all with one accord, decided that they would repel by force princes or kings who should again pretend to subjugate them to an infamous theocracy, which, for eleven centuries and a half had soiled Rome by its incests and assassinations.

Whilst the people, by a return of energy, were re-establishing their old freedom, Eugenius was holding his court with his cardinals at Viterba, and receiving an embassy from the patriarch of Armenia. The clergy of that country sent to consult the Holy See, in regard to several points of ecclesiastical discipline, and as to several ceremonials in their ritual, which differed from those of the Greek church. The pope received the deputies with great honours; he even celebrated a solemn mass at their desire, and caused them to be placed in the sanctuary, that they might observe all the details in the performance of divine service. A legend relates that God exhibited his power on this occasion, and permitted one of the ambassadors to see, at the moment of the elevation of the host, a luminous aureole behind the head of the pontiff, and two doves at his side—an incontestible proof, adds the pious legendary, of the infallibility of the Holy See and the holiness of Eugenius!!

Otho, prelate of Frisingen, who relates the same fact, was then at Viterba, and pretends that he spoke to the ecclesiastic for whom God had accomplished this miracle. In his work he gives an account of the interviews he had on this subject with Hugh, bishop of Gabale, in Syria, one of those who had laboured the hardest to reduce Antioch to the See of Rome; he also repeats the complaint of the prelate against his patriarch and the mother of the prince of Antioch, who refused a dime of the spoils taken from the Saracens.

Hugh informed the Holy See of the pleasant news, that a Nestorian prince, called priest John, celebrated for his bravery and his victories over the Persians, was coming to the aid of the church of Jerusalem. The pious bishop shed floods of tears whilst relating the miseries of the Christians of the East, and of the cruelties which the infidel practised against them; he besought the pope to promise him to cross the Alps, to implore the assistance of the kings of Germany and France. But it was not necessary to excite the fanaticism of the French for the Holy Land; king Louis had already held a general assembly of the clergy and nobility of his kingdom, and declared that he desired to undertake a crusade in person, to blot out from the eyes of God, the massacre of the inhabitants of Vitry, in Pertois, and the horrid cruelty he had shown in burning alive the unfortunate persons who had taken refuge in the church of that city.

Eugenius received the deputies of the king with great honour, and sent them back laden with presents for their master; he gave them also a bull for the French nation, by which the holy father commanded the people, in the name of the apostle, to take up arms in defence of the church, and follow their lords in the holy enterprise of the crusades. He accorded plenary indulgences for all past and future crimes, to those who should obey his orders; he placed their wives, children, and property under the protection of the Holy See, and gave them permission to mortgage their fiefs to the churches, to raise the money necessary for their journey. At the same time he addressed an apostolic brief to Saint Bernard, ordering him to preach the crusade in France and Germany, and to engage the people, kings, and lords, to take the cross for the remission of their sins. The eloquence of the abbot brought out one hundred and fifty thousand fanatics, who sold their property to go to Asia, to perish by famine, pestilence, or the sword of the Mussulmen.

Hainaut relates, that the words of Saint Bernard were heard as orders from Heaven. "It appears," added he, "as if this extraordinary man had received from God, power to govern the mind; he was seen to sally from his desert to appear in courts without mission, without title. The simple monk of Clairvaux was more powerful with the king than the abbot Suger, the first minister of France, and he preserved over pope Eugenius, who had been his disciple, an incomprehensible ascendancy. Saint Bernard was not, however, as skilful a politician as he was a great orator"

Whilst the crusaders were rising at the voice of Bernard, the pope was dreaming of annihilating the followers of Arnold of Brescia; for this purpose he levied numerous troops, made a treaty with the Tiburtines, the declared enemies of Rome, and went in person to besiege the apostolical city. The unfortunate inhabitants, soon reduced to the last extremity, were constrained to implore the clemency of the holy father, and engaged to abolish the patriciate, to re-establish a prefect of his choice, and to recognise that the senators only held their authority from the pontiff. Not content with having reduced them beneath his sway, Eugenius exacted that the people should come to meet him, carrying branches, and that the senators should prostrate themselves at his feet and kiss his sandals. He then made his entrance by the gate of St. Peter; but as he feared some attempt at assassination, he shut himself up in the castle of St. Angelo.

His sojourn in the holy city was not of long duration; the faction of Arnold having regained its strength, obliged him once more to leave Rome, and even quit Italy.

Whilst the pope was flying disgracefully, and coming to seek an asylum in France, Louis the Seventh was assembling a parliament in Burgundy, to have Ralph of Vermandois, his brother-in-law, and the abbot Suger, recognised as the regents of the kingdom in his absence. On this occasion Saint Bernard delivered a very remarkable discourse to obtain mercy for the Jews of France and Bavaria, whose general massacre had been resolved upon, in order to draw down the blessing of God on the Christians. Then the king, his wife Eleonora, and a great number of lords and nobles, received the cross at the hands of the abbot of Clairvaux.

This crusade resulted deplorably, especially for the emperor Conrad, and the army which he led into the holy land. Notwithstanding the prophecies of Saint Bernard, who had announced victories and conquests to the crusaders, almost all perished on the way, and those who returned from Palestine found their property seized by the clergy.

"This war," says the historian Fra Paolo, "was only advantageous to the pope, who employed the troops which went to Jerusalem in the conquest of provinces adjoining the Roman church. Besides, the large sums of money which were wrested from the superstition of the faithful, and chiefly from women and other persons who could not go to combat in the holy land, were not scrupulously employed in the crusade; the pope, the bishops, and the princes, adjudging the greater part to themselves."

Before the departure of the Christians for Syria, Eugenius held a general council at Treves, where the works of Saint Hildegard were examined. All the fathers of the council were astonished at the wisdom exhibited in the writings of this young nun, and addressed a letter to her to urge her to publish all that the Holy Spirit had revealed to her in its divine inspirations. In the same assembly, Henry, abbot of Fulda, having been convicted of having abandoned the care of his church to secular persons, in order to abandon himself to mundane pleasures, was deposed and anathematized. After the termination of the synod, the holy father went to Paris, where he was received with great honour by Louis and bishop Thibald; both went to meet him, and conducted him to the church of Notre Dame, where he celebrated divine service, and blessed the standard which was to be borne in Palestine.

Eugenius also celebrated a solemn mass in the church of St. Genevieve, in presence of the king and his court. During the ceremony a very strange event took place; the officers of the church had laid upon the steps of the altar a magnificent cloth of silk, bordered with gold and silver, which excited the covetousness of the holy father. After the first prayer, he prostrated himself on the carpet, which, according to the custom of the court of Rome, was taking possession of it; he then went to the sacristy to clothe himself in the pontifical ornaments. The Italian priests immediately approached the altar, and seized on the carpet which had been used by the pope; the canons perceiving the intentions of these ecclesiastical strangers, precipitated themselves upon them to wrest it from their hands; the latter resisted, a struggle took place between the French and the Romans, and they beat each other with candles and candelabras; at length the canons succeeded in rescuing their magnificent carpet, but all in strips. The officers of the pope, beaten and humiliated, took refuge in the sacristy, and showed to the holy father their torn garments and bloody faces. Eugenius re-entered the church, and imperiously demanded justice for the insult to his officers. The bigot king decided that the canons should be driven from St. Genevieve, and that their church, with its dependencies, should be given to the black monks, that is, to the monks of Cluny. Louis confided the execution of this order to the abbot Suger, and made preparations for his departure to the Holy Land.

The emperor Conrad had already set out for Palestine with a formidable army of seventy thousand men. The king of France commanded several bodies, which amounted to more than eighty thousand men, he was also followed by a guard of honour, which served as an escort for the queen, his wife. After a march of three months, the two princes arrived at Constantinople, where they found immense magazines of provisions prepared for them by the care of Manuel Comnenus, and all things necessary to transport them into Asia. But they found a great change as soon as they had crossed the Hellespont; the wary Comnenus was desirous of the aid of the crusaders, but his policy prevented him from rendering them too powerful, and he laboured to disorganize their armies; now by delaying to send provisions, now by poisoning the flour with gypsum and lime, now by giving them infidel guides, who delivered up entire bodies to the steel of the Mussulmen. The army commanded by Conrad was almost entirely exterminated, and he himself obliged to fly and go to Ephesus to the king of France. The troops of Louis soon underwent the same fate; they were cut to pieces by the infidel, and the two princes disgracefully escaped, abandoning their soldiers in distant countries. Conrad returned to Constantinople, from whence he went to Germany. Louis disembarked in Calabria, and returned to France.

Such was the result of this expedition which had been announced by prophecies and miracles. Saint Bernard lost much of his consideration, and was accused by the people of imposture and knavery. "This great saint," says Maimburg, "replied that his predictions would have been realised, if the abominable sins of the Christians had not excited the wrath of Jesus Christ, and hindered the effect of his promises. He made it appear that the crusaders had been soiled by abominations more frightful than those of the children of Israel. These facts are true, but with like reasoning," adds Maimburg, "it would be easy for all impostors to explain their false prophecies which did not come to pass."

Whilst the armies of the crusaders were wetting with their blood the sands of Palestine, the holy father was holding ecclesiastical assemblies in France to judge the heresies of Gilbert de la Poree, one of the most learned men of the day. The accused appeared before a council of French bishops, among whom was Bernard, who had been appointed the prosecutor by virtue of his office. Bayle affirms, that the holy abbot had himself solicited the employment, not from zeal for religion, but from a base motive of jealousy of the reformers of that age. Two doctors of theology were produced against Gilbert: Adam du Petit-Pont, a canon of the church of Paris, and Hugh of Champ-Fleury, the chancellor of the king. Both affirmed that they had heard the accused offer propositions contrary to the discipline of the church; for example: "that the divine essence was not God himself; that the properties of the persons of the Holy Trinity were not the persons themselves; finally, that the divine nature could not become incarnate, and that the person of the Son had alone been made human." Gilbert denied formally having ever said that the divinity was not God; and he produced in testimony of the truth of his assertions, two of his disciples—Ralph, bishop of Evreux, who afterwards became the metropolitan of Rouen, and the doctor Ives de Chartres. Eugenius found it impossible to render a judgment on account of the diversity of the depositions, and he was obliged to refer the decision of this important matter to the general council which had been convened at Rheims for the following year. In the mean time, he sent Alberic, bishop of Ostia, as his legate into the countship of Toulouse, with orders to pursue the monk Henry, a disciple of Peter de Bruya, a heretic who had been burned some time before at St. Gilles by order of the pope.

This intrepid monk continued to teach the precepts of his master without being alarmed by dread of the scaffold. He preached openly against the pontiff, urging the faithful to withdraw from obedience to him, and to restrain his authority within the limits of the diocese of Rome. Eugenius, fearful of the consequences of these pernicious doctrines, which threatened his temporal power and his spiritual infallibility, authorised the legate Alberic to employ all the resources which he had at his disposal to annihilate the heretics to the last man. He ordered him to use sword, fire, and poison; to pursue and follow them every where like wild beasts; and to give to this mission a character of solemnity, he sent Geoffrey of Chartres, and St. Bernard to accompany his legate.

Among the cities infected by the heresy of Peter de Bruya, Alby was especially distinguished for its hatred of the pontifical tyranny which gave to all this sect the denomination of Albigenses; thus it was towards this city that the legate of the pontiff and his associates directed their steps. They entered Alby towards the end of the month of June. The people, who had been informed of the object of their journey, came to meet them with tambours, flutes, and kitchen utensils, and accompanied them even to the bishop's residence in the midst of shouts and the discordant noise of their instruments. The legates, furious at this reception, resolved to take vengeance for it. On the following day they caused those who had been pointed out by the priests of the country to be arrested, and compelled them, by frightful tortures, to denounce the other heretics, and abjure their belief.

Notwithstanding the severity which they displayed in their punishments, the legates could only obtain a small number of conversions; and as the exasperation of the people continued to increase, they were obliged to leave the south of France without having finished their mission. St. Bernard returned with his colleagues to Rheims, whither had already come more than twelve hundred prelates from all parts of France, to assist at the council convened by the holy father. They were first engaged with the heretic Eon de l'Etoile, a Breton gentleman, who was grossly ignorant, and whose mind was wandering. This poor insensate believed himself to be the Son of God, on account of the resemblance of his name with the word Eum, by virtue of these words: "Per eum qui venturus est;" and, in his folly, committed extravagancies which the crowd took for miracles. He had been soon surrounded by a large number of disciples, who had defended him against the attempts to arrest him made by several lords; the archbishop of Rheims had at last arrested him, by drawing him into a snare, under the pretext that he was a convert to his doctrine. The pope himself interrogated him; and though he could only obtain replies which were so many proofs of his madness, he condemned him to be burned alive. This sentence was, however, moderated at the solicitation of the archbishop of Rheims, who obtained permission that the unfortunate man, who was confined to his keeping, should be confined in a cloister for the rest of his life, and submitted to a rigorous fast. The abbot Suger, who was charged with the execution of the order, sent him to a convent of his order, and the fasting clause was so barbarously observed, that the unfortunate Eon died of famine in his dungeon after three months of agony. His disciples were all delivered over to the executioner, and burned alive in expiation of their folly.

The council then passed on to other matters; they decreed several canons to arrest the debauchery of the priests, monks, and nuns; they reformed some abuses of simony, and finally examined the heresy of Gilbert de la Poree. A commission, composed of the bishops Geoffrey of Leroux, Milan, Jocelyn, and Suger, to whom St. Bernard and several cardinals were joined, were charged to write out a report of it before the pontiff, and to interrogate the accused.

At the first session, Gilbert brought in a great number of the works of the fathers, in order to read entire passages which his adversaries only cited in detached extracts, so as to force the sense of the propositions. The holy father, fatigued with listening to these long dissertations, apostrophised him sharply, and ordered him to say briefly whether he believed the divine essence was God. "No," replied Gilbert. "We then hold him for an heretic," exclaimed St. Bernard. "Let his avowal be written down." Henry of Pisa, who filled the post of secretary of the council, was about to obey this order, when Gilbert turned towards Bernard, and said, regarding him with indignation, "Write also, monk of Clairvaux, that the divinity is God." The abbot, unmoved, continued his address to Henry: "Secretary, leave your pen and paper, and write with iron and the diamond, that the divine essence, its form, goodness, wisdom, power, all in fine, is really God." This bold proposition scandalized the cardinals, and produced a long discussion. At length St. Bernard, conquered by the arguments of the Roman prelates, and particularly by the dialectics of Henry, terminated the discussion by saying, "Well, if the form of God is not the divinity, it is more than it, since it derives its essence from itself."—The cardinals immediately broke up the sitting, declaring that they were sufficiently informed on the matter, and that they would retire to deliberate before pronouncing judgment. They then left the hall, and the pope adjourned the council for three days.

Saint Bernard, who foresaw a check, intrigued with the French bishops, and on the following day assembled in his residence ten metropolitans, with a great number of abbots, bishops, and doctors of the Gallican church, in order to decide with them as to what it was necessary to do to alarm the cardinals and constrain them to condemn the doctrines of Gilbert. It was agreed among them, that they should send the cardinals a creed at the end of the articles consecrated by the French prelates, and the tenor of it was reduced to these strange terms: "We believe that the simple nature of the divinity is God, and that God is the divinity; we also believe that God is wise by wisdom, which is himself; that he is great by greatness, which is himself; that he is good by goodness, which is himself, etc. . . . When we speak of three divine persons, we say that they are one God and one divine substance; on the other hand, when we speak of the divine substance, we say it is in three persons, and thus of the rest. . . . We affirm that God alone is eternal, and that there exists nothing else, whatever may be its denomination, that can be eternal without being God. . . . Finally, we firmly believe that the divinity itself, or the divine nature, is incarnate in Christ."

Three deputies, Hugh of Auxerre, Milon of Terouanne, and the abbot Suger, were instructed to present this creed to the pope, and when they had been admitted to his presence they made this harangue: "We have permitted from respect to you, most holy father, discourses which we ought not to hear, when we brought the tribute of our intelligence to the decision which was to be taken on the heresy of Gilbert. But since you have preserved for yourself and cardinals the right of pronouncing on this question, we bring you our profession of faith, that you may compare it with that of the heretic, so that you may not judge without hearing both parties. There exists, however, a difference between the conduct of the accused and ours; Gilbert has declared that he was ready to correct in his profession of faith that which was not in conformity with your sentiments; we, on the other hand, protest to you, that we will persevere for ever in the creed which we deposit in writing at your feet."

Eugenius, desiring to avoid a scandal, replied to the delegates, that the Roman church partook of the belief of the Gallican; that it condemned like it the doctrines of Gilbert de la Poree, and that the interest manifested by the cardinals was only for the person of that bishop, who was commendable for his merit. On the day appointed the council re-assembled in the palace called Tan, on account of its form representing the letter T; Gilbert was interrogated by the pope himself upon different points of his doctrine. At each incriminated article the accused replied: "Holy father, if you have any other opinion on this proposition, I submit to your wisdom; if, on the other hand, you speak or write in its favour, I will do as you." On this, the assembly declared that it could not find one so docile as a schismatic, and contented itself with lacerating the writings accused of heresy. They prohibited their being read, but they pronounced no censure against the author.

In the same council Raymond, archbishop of Toledo, came in the name of Alphonso the Eighth, the sovereign of Castile, to accuse pope Eugenius of having sold to Alphonso Henriquez, the count of Portugal, the title of king, for an annual payment of four pounds weight of gold; he also complained of the metropolitan of Braga, who had insolently refused to recognise the primacy of Toledo, since the countship of Portugal had been erected into a kingdom. "Thus," added he, "for a little gold has your pope of Satan destroyed the political and ecclesiastical hierarchy of Spain, and our misfortunes call down the vengeance of God upon his head."

Eugenius rose, pale and trembling with rage; to reply to him; but a single glance around the assembly showed him that the conduct of his adversary met the approval of the fathers. He then restrained himself, and putting on an hypocritical air, said to the archbishop, "Your master is illy informed; we have never wished to diminish the greatness of his authority, nor attack the rights of his crown; on the contrary, we desire to favour his kingdom by granting to him the same indulgence as to the crusaders of the East, if he wishes to combat the infidels of Spain. We are equally desirous that Toledo should remain the seat of the primate, and we suspend from his episcopal functions the archbishop of Braga, who has refused to submit to his superior, the primate Raymond. Finally, as a mark of our affection, we will send to king Alphonso, by the hands of the bishop of Segovia, the golden rose which the pontiffs are accustomed to bless on the fourth Sunday in Lent of each year."

After the termination of the council of Rheims, the Pope went to Clairvaux, where he ostentatiously displayed his humility and his macerations; he wore constantly next his skin his woollen tunic and never put off the cowl; his bed was covered with rich stuffs which allowed the mattress made of beaten straw and rough horse hair to be seen. He also wished to assist at a general chapter of abbots as a simple monk, and not as president or pontiff.

During his absence from Italy, the Romans had been conquered by the emperor. After their submission he hastened to leave France, and made his solemn entry into Rome in 1149. The priests and monks alone came to meet him; the people refused to join in the acclamations. Without troubling himself about the hatred of the Romans, he determined to affirm the sway of the Holy See over Italy and the people who were recently converted to Christianity. He sent into Denmark and Norway, Nicholas, bishop of Albano, with the rank of legate, to establish an archbishopric; but as the Goths and Swedes could not agree, either as to the city which was to be chosen as the metropolis, nor the prelate whom they wished to elevate to the new see, the one demanding the archbishop of Bremen, the others him of Upsal, Nicholas was obliged to return without having settled any thing. The legate, however, established the archbishop of Lund as provisional primate of Sweden, and gave him authority over all the churches of Norway, until they should have designated a metropolitan.

Conrad the Third died in Germany during the following year, leaving his crown to his nephew, Frederick the First, surnamed Barbarossa. As soon as this prince was mounted on the imperial throne, he sent as delegates to the pontifical court, Hilin, the metropolitan of Treves, and Everard, the prelate of Bamberg, to inform the pope of his advent to the empire, and to propose to him a treaty of alliance. Eugenius received the ambassadors of the monarch favourably; he appointed seven cardinals and Brunon, the abbot of Cavalla, to confer with the ambassadors of Frederick. The bases of the treaty were that the sovereign should grant neither truce nor treaty to the citizens of Rome, nor Roger, king of Sicily, without the consent of the Holy See; that he should promise to push the war against them until they had submitted to the pope, themselves, their persons, vassals, and domains; and that, finally, he would engage by oath to defend him against all his enemies, and to recover for him the domains which the church had lost.

His holiness promised, on his side, to give the imperial crown to Frederick, whenever he should come to the holy city to receive it; he engaged to aid him with all his power to maintain obedience among his people, to employ ecclesiastical censures against his enemies, and, finally, to hinder the Greek emperor from making any conquests in Italy. This protocol is dated on the 23d of March, 1152.

But the treaty had scarcely been signed, when the old quarrel between the empire and the priesthood broke out more violently than ever, on the occasion of the investiture of the archbishopric of Magdeburg, whose titular was about to die. Two parties disputed for this rich metropolitan church; one wished to appoint the treasurer of the chapter of the cathedral as archbishop, the other presented the prevost, as being alone worthy to occupy the Episcopal See. As the two factions, equally powerful, were unwilling either of them to yield, and threatened the city with the greatest disorders, the emperor determined to appoint a metropolitan himself, to put an end to the interminable disputes of the clergy, and chose Guisman, bishop of Ceits, to occupy the archbishopric.

Frederick was doubtless in the right in so acting; for the court of Germany, in the treaty between Pascal and Henry the Fifth, had reserved to itself the power, in a case of schism in the nomination of bishops, to choose him who appeared most worthy of the episcopate, after having advised with the lords of the empire. But the ambitious Gerard, the prevost of Magdeburg, seeing all his hopes cast down by this promotion, cried out scandal; threatened the prince with ecclesiastical thunders, and went immediately to Rome to have the election of Guisman, whom he regarded as an intruder into his archbishopric, annulled. Eugenius took the side of Gerard, and wrote to the emperor, that he must immediately drive his protégé away from Magdeburg, if he did not wish to incur the excommunication of the Holy See.

In vain did eight of the principal prelates of Germany address letters to the pontiff in favour of the new metropolitan. Eugenius was inflexible; he even replied to them severely, for having dared to defend a prince, who treated the canons of the church with contempt; he blamed them for what he called their cowardly condescendence to the wishes of the powers of the earth; and, finally, enjoined on them to constrain King Frederick, by energetic representation, to leave the church of Magdeburg free to choose its pastor: "for," added he, "even we ourselves would not dare to do any thing contrary to the law of God and the holy canons of the church." Father Maimburg thus interprets this last thought: "We must conclude from these last words, that the pope could not permit any thing contrary to the service of God, because he recognised himself as inferior to God. And also that he could not change the canons and decrees of general councils, because he recognised his authority as submissive to that of these councils. An opinion very different from that of a great number of popes, who pretend to be infallible and above the entire universe."

Notwithstanding the censures of the church, Frederick, persuaded that he had not exceeded his lawful rights, maintained the election of the archbishop of Magdeburg. The pope then sent prelates into Germany, commissioned to depose Guisman, but the emperor interfered, and drove them out of his kingdom, as Conrad, duke of Franconia, had already done Jourdain des Ursini.

On this subject, and to let it be seen what kind of persons were the representatives of the popes, we will cite the letter which St. Bernard himself wrote to Eugenius about his legate:—"Your Jourdain des Ursini, most holy father, has committed shameful actions everywhere. He has stolen the sacred vessels from the churches; he has conferred the ecclesiastical degree on young lads, whose beauty informs us by what act of complaisance they have merited them; he has entered the holy dwellings of nuns, where he has brought his infamies to their height. It is for you, most holy father, to judge what is to be done with such an ecclesiastic. For myself, I have done as my conscience dictated; and, I will add, with my ordinary freedom, that it were well if your palace were purged of all the abominations which it contains. It was my first intention not to lay my complaints before you; but the prior of the convent of Mont Dieu has pressed me to write, and know that I have said less than the public. . . ." This letter of St. Bernard's produced no sensation at the pontifical court; besides, Eugenius was too much occupied in establishing his sway over foreign churches, to think of undertaking the least reform in his own court.

Another of his legates, John Paperon, started for Ireland about the year 1151; but, the king of England having refused to grant him a safe-conduct, he was forced to return to Rome to confer with the pope. By the advice of the cardinals, it was decided, that he should repair to Ireland, but by passing through Scotland, which was then governed by King David, who was devoted to the Holy See. This second journey resulted more favourably than the first. He arrived safely in Ireland, and held a council in the new monastery of Mellifont, of the order of the Citeaux, where he convened the bishops, abbots, kings, dukes, and all the lords of the island. The assembly decreed the erection of archiepiscopal sees at Dublin, Tuam, Armagh, and Cassel. The legate then distributed to the new metropolitans the palliums which he had brought from Rome; he reduced the Irish priests to the law of celibacy, which they had not practised before; and reformed a great number of abuses and old superstitious practices. But he was unable to render an account of the success of his mission to Eugenius, who died before his return to Rome, on the 8th of July, 1153. The body of the pontiff was carried in great solemnity, and deposited in the church of the Apostle, where it performed several miracles.

It was during this reign, that the monk Gra-uan published his collection of apocryphal canons and false decretals, which commenced with the pontificate of St. Clement, and finished with Pope Siricus: that is, up to the year 398. Not only did Eugenius sanction, with all his authority, this lying compilation, which placed the pontifical See above all the thrones of the earth, but even instituted the grades of bachelor and licentiate in the canon law, for young priests who made the maxims of his book their especial study.

About a month after the death of Eugenius, the celebrated St. Bernard rendered his soul to God in the abbey of Clairvaux. His body, clothed in its sacerdotal ornaments, was borne by the monks into the chapel of the Virgin, in the presence of an immense concourse of the nobility and people of the neighbouring country. For two days it was exposed to the reverence of the faithful, who came to apply bread, pieces of money, and linen, to make relics of them, and use them in the cure of sickness. On the second day, the crowd was not content with applying the relics to the dead body; they commenced disrobing the saint of parts of his clothing; they then cut off his hair; and, finally, the profanation was carried to such a point, that the body, entirely naked, and placed upon the altar of the Virgin, became an object of scandal and horror.

During his lifetime, Bernard was one of the most ardent props of pontifical despotism, and the most implacable enemy of the heretics. This fervent apostle of the crusades infected Europe with his black monks, and founded, himself, three hundred and seventy-two monasteries. Thus the church has canonised him.

ANASTASIUS THE FOURTH, THE ONE HUNDRED AND SEVENTY-THIRD POPE.

[A. D. 1153.]

Election of Anastasius—William, the metropolitan of York, is reinstated in his see—Quarrel between the church and the empire—Privileges granted to the Hospitallers of St. John of Jerusalem—Death of Anastasius.

AFTER the obsequies of Eugenius had been performed, the cardinals assembled in the church of St. John, of the Lateran, to give him a successor; and chose Conrad, bishop of Sabine, a Roman by birth, who was proclaimed pope, by the name of Anastasius the Fourth. The new pontiff was a venerable old man, who was especially distinguished for great regularity of morals, and great experience in the usages of the court of Rome. As soon as the news of his election was known in England, a metropolitan of York, named William, who had been unjustly deposed by Eugenius in the council of Rheims, hastened to Rome, to demand the revision of the sentence pronounced against him. Anastasius, after having examined the grounds of the judgment against him, discovered that his predecessor had been guilty of great iniquity in condemning an innocent man. He revoked the sentence of deposition, reinstated William in all his dignities, and even granted the pallium to him.

The holy father was then engaged in arresting the deplorable effects of the war which his predecessor had imprudently excited between the altar and the throne, and which threatened to be more terrible than any which had occurred under the preceding reigns. For this purpose, the cardinal Gerard was sent to the court of the emperor, to put an end to all differences between the Holy See and that prince, without, however, sacrificing the interests of the church. Unfortunately, the embassador did not conform to the orders of the pontiff, but had the impudence to speak to the sovereign, at a public audience, with such arrogance, that he was driven from the royal presence. This affront exasperated the legate, and produced so violent a fit of anger, that he was strangled by an effusion of blood, before they could give him any assistance.

Frederick was desirous, however, of showing to the pontiff, that he knew how to render justice to his good intentions, and to distinguish him from his envoys. He sent the archbishop of Magdeburg to him to give him an account of his election, and to submit himself to his judgment. Anastasius received Guisman with distinction, and after having heard his explanations, he confirmed him in his archiepiscopal dignity, and even granted him the pallium. This conduct of the pope scandalised the greater part of the fanatical clergy, and if we can believe Otho of Frisingen, the priests dared accuse the holy father of criminal condescendence towards the emperor.

According to several historians, Anastasius published, during the following year, that remarkable bull concerning the Knights of the Hospital of St. John of Jerusalem, the same who afterwards took the name of the Knights of Rhodes and Malta and whose foundation goes back to the year 1113, as is indicated by a decree of Pascal the Second, addressed to Gerard, the first grand master of the order.

Anastasius in his bull, which is most explicit, confirmed the grand master Raymond, in his right of exemption from the jurisdiction of the patriarch of Jerusalem; he added—

“As all your property is designed for the support of pilgrims and the poor, we prohibit laymen and ecclesiastics of any rank, from exacting tithes therefrom. We interdict all bishops from publishing suspensions or anathemas in the churches placed under your authority, and even when an interdict is obliged to be fulminated in a country in which you are located, divine service shall still be celebrated in your churches, only with closed doors, and without ringing the bells. That you may be able always to celebrate mass, we permit you to receive into your temples, priests and clergy of all nations, after having first informed yourselves of the correctness of their morals, and the regularity of their ordination. If the prelates to whom they are subjected, refuse to grant them to you, I authorize you, by virtue of the power which has been delegated to the Holy See, to take them by force, and from the moment they shall have entered your temples, they shall be subject to your chapter and the pope alone. We also permit you to receive into your hospitals, laymen to serve the poor. We prohibit the laymen, that is the knights who shall be received into your company, from returning to the world, after having taken the habit and the cross. We prohibit them also from going into another order under the pretence of leading a more austere life. You will cause your altars and oratories to be dedicated by the diocesan bishops, if he will do it gratuitously; but if not, you will select another prelate. Finally, we confirm you in all the domains and lordships, which your order possesses in Asia or in Europe, or which it may in future acquire.”

History is silent on the other actions of this pope. It is probable that he followed the counsels of wisdom and moderation, as he did at the commencement of his reign. He held the Holy See for fourteen months and some days, and died on the 2d of December, 1154, regarded as the best pontiff who had governed the church for several centuries.

ADRIAN THE FOURTH, THE ONE HUNDRED AND SEVENTY-FOURTH POPE.

[A. D. 1154.]

Singular history of Adrian before his pontificate—His election—Troubles at Rome—The emperor goes into Italy—Arnold of Brescia is arrested—Interview between the pope and Frederick Barbarossa—Deputation of Romans—Coronation of Frederick Barbarossa—Violent sedition at Rome—Adrian quits the holy city, and the emperor goes to Germany—Excommunication of the king of Sicily—Complaints of the people against the Knights Hospitallers of Jerusalem—Peace is concluded between the pope and the king of Sicily—Adrian gives the crown of Ireland to the king of England—Quarrel between the emperor and the pope—Death of Adrian.

“DIVINE Providence appears to have been careful to have drawn Adrian from the dust, to seat him on the throne of St. Peter, and to place him above the princes of his people.” Such is the exordium of Maimburg in his history of Adrian the Fourth. The holy father was an Englishman by birth, and the son of a village clerk, named Nicholas Breakspeare, who was so poor, that, having no means of living after the death of his wife, he had been obliged to serve as a domestic in the kitchen of the convent of St. Albans. The young Nicholas, abandoned by his father, lived by alms until he had attained the age of manhood; he then crossed the sea, and went to France to mend his fortune. He stopped by chance at St. Rufus, near Avignon, a chapter of regular canons. The poor Englishman interested the superior; and as he was of an agreeable exterior, wise in his discourse, and of a mild and modest character, he insinuated himself, little by little, into the good graces of the canons, and finished by obtaining the habit of the order. For several years Nicholas exhibited a scrupulous regularity in his duties, and applied himself to study with great aptitude. His progress in science and oratorical art acquired for him such a reputation, that after the death of the abbot, William the Second, he was chosen to succeed him in the government of the chapter, and the direction of all the cloisters of the order. As he was truly a good man, he was desirous of undertaking the reform of the canons, whose discipline was very much relaxed. They then leagued against him, and revolted against his authority, and even dared to accuse him, before Pope Eugenius, of infamous crimes, in order to procure his deposition and excommunication.

But the holy father was so touched by the wisdom and moderation which Nicholas exhibited in his defence, that he took his part, and drove the canons from his presence, saying to them:—“I now know the shameful cause of your calumnies. Go, false monks, choose an abbot who tolerates your disorders; this one shall remain with me.” They retired in confusion, though inwardly satisfied with the decision of the pontiff. Nicholas was then elevated to the bishopric of Albano, and sent, with the title of legate, into Norway, to instruct that barbarous people in evangelical truth. He had only returned into Italy eight days, when Anastasius the Fourth died. On the day succeeding his funeral ceremonies, the cardinals assembled in the palace of the Lateran, and proclaimed Nicholas sovereign pontiff by the name of Adrian the Fourth. This election filled the king of England with joy, who was flattered at seeing on the apostolic throne, a pope who was born his subject. He addressed to him a letter of congratulation, in which he exhorted him to fill the church with worthy ministers, and to procure aid for the Christians of the Holy Land.

The partizans of religious reforms, who had concurred in the election of Adrian, hoped that the pope, out of gratitude, would restore to the Roman people the rights of which they had been despoiled during the pontificate of Eugenius. The members of the senate consequently presented themselves before him, to ask that the members of the assembly should be charged with the government of the state, as during the primitive republic. But they soon discovered how much sovereign power can change men. Adrian, become pope, forgot that he owed his tiara to the people, refused this just demand, and drove away the senators; after which he retired to the Vatican, whose high walls, garnished with soldiers, placed him beyond the reach of the rage of the people.

Arnold of Brescia, immediately recommenced his eloquent preaching, and Rome was in full revolt; no excess was, however, committed by the insurgents, except against Gerard, a cardinal priest, who was discovered to be a spy of the holy father. He was met in the street by a party of rebels, who beat him with the flat side of their swords, and left him for dead on the spot; he, however, recovered from his wounds.

Adrian, alarmed by a revolt which threatened to become general, resolved to strike their superstitious minds by a blow of authority. He lanced a bull of excommunication against the holy city itself, and caused divine service and the sacraments to be every where intermitted. Then, as he had foreseen, superstition conquered hatred, and the Romans came to beseech him to pardon them, pledging themselves on the gospels to drive Arnold of Brescia, and his followers, from the city and territories. The pontiff received their oath, and promised to raise the interdict as soon as they had fulfilled their promises. The unfortunate Arnold of Brescia was sacrificed, and compelled to quit the city at the moment when the holy father sallied forth in triumph, from the city Leonine, to go to the palace of the Lateran, where he solemnly celebrated divine service.

Whilst the Romans were driving away and taking back their pontiffs, Frederick Barbarossa was laying siege to the Italian cities, which refused to recognise his authority. He had already received the iron crown at Pavia, and was preparing to push on to the holy city to be crowned emperor, where Adrian, informed of his plans, and fearing lest his journey had a hostile end, sent three cardinals to confer with him regarding his coronation, and his intentions towards the Holy See. The ambassadors went to St. Quiricus in Tuscany, where they found Frederick; he, from considerations of policy, received them with great honours, promised entire submission to the Holy See, and even had the meanness to surrender Arnold of Brescia, who had taken refuge under his protection. This courageous apostle of liberty was immediately loaded with chains and sent to Rome, where the cardinals condemned him to be burned alive. The sentence was carried into execution on the very day of the condemnation, and the executioner cast his ashes into the Tiber. Thus died he who wished to free the people from disgraceful pontifical slavery.

Frederick, who well knew the policy of the holy father, and dreaded some perfidy in the pope, was in no hurry to ratify the treaty which had been submitted to him, and wished to await the return of Arnold and Anselm, the metropolitans of Cologne and Ravenna, who had been sent as ambassadors to the sovereign pontiff. The latter, who also distrusted Frederick, refused to give a definite answer, until the return of his ambassadors who were at St. Quiricus. During this negotiation, which was long protracted, the holy father remained retired in an impenetrable fortress, called Citta di Castello.

At last the deputies, shuffled from place to place, met on the road, and by common consent decided to go together to the king, who had advanced as far as Viterba with his army. Frederick listened to their propositions in regard to the treaty, and promised to give the pope all the sureties he asked. The cardinals immediately brought in the relics, the cross, and the Bible, and a knight swore in the name of the emperor to preserve the pontiff Adrian, and the ecclesiastics of the sacred college, safe in their lives, members, liberty, honours, and property. The legates then returned to the holy father, who determined to go to the camp of Frederick. He was received by the German lords, and a multitude of clergy and laymen, who accompanied him with great pomp as far as the tent of their sovereign; but the bishops and cardinals of his suite having perceived that the prince had refused to hold the stirrup of the pope, retired at once from the cortège, and retook their way to Citta di Castello.

Adrian at first appeared embarrassed by their departure; he, however, descended from his horse, and placed himself on the sofa which was prepared for him. The emperor then prostrated himself at his feet: and after having kissed his sandal, rose to receive the kiss of peace; but the pontiff repulsed him with his hand. "You have rendered yourself unworthy of this favour, Prince, by refusing to fill an office by which all orthodox sovereigns have regarded themselves as honoured."

In vain did Frederick observe that no ecclesiastical canon obliged him to conform to ridiculous practices. Adrian was unwilling to listen to any explanation, and two days passed in useless conferences. At last the king, on the third day, consented, by the advice of his lords, to perform the duties of squire to the holy father; and in the presence of the whole army, held his stirrup for a stone's cast, to obtain from the pontiff the kiss of peace.

On their side, the Romans, who, after the departure of the pope, had undertaken anew to obtain their liberty, dreading the pontifical vengeance, hastened to send an embassy to the prince to place themselves under his protection. The deputies addressed him as follows: "We come, great prince, in the name of the senate and Roman people, to offer you the imperial crown, and to beseech you to free us from the disgraceful yoke of priests. We have already made you our fellow citizen and our prince; in return, however, you owe us the confirmation of our ancient customs, and of the laws which your predecessors have granted us. You should re-establish the senate and the order of knights, and you should defend us from every insult, even to the shedding of blood; and for all this we ask from you guarantees by letter and oath."

... They were about to continue, but Frederick, astonished at the commencement of this address, interrupted them by a motion of his hand, and taking up the word said, "Rome is no longer what it has been; its power is annihilated; it was first subjugated by the Greeks, then by the Franks, and now, height of humiliation! it is governed by a priest; I do not desire to be either your fellow citizen or your prince; my predecessors, Charles and Otho, conquered Italy and Rome by their valour; like them, I am your master by the right of the sword, the only one which establishes the legitimate possession of princes; and no power under heaven can release you from my authority."

After this discourse, the courtiers of the proud monarch insolently demanded from the ambassadors, if they had any thing to reply in relation to the great truths which the emperor had so well expressed. They kept silence, and returned to Rome.

As soon as the pope was informed of the departure of the Romans, he sought out the prince, and having mildly reproached him for the vivacity of his language in regard to himself, said to him, "You have done all the better in driving away these deputies, since you are ignorant of the perfidy of the senators. They hate equally popes and kings, and if they came to you it was to betray me; and now they have returned to Rome to deceive you. Prevent this then by sending your troops at once beneath the walls of the city Leonine, and the church of St. Peter, that my officers may surrender them to you, whilst there is yet time."

The emperor followed this advice, and sent a thousand knights, under the command of cardinal Octavian; the city and church were immediately occupied by the Germans, and on the next day, the pope, accompanied by his cardinals, went to the city Leonine to wait for the king, who followed him at the head of a numerous escort. The prince made his entry in robes of ceremony, and presented himself at the church of St. Martin of Tours, where he first took the oath of obedience to the pontiff. They both then went to the church of St. Peter.

Frederick approached the confessional of the apostle, and knelt before the prince of the cardinal bishops, who recited the first prayer; two other prelates pronounced the second prayer, and a third administered to him the sacred unction; he then received the sword, sceptre, and imperial crown from the hands of the pontiff. After the ceremony, he returned to his camp with the same train, and in the same manner, as he had come; but he had scarcely quitted Rome, when the citizens rushed on the church of St. Peter, and massacred all the priests they could seize, in revenge of the infamous treason of the pontiff. Some squires of the prince who had remained in Rome experienced the same fate, and the insurgents even wished to besiege the pontifical palace. The emperor arrested the execution of this plan by marching all his troops on Rome; the people fought bravely until night, and repulsed the Germans. On the next day the strife recommenced with new rage; at last, overcome by numbers, the citizens were compelled to yield and submit.

As the heat was excessive, and the plains were parched by the sun, forage began to fail, and the emperor was constrained to quit the environs of Rome with his cavalry; the holy father accompanied him to his new quarters at Ponte-Lucano, near to Tibur or Tivoli, where he celebrated the festival of the apostle Peter. During divine service Adrian granted absolution to all the German soldiers who had combated in his cause against the Romans, and granted them the same indulgence as if they had made war in the Holy Land against the enemies of God.

It is a political axiom, that it is difficult for a good understanding to exist between two tyrants who claim the same rights. Thus a simple accident divided the pontiff and the emperor. When they were entering Tibur, the consuls of the city came to present the keys to Frederick, declaring that they submitted to his authority and not to that of the pontiff; in this the prince acquiesced. But Adrian and his cardinals immediately protested against what they called the felony of Tibur, maintaining that this city pertained to the Roman church and had no right to choose for itself a master. This opposition irritated the emperor, who replied, that he should regard the acquisition of the city as just and equitable until he should have conferred with the lords of his court. These endeavoured to appease him, and to show him, that by exhibiting at this moment hostility to the pope, he might excite against himself the prince of Capua, the duke of Apulia and even the king of Sicily. Frederick then restored the keys to the holy father, and confirmed him by an authentic deed in possession of this city, with, however, this clause, "Saving the imperial right." He, however, took occasion to leave the pontiff, and Adrian found himself compelled to return to Rome.

William, surnamed the Bad, had mounted the throne of Sicily and sent ambassadors to the apostolic court to demand the confirmation of the rights and privileges of his kingdom. But the pontiff, who claimed several important cities for his see, refused to satisfy the just demands of the prince. The latter, indignant at the bad faith of the pope, took up arms, attacked the territories of the Roman church, blockaded Beneventum, and seized several palaces of Campania. Adrian, on his side, lost no time; he lanced the thunders of the Vatican against William, declared his states under interdict, and invoked the wrath of God on the head of the guilty one; he then collected troops, entered Campania, and reduced the whole country as far as Beneventum. Whilst he was besieging this city he received a letter from Manuel Comnenus, offering him aid in men and money to achieve the conquest of the Peninsula, if he would surrender to him three maritime cities of Apulia. William, informed of this negotiation by his spies, endeavoured to avert the storm by treating, himself, with the holy father. He proposed to him in exchange for the investiture of Sicily, to grant freedom to all the churches of his kingdom, to take an oath of fidelity and obedience to him, to grant him three places in full sovereignty, to furnish troops to reduce the Romans, and finally, to pay large sums as an indemnity for the war.

Adrian, in the pride of triumph, intoxicated by a new victory which had rendered him master of Beneventum, rejected the offers of the prince and replied that he would not stop until he had driven his troops into the sea. Taking counsel from his desperate position alone, William advanced into Campania with hastily levied bands, reconquered the cities he had lost, and in his turn laid siege to Beneventum, in which the pontiff was. The siege was urged with such vigour, that Adrian, having no hopes of being succoured in time, was obliged to capitulate and conclude a very different treaty from that which had been proposed to him, and in which it was agreed that the prince should preserve the investiture of the kingdom of Sicily without indemnity or condition. After the bull was signed, William was admitted to prostrate himself at the feet of Adrian, to do him liege homage and receive the kiss of peace.

During the same year (1156) Foucher, patriarch of Jerusalem, sent letters to the pope, complaining of the knights hospitallers, and of the abuses which they made of their privileges by receiving into their churches Christians who had been excommunicated by the bishops, and by causing the priests of their order to administer the viaticum, extreme unction, and ecclesiastical sepulture. In his letter, Foucher accused them of not observing the interdicts lanced against cities, of ringing the bells of their churches in contempt of the canons, of celebrating service publicly and in a loud voice, and in receiving the offerings of the people to the prejudice of the mother churches. He finally besought the holy father to prohibit them from proceeding to the consecration or deposition of their priests without the participation of the prelates, and to order them to pay him a tithe on their lands and revenues. He further accused them of having made him undergo humiliation, by erecting a magnificent hospital opposite the church of the Holy Sepulchre, which, from the richness of its architecture, eclipsed his metropolitan church; he complained that they rung their bells with all their might whenever he rose to preach, and added, that having dared to reproach them for their conduct, he had been assailed by the knights even in the patriarchal palace, and that darts had been hurled at him even at the very altar of the Holy Sepulchre. The hospitallers had, in fact, rendered themselves so redoubtable that no one dared resist them in the kingdom of Palestine, not even the bishops and patriarch, because they were entirely independent by virtue of the bull granted them by Anastasius the Fourth.

Foucher, worn out by the continual persecutions of which himself and his clergy were the objects, determined to go to Rome to fortify his demands. He consequently embarked with two Metropolitans, and came as far as Otranto; when they arrived in that city, they learned that all Apulia was invaded by the troops of the king of Sicily, the Greeks, and the allies of the pontiff; fearful of falling into the hands of these undisciplined bands, they returned by sea as far as the March of Ancona, and sought to find the holy father by land.

But Adrian was already advised of the coming of the patriarch by the hospitallers, who had gained him to their side, and when the oriental prelates presented themselves at Ferrentina, they found an inflexible judge who refused to give them the slightest satisfaction; they were then compelled to retrace their steps in sadness to Jerusalem.

John of Salisbury, a celebrated historian, the compatriot and intimate friend of the pope, was so shocked by this denial of justice, that he addressed violent sarcasms to him, which have been preserved in his writings. "Do you know what is the opinion of wise men about the Roman church?" wrote this bold prelate. "It is not favourable to you, holy father, they affirm that your church instead of being the mother of the faithful, is the stepmother; they say that it only contains scribes and pharisees, who carry the burthen of their iniquities upon their shoulders; they say that the priests, instead of serving as models to the flock, accumulate precious furniture in their palaces, and load their tables with gold and silver; they say that their avarice is extreme, and that they do nothing for the poor but by way of ostentation. They accuse your clergy of committing exactions through all Christendom—of encouraging collisions between the people and princes, to enrich themselves in the midst of the general confusion. Even you, holy father, have become an object of hatred; the faithful maintain that you build superb palaces at their expense, and allow the temples of Christ to go to ruins; they say that you are covered with ornaments of gold and purple, whilst the poor, covered with rags, die with hunger on the steps of the palace of the Lateran. For myself, I declare that I practice what you teach, and am careful how I imitate what you do. All the world applauds and flatters you; they call you father and sovereign. But if you are a father, why do you not listen to your children, when they present themselves before you with empty hands, and figures gaunt with famine? If you are a sovereign, why do you oppress the people who give to kings the very robes that cover them? a true Christian does not so conduct himself, and I must inform you that you are out of the evangelical way."

Adrian, in his reply, avowed to the prior bishop, that he found only misery and turpitude in the Holy See, and that he would rather, for the safety of his soul, live still by alms in England than wear the tiara.

John of Salisbury then went to the holy city, to solicit the investiture of Ireland for the king of England. The pope yielded to his solicitations, and published the bull in favour of Henry. It is as follows: "Prince, no one doubts, and you yourself admit, that Ireland, as well as all islands which have received the faith of Christ, belong to the Holy See, and that the popes can dispose of them as they see right. As you have engaged to cause this people to submit to the religious and political laws of the Roman church, and to constrain them to pay to our see a penny a year for each house, we authorise you to subjugate them by all possible means; but always with the express condition, that you preserve the rights of the Holy See."

As a token of investiture, the pope joined to this bull a ring of gold, set with an emerald, and a deed by which he freed the king from the solemn oath he had taken, to preserve to his brothers their appanages, on which he had already infamously seized.

On the following year, occurred a violent quarrel on account of the arrest of Esquel, archbishop of Lunden. This prelate, on his return from a pilgrimage to Rome, where he had made magnificent presents to the holy father, had been attacked in the territory of the empire by highway robbers, who had not only entirely despoiled him, but even retained him as a prisoner, to wrest a large ransom from him.

Adrian being informed of this sacrilegious arrest, wrote to the emperor to complain of the negligence of the court of Germany, in hunting up and punishing the guilty. "Several requests have already been addressed to you, prince," he said to him, "to recall to your justice that an unheard of crime has been committed in your kingdom, and we are astonished that you have not yet pursued the authors of this attempt. You know, however, that our venerable brother Esquel of Lunden, has been robbed by wretches who still retain him in bonds; and you are silent, instead of employing the authority and the sword which you have received from God to punish the guilty. Who are these wretches who merit such indulgence at your hands? must we believe the calumny which accuses you of protecting them? must we recall to your recollection, that we have not conferred on you the dignity of emperor to authorise crime? Hasten then to obey our orders, since you have promised us a filial obedience."

This letter having been translated literally into German by Rinaldus, the imperial chancellor, to the lords who were assembled in council, they, indignant at the insolence of the pontiff, exclaimed, that it was disgraceful to suffer a priest to pretend that the emperors of Germany held the empire and the kingdom of Italy only by permission of the pope. They protested against this tendency of the Holy See to transmit to posterity falsehood for truth, and which it enforced by enregistering it in history, not only by its writings, but even by its decretals and monuments. In fact, in a saloon of the palace of the Lateran, Lothaire had been represented receiving the crown on his knees, from the hands of the pontiff Pascal the First; and above the picture this legend was written:—"The king stopped at the silver door, after having sworn to preserve the rights of the church; he was then admitted into the temple, and acknowledged himself to be the vassal of the pope, who conferred on him the supreme crown."

Frederick severely reproached the legates who had dared to bring him the letter of Adrian. One of them boldly replied to him:—"Prince, from whom, then, do you believe you hold the empire, if not from the pope?" At these words the Germans sprang from their seats; and Otho, the imperial sword-bearer, rose precipitately and threw himself upon the legate to kill him. Frederick had barely time to seize his arm. He thus saved the life of the envoy of the pontiff, and contented himself with driving him from the council-chamber, enjoining on him to leave Germany at once.

Frederick then published a manifesto against the Holy See, in which the holy father was accused of altering the union between the empire and the priesthood. "The legates of this sacrilegious pope," added the prince, "the cardinals Roland and Bernard, were the bearers of several blank letters, to be used, according to circumstances, either to despoil the churches of Germany, or to excommunicate and depose us, as if we were a bishop in subjection to the jurisdiction of the Holy See. But we foresaw their designs, and for the safety of our people and ourselves have driven them away in disgrace. For, as we hold the empire from God alone, who has subjected nations to the sword of force, as the apostle

Peter himself said, 'honour Cæsar,' we declare that clergy and laity, of every rank, who shall maintain that our crown is a dependency on the court of Rome, shall be immediately punished; for we have decided to expose our throne and our life in the maintenance of our dignity."

Well determined to punish the pope and cardinals, Frederick assembled his troops at Augsburg, and was preceded into Germany by the chancellor Rinaldus and by Otho, count palatine of Bavaria, commissioned to cause the imperial authority to be recognised in all the cities. Adrian, alarmed by the success of the lieutenants of the emperor, and fearing the effects of his vengeance, decided to send an embassy to him to treat of peace. Two cardinals, Hans and Hyacinthus, were selected for this difficult negotiation. Before their departure, the legates demanded of the commissioners of the emperor, whom they found at Modena, a safe-conduct into Germany, which was readily granted them. But, notwithstanding, two counts palatine attacked their escort in the passes of the Alps, made them prisoners, and placed them in irons. In vain did they exhibit the safe-conduct of the imperial commissioners: their captors refused to set them at liberty; and they were obliged, in order to obtain permission to continue their route, to bring the brother of Hyacinthus from Rome, who remained as a hostage for them until their ransom was entirely paid.

At last, after many fatigues and dangers, they arrived at the camp at Augsburg. Having been admitted, on the following day, to the presence of Frederick, they prostrated themselves at his feet, saluting him in the name of the pope and the sacred college, as emperor of Rome and of the world. They besought him to grant a full pardon to the pontiff for all that had passed; and presented him a letter, retracting the one which had excited his anger. Frederick, satisfied with this act of submission by the Holy See, declared, that he restored his friendship to the pontiff and clergy of Rome; and gave to the ambassadors the kiss of peace. He also made them magnificent presents and sent them back into Italy. But this quarrel had scarcely terminated, when there broke out another, still more violent, between the emperor and the pope, on account of the duke of Poland, who had refused to do liege homage on his knees to Frederick, and had placed himself under the protection of the court of Rome.

The emperor Barbarossa was now undoubtedly the most powerful monarch in Europe. Of his own authority he had given the royal crown of Bavaria to Ladislaus, and the investiture of Poland to the king of Denmark; Hungary was a tributary of the empire, and England itself sent ambassadors, carrying rich presents to this prince, to obtain his alliance. Finally, all Germany was under the absolute sway of Frederick, and throughout the whole extent of his immense estates, no enemy dared to rise against the sovereign. Milan alone had sought to reclaim its freedom, and a numerous army had immediately invaded Italy; the country had been devastated, the people murdered, and all returned to their duty. Adrian, jealous of his exercising for himself and his own advantage a despotism which he regarded as an attribute of the Holy See, had eagerly seized on the occasion which Boleslaus furnished him to censure the emperor. He wrote a respectful and energetic letter to Frederick, to recall to his memory the solemn oath which he had sworn, before the confessional of St. Peter, to protect all the allies of the church. A priest only was commissioned to carry this missive to the court of Augsburg; but the prince received the remonstrances of the holy father very badly, and sent him the following letter, in the formulary used by the emperors in the first ages of the church, placing his own name before that of the pope: "Art thou ignorant, then, bishop of Rome, that thou holdest all thou possessest from the liberality of princes? Open history, and thou wilt fully convince thyself of this truth. Therefore, why should we be prohibited from exacting homage from him who holds his royalty from us? Is it because thou hast decided that this ceremony was useless? Render then to God that which is God's, and to Cæsar that which is Cæsar's. Thou complainest that our churches and cities are closed against thy cardinals; but would it be better, false bishop, that we should open our coffers to thy pillagers, to permit them to carry off our silver and gold? Are we then so very culpable, because we wish to place a bridle on thy insatiable avarice? When thy priests shall come to preach the holy maxims of the church, we will no longer interdict their entering our dwellings! Go to! we know too well the infamous morals of thy clergy, and we know that the demon of pride and avarice has seized for ever on the throne of the apostle. . . ."

This letter was given to officers who were to carry it to Rome, and who were to avail themselves of their mission to confer with the citizens as to the best means of seizing on the principal fortresses of the city; but this project was suspended by the death of Adrian, which took place on the 1st of September, 1159, in the city of Anagnina. His remains were transported to Rome, and deposited in the church of St. Peter. Conrad of Ursperg relates a very singular story about the death of the pontiff; he affirms, that on the day on which he wrote the bull of excommunication against Frederick Barbarossa, he drank a cup of water from a fountain in which there was accidentally an insect, which fastened on his throat, and ate the œsophagus, notwithstanding all the aid of the most skilful physicians. Other historians attribute his death to a quinsy.

During a reign of about five years, Adrian was occupied in increasing the domains and treasures of Saint Peter, and his avarice was so sordid, that he constantly refused to send the least aid to his relatives at Canterbury, preferring that they should live by alms and the charity of the parish priest, rather than see his purse diminish.

To judge of the spirit of reform during the second half of the twelfth century, it is sufficient to analyse two works which John of Salisbury published during the pontificate of Adrian. In the first, called Polycraticus, he treats of the amusements of the courtiers, and the vestiges of the philosophers; he condemns play, the chase, music, and the dance, which were the sole occupations of the lords; he blames the customs of courts in maintaining troops of buffoons, magicians, and astrologers; and, finally, expresses very singular ideas, for a priest, on the subject of regicide. "Not only," says the learned prelate, "is it permitted to put a king to death, but it is even just, even meritorious, to strike down a tyrant; for he who oppresses by the right of the sword, should perish by the sword. God, in the Holy Scriptures, commands the death of oppressors of the people, and the prophets have cited Jael and the beautiful Judith." His book terminates with maxims which recall to our minds those of Gregory the Seventh. He says, "that kings are subject to the church; that they receive from it the power to punish, as the executioner receives from justice the right to torture men, and that thus they are the instruments of the priesthood, since they exercise functions which would soil the hands of the priest."

In his second work, entitled Metalogicus, he treats of wholesome dialectics and true eloquence; he enumerates the great men who were his contemporaries, and criticises the rhetoricians and sophists with profound sagacity; he even attacks Aristotle, and points out the errors of that philosopher, whilst still showing himself to be an admirer of his writings.

ALEXANDER THE THIRD, THE ONE HUNDRED AND SEVENTY-FIFTH POPE.

VICTOR THE FOURTH, ANTI-POPE.

AFTER the death of Adrian, the bishops and cardinals assembled in the church of St. Peter, to proceed to the election of a pope. But a division having broken out in the conclave, they were obliged to separate, after having discussed it for three days, without coming to any conclusion. One party wished to choose Roland, the cardinal chancellor of the Roman church, because he openly favoured William the Bad against the emperor; another party wished to name the cardinal Octavian pope, because he supported the other side. At length both parties, wishing to put an end to the struggle between the two rivals, assembled a second time, in the church of St. Peter. At the commencement of the sitting, the partizans of Roland, exclaiming with one voice, "Roland is pontiff! Roland is pontiff!" clothed him with the purple cape, and proclaimed him by the name of Alexander the Third. This scandalous proceeding exasperated Octavian; in his rage, he fell upon his competitor, struck him a violent blow on his face, which drew blood, tore the cape from his shoulders, and would without doubt have finished him on the spot, but for the intervention of a senator, who cast himself between them.

When the tumult was quieted, the party of Octavian exclaimed in their turn, "Octavian is pope! Octavian is pope!" His chaplain immediately presented to him the cape which he had brought with him, and his haste to put it on was so great, that he placed the caponch, which should have gone behind, before, which excited the mirth of all the assistants. But, without being stopped by this, he opened the doors of the church, his partizans entered sword in hand, and he was enthroned by the name of Victor the Fourth. His competitor, and the cardinals of the opposite party, promptly escaped from the church, and took refuge in the fortress of Saint Peter, which was that same night invested by the troops of the anti-pope, who made them all prisoners.

Alexander was closely guarded for nine days in the castle of San Angelo; he was then transferred to a prison beyond the Tiber; but all the city being excited by the bad treatment to which he was subjected, Hector Frangipani placed himself at the head of the citizens, and freed him and the cardinals of his suite. They traversed Rome amid exclamations of joy and the ringing of bells, escorted by their liberators, who accompanied them as far as Sacra Nympha, four leagues from the holy city, where the pope was consecrated with the usual forms by the bishop of Ostia, assisted by five other bishops, and in the presence of the cardinals, abbots, priests, deacons, chanters, and seminarists of the Roman church. They placed on his head the tiara or mitre, which was round, and pointed in form of a cone, surmounted by two crowns; the assistants were then admitted to take the oath of fidelity and obedience to him.

Octavian, on his side, had attached a great number of bishops, cardinals, and priests to his party, and had been consecrated by the bishops of Tusculum, Mehu, and Ferentina.

During all these discussions, the emperor, not losing sight of his projects, continued to push his conquests in Lombardy; but whilst he was engaged at the siege of Cremona, he received an embassy from the holy father, and an order to suspend his expedition, if he did not wish to incur the censures of the church. Frederick not having made any reply, the pontiff proceeded at once to his excommunication in the city of Terracina, where he was at the time, and by the light of candles, and the tolling of bells, all the doors of the cathedral being opened, he solemnly anathematised the emperor and the anti-pope.

Frederick replied to the excommunication of the pontiff by the following circular letter, addressed to all the bishops and abbots of Italy: "We inform you, lords bishops, that, after having advised with a great number of prelates, doctors, and pious persons, we have determined, in accordance with the decretals of popes, and the canons of councils, that it was our duty, whenever a schism occurred in the Roman church, to call the two competitors who had been chosen pontiffs, into our presence, and to decide upon their pretensions, in accordance with the judgment of orthodox ecclesiastics. In consequence of this, we have ordered the cardinals Roland and Octavian, both chosen popes, to appear before us at Pavia; and we prohibit you from taking the part of either, until the council we are about to hold has decided between them."

Two envoys were sent to carry the citation to pope Alexander, at the city of Anagni, whither he had retired. This step alarmed the cardinals of his court; after mature deliberation, however, they resumed courage, and resolved not to abandon the pontiff, who had received their oaths of fidelity, and made the following reply to the envoys of Barbarossa. "We recognise in the emperor the avowed defender of the Roman church, and we desire to honour him as the greatest of earthly princes, unless indeed he shall pretend to elevate himself above the king of kings. We are, therefore, surprised that he has dared to convene a council without our authority, and to order the holy father into his presence, when he should know that the power of the popes is superior to that of princes. Teach him, that the church derives from Jesus Christ the power to judge all causes, without being herself submitted to the judgment of any one; tell him we cannot describe our astonishment at this privilege being attacked by the very sovereign who ought to defend it. Besides, canonical tradition, and the authority of the fathers, do not permit us to submit to his jurisdiction, and we should be guilty before God, if, through ignorance or weakness, we were to reduce the church to servitude. Our reply is, that we prefer undergoing every peril, rather than submit to such an encroachment." The two commissioners of Frederick immediately left Anagni and went to Segni, to the anti-pope, who evinced excellent dispositions towards the prince. Victor the Fourth was consequently recognised as the lawful successor of St. Peter in the kingdom of Germany.

Shortly afterwards took place the council of Pavia, which had been convened by the emperor. A great number of bishops, abbots, and priests from Germany and Lombardy were present at this synod, which was rendered still more imposing by the presence of the ambassadors of the kings of France and England, as well as by that of the deputies of other Christian princes. Frederick opened its sessions in the following speech—"Illustrious lords, we know that in our capacity as emperor, we have the right to preside over councils, especially when the church is in danger; nevertheless, from respect to this great assembly, in which we recognise the right of judging ourselves, we surrender to it the decision of the quarrels which distract Christendom." He then retired, in order to give the fathers entire freedom in their deliberations.

For five days the question was agitated, which of the two popes should be recognised as the lawful successor of St. Peter; at length, on the sixth, this piece of information, which was strangely wide from the truth, was produced. "The lord Octavian was solemnly clothed with the cape, in the church of St. Peter, on the demand of the clergy and the people; he was elevated to the pontifical chair in the presence of the chancellor Roland, without any one opposing his election; after which the cardinals and other ecclesiastics sang the Te Deum, and gave to the new pope the name of Victor. When the ceremonies of the consecration and the pierced chair had terminated, the clergy and principal citizens of Rome came in crowds to kiss his feet, and a secretary having mounted the tribune, exclaimed, according to custom; "Hear, ye Romans: our father the pontiff Octavian, has been dead for four days, and now the lord cardinal Octavian has been chosen to succeed him; he is clothed with the purple, and enthroned by the name of Victor the Fourth; do you approve of him?' All replied in a loud voice, and three different times, 'we do.' The pope was then conducted to the palace of the Lateran, with banderoles and other marks of his dignity, in the midst of universal acclamations, and the chapter of St Peter, as well the chiefs of the clergy of Rome, took the oath of obedience to him."

After the reading of this, they heard witnesses, who affirmed by oath the correctness of all the facts related in the writing; the council pronounced a judgment in favour of Octavian, and fulminated a decree of deposition against Roland. On the following day, the anti-pope was conducted in procession from the church of the Saviour to the cathedral church, where Frederick waited to hold his stirrup, whilst he dismounted from his horse; he led him by the hand up to the altar and kissed his feet. Candles were then distributed to all the assistants, and by their light, and to the ringing of bells, Victor the Fourth pronounced an anathema against the schismatic Roland.

The envoys of France and England alone refused to recognise him as pontiff, until they had referred the matter to their sovereigns. Notwithstanding this opposition, Frederick caused the decretals of the synod of Pavia to be published in all Christian courts, and ordered the bishops of the empire to obey pope Victor, under penalty of perpetual banishment; some prelates were self-condemned to exile, to avoid becoming schismatics, but the much larger number submitted to the wishes of the prince.

Alexander, exasperated against Frederick, excommunicated him a second time on holy Thursday, of the year 1160. Following the example of Gregory the Seventh, he declared all the subjects of the empire entirely freed from their oaths of fidelity; he also reiterated the anathema fulminated against Victor and his partizans, and sent legates to publish these bulls in all Christian kingdoms. By his intrigues he gained to his side Abbot of Alms, of the convent of Citeaux, St. Peter of Tarentaise, a monk of the same order, several French bishops, more than seven hundred abbots, and an incredible number of monks. His two legates, Anselmo and Geoffrey, by means of gold, presents, or promises, also determined all the Carthusian friars to embrace the cause of Alexander.

Victor convened a council at Lodi to resist this formidable opposition, at which were present the emperor, the duke of Bavaria, the lords of their courts, and a great number of bishops and priests. They at first read letters sent by the kings of Denmark, Norway, and Hungary, by several metropolitans and foreign bishops, recognising Victor as the sole and lawful chief of the church; they then pronounced the deposition of the archbishop of Mainz, and declared for Alexander, and maintained a siege against the troops of the emperor. The bishops of Placenza and of Brescia, with the consuls of those two cities, were also excommunicated; and finally they deposed the prelate of Bologna, and suspended him of Padua.

After the termination of the synod, Frederick returned to his camp, and urged the siege of Milan with such vigour, that the unfortunate inhabitants, finding themselves a prey to the most horrible famine, were obliged to surrender at discretion. The consuls presented themselves before the conquerors, having naked swords suspended from their necks, and crosses in their hands, asking for mercy! The prince spared their lives, but he razed the city without sparing the churches, and cast salt into a trench which he caused to be traced out, as a mark that he condemned the land to an eternal curse.

Whilst the anti-pope was holding his synod at Lodi, Alexander was pushing his way into Rome, to endeavour to instal himself there; but the family of Octavian was so powerful that he was compelled to leave it on the same day he entered it, to return into Campania, under the protection of the king of Sicily. The soldiers of Frederick soon pursued him, even into this retreat, and constrained him to seek another place of refuge. He then recollected that his predecessors, in their reverses, had always found in France imbecile kings disposed to employ the gold and blood of the people to replace them on the throne, he embarked at Terracina with his train, and sailed for Provence.

Montpelier was the first city which the holy father visited; he entered it in the imposing apparel of a victor, mounted on a white horse surrounded by his cardinals. A Saracen ambassador came to receive him, at the head of a brilliant escort of Moorish soldiers, bearing the crescent and singing the praises of Mohammed; the Mussulman humbly prostrated himself at the feet of the pontiff, offered him magnificent presents, and adored him as the God of the Christians. He then addressed him in Arabic—the holy father replied benevolently to him, and placed him on his right hand during the ceremonial.

As soon as king Louis was apprised that Alexander was at Montpelier, he sent Thibault, abbot of St. Germain des Prés, and a clerk of his chapel as deputies to him; but as these ambassadors carried no money for him, he received them with insulting disdain and even threatened to drive them from his presence if they should dare to reappear with empty hands. They returned to the monarch and rendered an account to him of what had passed at Montpelier; Louis, enraged at the pontiff, immediately wrote to Manasses, bishop of Orleans, to learn from the emperor the exact circumstances attending the election of Octavian and Roland the chancellor, as he repented having too easily recognised the pretensions of Alexander.

tried his competitor a third time, and went to Clermont in Auvergne, with the intention of excommunicating him a fourth time. But Frederick Barbarossa, being desirous of driving him from France, had addressed the following letter to Hubert of Champ-Fleury, bishop of Soissons, and chancellor of the kingdom. "We have been apprised, illustrious prelate, that the ecclesiastic Roland, to whom our servants have left no place of retreat in Italy, has escaped with some partizans, and taken refuge in the states of your master; be careful, most venerable prelate, that this unworthy schismatic does not despoil your provinces, for he is overwhelmed with debt, and will seek to extort money from your people to pay his creditors. We pray you then, as a matter of interest to your prince, to drive away this anti-pope and his cardinals, who are our mortal enemies, and who may excite between Louis and ourselves an enmity fatal to our subjects."

Whilst this message was on its way to the court of France, Henry, count of Champagne, was advising the emperor of the new intentions of Louis. Frederick then sent an ambassador to propose to the king a meeting of an equal number of French and German prelates, who should be instructed to decide on the validity of the elections of Alexander and Victor. This offer was accepted, and the small city of St. Jean de Laune in Burgundy, which was situated on the borders of Germany and France, was selected as the place of conference; the count of Champagne, the son-in-law of the king, and the friend of the emperor, was charged by the two monarchs to propose the principal questions which were to be submitted to the prelates, and he acquitted himself so well of his mission, that he determined the king to take the side of the anti-pope.

The following considerations prevailed with the court of France: "Illustrious prince," he wrote to Louis, "it is indispensable for the interests of your crown that the decisions of the assembly which you have convened should be irrevocable; consequently the emperor pledges himself if the election of Roland is decided to be canonical, to place himself at his feet. If that of Octavian is alone recognised as regular, I have engaged in your name to recognise him immediately as the lawful chief of the church. We have still further determined to appeal to the two competitors to meet, and he who shall refuse to present himself at the conference, shall for that act alone, be judged to be unworthy of the pontificate, and shall be deposed. As a guarantee for my promise, I have sworn on the host, that if you, after so solemn a proof, refuse to confirm the judgment of the fathers, I will at once pay obeisance to the emperor: that is, I will do him homage for all the fiefs I hold from your crown."

Before breaking entirely with the pope, Louis at the entreaty of some bishops, went to Souvigny, a priory of Cluny, to induce him to accompany him to the conference at Saint Jean de Laune; but Alexander obstinately refused to appear before the emperor, or even to go as far as Vergy, which was an impregnable castle. The king, irritated at his resistance, left him abruptly, saying to him—"It is very strange, holy father, that you who appear confident of the justice of your cause make such resistance to the judgment of a council." The pontiff immediately retired to the monastery of Bourg Dieu, near to Châteauroux in Berry, and the king was obliged to renounce going alone to Saint Jean de Laune, trusting to commissioners to procure a delay. The emperor arrived at Dole on the day appointed with Octavian. Both, without loss of time, advanced as far as the middle of the bridge of Saint Jean, and as no one appeared, they left a declaration of appeal attached by a dagger to the parapet of the bridge and returned to their camp.

On the next day, the representatives of Louis arrived at Saint Jean, to ask for a delay from the representatives of Frederick; on their refusal to grant one, the cardinals sent by Alexander to assist at this interview returned to Vezelay, delighted that the negotiations had been broken off. But the count of Champagne, who was truly attached to both monarchs, and who foresaw the disagreeable consequences of such a measure, immediately started for the camp of Frederick to re-establish concord between him and his father-in-law. He represented to the former, how silly it was that a pope should be a cause of war between two such powerful sovereigns, especially when a delay of a few days might bring about a favourable solution. Frederick finally permitted himself to be gained by his eloquence, and consented to wait for three weeks for the arrival of the king of France at Saint Jean de Laune.

Satisfied with his success, the count immediately hastened to Louis, at Dijon; he told him that he could no longer avoid going himself to the emperor, since he (the king) had not fulfilled his promises; but that, by urgent entreaty, he had obtained from Frederick a delay of three weeks, on the express condition that the sovereign of France should go to Saint Jean de Laune, taking Pope Alexander with him, and that he should submit to the judgment decreed by the fathers, under penalty of becoming a prisoner of the emperor's at Besançon. These conditions were extremely rigorous, but the king could not refuse them, seeing himself on the point of losing one of the great feudatories of his crown; he accepted them unreservedly, and gave as hostages to guarantee his word, the duke of Burgundy and the counts of Nevers and Flanders.

Two days afterwards Louis set out, and sent to inform the emperor that he was coming to confer with him on some preliminary points. Frederick, who was already discontented at the first breach of his word by the king, did not answer his letter, and sent Arnold, his chancellor, with full powers. Louis at first made some difficulty about entering into a conference with the commissioner of the em-peior; he then consented to it, provided the conventions should be reciprocal, and obligatory on both sovereigns, as had been originally arranged by the count of Champagne.

Arnold refused to take upon himself the responsibility of compromising the interests of the empire; declaring that his powers were sufficient to accept the promises of the king of France, but not to make them in the name of his master. Louis, delighted at finding an opportunity of disengaging his pledge, without losing his vassal, the count of Champagne, addressed the German and French lords, and said to them.—“You see, lords, that the emperor is not here, notwithstanding his promise to come; you are also witnesses that his commissioners desire to change the conditions of the treaty. I am thus freed from my engagements:” and immediately, without waiting for a reply, he mounted his horse and started off on a gallop. All hopes of an arrangement were now at an end, but the wary Victor availed himself of the negotiation of the count of Champagne with the emperor to increase the preponderance of his faction, and he wrote to Rome that the king of France had finally declared in his favour, and repudiated his competitor Roland, who had refused to appear at the conference at Saint Jean de Lanne.

In fact, Alexander having been apprised of the bad success of the negotiations, and fearing the anger of the king of France, had quitted Cluny to take refuge in Aquitaine, a province which was dependent on the king of England, who had already recognised him as pope. Henry on hearing of his arrival in his states, went as far as the monastery of Bourg Dieu to receive him; he prostrated himself humbly at his feet, kissed his sandals, and though the holy father urged him to take it, refused the seat which had been prepared for him by his side, and seated himself on the earth. After three days of secret conferences, the English monarch took his leave of the pontiff, promising him to determine the king of France to submit to him; which happened. At the close of the negotiations, the pope obtained permission to go to Coucy-sur-Loire, to receive the homage of Louis and Henry. The two princes gave him a magnificent reception; they conducted him as far as the palace, walking on foot, and holding on each side the reins of his horse, two kings thus serving as squires, which had never before happened to any of his predecessors.

In the beginning of the following Lent, the pope held a council at Tours, at which almost all the bishops of France and England were present. Arnold, bishop of Lissieux, was charged to deliver an address, or kind of sermon, which Alexander had composed, to exhort the assembly vigorously to oppose the schismatics, and restore unity to the church. The following is one of the passages of this long homily: “Rome, my brethren, should rule all the kings of the earth; and notwithstanding all their efforts to divide and subjugate it, it will remain one, and will reject its enemies from its bosom. Unity will not be broken, because several popes shall be appointed; on the contrary, those who have desired to weaken it by dividing it, will find themselves stricken by the sword of the Spirit. Rome will come forth glorious and triumphant from all these struggles; and we shall soon see its oppressors, beaten down at its feet, recognise it as the mistress of the world. The emperor, that man whose wrath is as terrible as thunder, and whose arm is more dreadful than whole legions, Frederick Barbarossa himself, will bow his forehead in the dust, exclaiming, ‘Rome, thou conquerest! Thy power exceeds that of Cæsar, for it comes from God.’ Then the bold champions who have combated and suffered to assure victory to the church, will be recompensed; then those who have cowardly abandoned the field of battle, will be blighted and condemned. Let us strive, my brethren, with perseverance and vigour; let us boldly expose our wealth, our liberty, even our lives, in this thrice holy war.”

The synod made several canons, and renewed the oath of obedience to the pontiff, as well as the anathema against the anti-pope and the emperor. After that, the ambassadors of the kings of France and England proposed to the pope to designate the city he would prefer for his residence. He selected the metropolitan city of Sens, which was situated in a fertile and pleasant country; he remained there almost two years, holding a mimic court, and sending his bulls through all kingdoms, as if he had been in the palace of the Lateran.

At length, the anti-pope Victor died at Lucca, on the 22d of April, 1164. Petrus Blesensis says, in his history, that Octavian was solely occupied during his life in increasing his wealth, “in which,” adds the historian, “he did well; for with gold he was enabled to purchase the consciences of priests, prelates, princes, and kings, who permitted him tranquilly to govern the churches of Italy.” Victor the Fourth was vain and proud, and caused himself to be adored as an idol. He had a great aversion for the poor and beggars, and took a certain pleasure in mortifying the afflicted. After his death, the canons of the cathedral of Lucca, and those of Saint Erigdian refused to inter him in their churches, declaring that they would rather abandon them than receive the body of a damned person. They buried him in a monastery, situated without the city, where it was afterwards pretended that he performed many miracles. The funeral ceremonies being terminated, his partizans met and chose, as his successor, the cardinal Guy of Crema, who was proclaimed sovereign pontiff by the name of Pascal the Third. This election was confirmed in Germany by the emperor, who sent Henry, bishop of Liege, to Lucca to consecrate the new pope.

But in the meanwhile, affairs changed; on the one side the partizans of Alexander spread gold through Rome, subsidised all the bandits of the city, and prepared a revolution in favour of the pontiff; on the other, the emperor, by his exactions and cruelties, excited against himself a powerful league through all the Lombard cities, which, since the commencement of the century, had little by little constituted themselves into small independent republics, at the head of which was Venice.

Alexander, seeing a powerful party rise up in opposition to Frederick, determined to return to the holy city, where his party waited to decree to him the honours of a triumph; but as he was unwilling to return to Italy without leaving behind him a remembrance of his journey through France, he imposed a collection on the churches, obtained loans from all the monasteries, and finally embarked with the spoils of a people who had accorded to him so generous an hospitality.

After a passage of fifteen days, the holy father disembarked at Messina, in the states of the king of Sicily, who had already recognised him as his lord. William treated him as the successor of Saint Peter, sent him to Palermo with rich presents, and armed a red galley, magnificently adorned, which he destined for him, and four others less sumptuous, which were to transport the cardinals, bishops, and lords of his suite. Alexander arrived at Ostia with his retinue, where he was joined by a multitude of nobles, senators, clergymen, and citizens, bearing branches of olives. He mounted the Tiber, escorted in triumph by the holy standard bearers, with their ensigns displayed, and in the midst of a crowd of squires, secretaries, advocates and judges, who followed the progress of his vessel, on either bank of the river; the schools, even the Jews, bearing, as was their custom, the book of the law under their arms, followed this immense procession. On arriving at Rome, the pope descended from his vessel, and went towards the pontifical residence, conducted by many young girls, who sang sacred hymns in his honour; between each verse he was saluted by the thundering acclamations of the crowd; at last he entered the palace of the Lateran, and seated himself on the chair of St. Peter; the day closed with a splendid banquet, at which the principal members of the nobility, magistracy, and clergy assisted.

On the following day, the pontiff wrote to the princes of his party, to advise them of his happy installation, with the exception of Henry of England, his relations with that prince having been entirely broken off. This king was too skilful a politician to allow his kingdom to be subjected to the aristocracy of the lords and the government of priests. He had at first made war with the nobles, dismantled their castles, sacked their domains, and rendered them powerless to renew their seditions; that done, he had directed all his efforts against the priests, and particularly against Thomas Becket, archbishop of Canterbury, the most elevated ecclesiastic in dignity in the kingdom, who endeavoured to increase the authority of the clergy at the expense of the crown. Henry, discontented with this priest, had caused him to be arrested in his metropolis, and had constrained him to swear to the constitution of Clarendon, in which the nobility and the church admitted that they held their privileges from the king.

Becket had no sooner, however, recovered his liberty, than he retracted his oath and took refuge with the pope. Alexander interfered in the quarrel, threatening to lanch an anathema against the prince, and place the kingdom of England under interdict, if the archbishop of Canterbury was not immediately re-instated in his see, and if the king wished to exact an oath from him, contrary to religious freedom. Henry, fearful of some rising among his people, in consequence of the superstitious ideas of the period in regard to excommunications, submitted to the orders of the pontiff, and permitted Becket to re-appear at his court. The latter, proud of having triumphed over his king, placed no bounds to his audacity. He openly persecuted those who had declared against him; anathematising some, and deposing others, by virtue of the illimitable power he had received from the pope. He even attacked in preference the favourites of the sovereign, and refused to obey him in the most indifferent affairs, under pretext that he was prohibited from touching the privileges of the church.

At last the king, fatigued by this constant strife, suffered complaints to escape him, and exclaimed, "How unfortunate I am in not having a friend who dares avenge me for the insults of a miserable priest." These words, pronounced with bitterness, made an impression on four young lords, who concerted among themselves to deliver the prince from his enemy. For this purpose they went secretly to Canterbury; and, at the moment when the archbishop was leaving his palace to go to church, they suddenly attacked him, and pierced him with nine blows of their daggers. This murder spread general grief among the clergy of Great Britain; all the churches were hung in black; Thomas Becket was declared a martyr; a magnificent tomb was reared to his memory; and he was canonised by the name of St. Thomas of Canterbury.

Henry, alarmed at this manifestation, feigned to be much grieved by the death of the metropolitan. He immediately sent deputies to Italy to plead his cause with the holy father, and to prevent any anathema from being fulminated against Great Britain. But the pope had been already apprised of it by Gallic prelates and by Walter Flaman, who had gone to Rome to demand justice for the assassination of the archbishop. Alexander refused to permit the English envoys to enter the holy city. He manifested an extreme affliction for the unfortunate Thomas, and loudly reproached himself before the cardinals for not having sustained with sufficient vigour the cause of the church, for which Thomas had merited the palm of martyrdom. Arnolph, one of the ambassadors of the prince, fearful lest the pope should immediately pronounce a sentence of excommunication against Henry, resolved to go to Tusculum, where Alexander was. Not only did the pontiff refuse to receive him, but the cardinals scarcely deigned to speak to him.

At last, by urgency and presents, he obtained an audience of the holy father. As soon as he had pronounced the name of the king of England, all the ecclesiastics exclaimed: "Stop! stop!" as if Alexander could not hear it without horror. This first interview was without any result; but in the evening, having had the happy inspiration to bribe cardinals and chamberlains, he obtained a private audience. Arnolph gave to him a faithful recital of what had occurred at Canterbury. He recalled the benefits which the king had heaped on Becket, and the injuries with which the latter had repaid the kindness of the monarch. The pope listened very attentively to the ambassador, and put him off until Holy Thursday, a day consecrated to excommunications, without apprising him at all of his intentions.

At last the terrible day arrived. Arnolph had, in the mean time, skilfully gained some members of the sacred college by gold, who informed him that he, the holy father, would in the presence of his clergy, on that very evening, pronounce the anathema against Henry and all his states. Arnolph, without losing any time, at once despatched the following protest: "We are instructed by the king, our master, to swear in your presence, most holy father, that he will defer entirely to your orders for the punishment which you shall judge necessary to inflict on the guilty, and we protest his innocence."

The cardinals decided that after such an absolute mark of submission, they could not excommunicate the king. Orders were immediately given to introduce the metropolitan of York and the bishops of Salisbury and London, who were without the walls of the city, and they made them swear on the Bible that such were the intentions of the monarch. After this, Alexander pronounced a general anathema against the murderers of the martyr St. Thomas Becket, and against all who had given them counsel, aid, assistance, or consent, or who had procured an asylum and succour for them. He confirmed the sentence of interdict which the archbishop of Sens had fulminated against the territories of England on the continent; he anathematised all the bishops of the kingdom, and suspended them from the exercise of their episcopal functions until the guilty were punished; and announced that he would send legates to see that these decrees were fully executed. The ambassadors, however, before quitting Rome, prevailed on him to raise the excommunication pronounced against the English clergy in a month, if his nuncios had not, by that time, passed the Alps.

Henry, apprised of the hostile intentions of Alexander, and fearful of treason, hastened to go to England, and closely watched the ports and shores of the island to arrest all strangers who were the bearers of the interdict. He then assembled troops at Portsmouth, and went to Ireland with a fleet of four hundred sail to take possession of the country before the arrival of the legate, and went to Waterford, where the kings of Cork, Limerick, Ulster, and Mida, with all the lords of Ireland, who had come to do homage to him. The king of Connaught, who regarded himself as an independent sovereign, was alone absent from the meeting, declaring, through his ambassador, that he would not take an oath of obedience and fidelity to Henry.

After some useless conferences, Henry determined to subdue him by force of arms. He pursued him, drove him from all his towns, and would have certainly destroyed him in a final battle, when he was informed of the arrival of the legates in Normandy. At once, and as if from the effect of a thunderbolt, all his energy left him; he became feeble and trembling before the censures of the Vatican, quitted his army, and embarked for Normandy to obtain his pardon from the envoys of the holy father. The latter at first refused to receive him; then they permitted themselves to be softened by his supplications, and especially by his presents. They however exacted, that before being admitted to their presence he should make a public confession of all his sins in the form of an apology. Henry was base enough to assent to it, and pronounced the following words upon the Bible:

"I neither meditated nor ordered the death of St. Thomas of Canterbury; and when I was informed of the crime, I was more profoundly afflicted than if I had lost my own son. I however avow that I was the involuntary cause of the murder from the hatred which I felt towards that holy martyr. Therefore, being desirous of repenting my fault, I engage to send to Jerusalem two hundred knights, who shall serve for a year at my expense; and, if the pope exacts it, I will myself take the cross, and make the journey to Palestine. I stop for ever the unlawful customs which I have introduced against the churches, and will hereafter permit my prelates to carry their appeals to the court of Rome. I will restore to the archbishopric of Canterbury all the lands and other properties which were dependent on it before the disgrace of Thomas Becket, and will pardon the defenders of that prelate. I will submit myself to such fasts, alms, and other penal works, as the pope shall impose upon me; and I will go with naked feet to the tomb of the martyr, to receive flagellation from the hands of the monks. Finally I swear to submit always to the Roman church."

The legates made the son of Henry take the same oath, who pledged himself to fulfil the promises of his father, if the latter perjured himself. They then presented to the sovereign his deed of submission, to which he affixed the royal seal. This affair having been terminated, they proceeded to the nomination of an archbishop of Canterbury, and the king was admitted to the communion.

Since his return to the holy city, Alexander had enjoyed the supreme authority in full security; but at the end of the year 1166 the emperor determined to re-enter Italy to drive away the pontiff and establish the anti-pope in the palace of the Lateran. For this purpose he instructed the metropolitans Rinaldus and Christian, his generals, to ravage Lombardy and advance on Rome with their divisions, whilst he himself besieged Ancona. This invasion alarmed the court of the holy father, and their fear was the greater, as the Germans, having rendered themselves masters of the neighbouring cities, kept the field and gained ground. In Rome even, parties began to move, and a great number of nobles, magistrates, and citizens, gained by the gold of the enemy, traversed the streets of the city uttering seditious cries. Alexander, on his side, sought to strengthen his party by lavishing his treasures on the Roman clergy; but those corrupt and hypocritical priests profited by the circumstances to increase their wealth, and received presents from the pontiff and the prince whilst betraying both.

In the midst of these troubles Jourdain, the son of Robert, prince of Capua, came to Rome as ambassador from Manuel Comnenus, to offer to Pope Alexander the aid of the Greek emperor against the king of Germany. He pledged himself in the name of Comnenus, to re-establish the unity between the Greek and Latin churches as it had subsisted in the best ages of Christianity, so that the Greeks and Latins should in future form but one people, submitted to one religious chief. He only asked in exchange for his protection, that the pontiff should consent to restore to him the imperial crown, which had been snatched from him by the emperor of Germany. Although it might appear difficult for that prince to collect an army to aid the Holy See, still Alexander, by the advice of his cardinals, sent the bishop of Ostia, and the cardinals of St. John and St. Paul as deputies to Manuel, to open serious negotiations. On the other hand, Frederick Barbarossa found himself arrested in his march by the troops of the confederated republics, who had assembled on the old territory of Milan to protect the citizens of that city, who were reconstructing their ramparts. The holy father at last, very fortunately, received considerable sums which William the Bad had bequeathed to him. This money, distributed among the nobles and the priests, caused the balance to bend in his favour; an army of at least forty thousand men was immediately organised, the neighbouring cities were retaken from his enemies, and an attack was pushed even as far as Tusculum, which had declared for the emperor.

Christian, who commanded the place for the emperor, endeavoured, in vain, to defend the city with his division, composed of Flemings and Brabançons; his soldiers were hurled down, and the papal army was already planting its flag on the ramparts when the archbishop Rinaldus arrived at the head of a powerful body of cavalry. The intrepid prelate charged the enemy, trampled them under feet in the great plain, made a dreadful massacre of them, and entirely freed Tusculum. On the news of this victory, the emperor quit- ted the city of Ancona, on which he had seized, hastened his march, and came to encamp before Rome with all his army. Three assaults were sufficient to render him master of the lower part of the city, and of the castle of San Angelo. As he could not storm the church of St. Peter, he set it on fire and forced all its defenders to surrender.

The pope had at first maintained himself in the palace of the Lateran; then fearing lest his place of retreat should be forced, he had taken refuge in the fortified castles of the Frangipani, from whence he kindled the fire of revolt, by distributing among the people fresh sums, which William the Good, the new king of Sicily, had sent him. Rome was defended by a fanatical multitude, who obstinately disputed every house, every street, every place which Frederick attacked. At last the prince being convinced of the impossibility of seizing the person of the pope by force, determined to enter into negotiations with the clergy and magistrates. He told them that if Roland would consent to renounce the pontificate, without prejudice to his episcopal ordination, he would engage that Pascal would do the same, and that then they might all proceed together to the election of a new pope. On these conditions the prince promised to the church a durable peace, to restore to the Romans all the prisoners and all the booty he had made, and, finally, in future not to interpose his authority in the election of the pontiffs.

These proposals appeared very wise to the citizens who were tired of the war, and they replied to the envoys of the prince that they would accept them, and compel Alexander to ratify the engagements. But the impracticable pontiff refused to hear any proposals, uttered horrid blasphemies, and swore he would never renounce the pontifical throne, his obstinacy detached all his partizans from his cause, and he was obliged to quit Rome secretly in the garb of a pilgrim to avoid falling into the hands of his enemies. He went to Terracina, thence to Gaëta and finally to Beneventum.

Pascal, after the flight of his competitor, celebrated a solemn mass at Saint Peter's, and consecrated the emperor and the empress Beatrice, his wife, placing on their foreheads crowns of gold, adorned with precious stones. The Romans also consented to take the oath of fidelity and obedience to Frederick, and to recognise Pascal as the lawful pontiff, on condition that the prince would ratify the first proposals which he had made to them. All things were agreed to on both sides, and the emperor sent commissioners from the other side of the Tiber to receive the oath of the Romans.

This day, however, became the prelude to a succession of terrible reverses for the Germans; the historian Acerbo Morena, who relates the details of this affair, was himself one of the deputies. "We were in the month of August," says he, "at a period of the greatest heat; scarcely had we crossed the river when a dreadful storm suddenly occurred, the hail fell in torrents, and, in a few minutes, the country was changed into a immense lake, and two hours afterwards the sun re-appeared beneath a heaven of fire. These sudden transitions of temperature struck all the army as if supernaturally; an epidemic broke out in the camp, and on the following day, when we returned from Rome, the mortality was so frightful that we could no longer bury the dead who fell beneath the scourge. In less than a month, this epidemic carried off one half of the German troops, and forced Frederick to remove from Rome. Alexander immediately left Beneventum and returned to the holy city, publishing every where that the hand of God had struck the sacrilegious prince. At his call the people of Lombardy rose in mass and fell on the Germans—the Milanese especially showed themselves most bitter in this war of extermination. Frederick, reduced to the last extremities, and having no longer but a very small number of troops, saw himself hemmed in in Italy without hope of escape; he then determined to dissimulate, and demanded a truce in order to negotiate with Alexander; but pending the conference he sent his relative, the Count de Muriene, secretly, who obtained a passage for him through the territory of the marquis of Mont Serrat. Under favour of a disguise, the emperor left his camp in the month of March, 1168, traversed the country of Burgundy, and arrived safely in Germany, where he made new preparations to return to Italy with a formidable army."

Pascal the Third had still remained in Rome, where he courageously maintained himself in the church of St. Peter; but in the month of September of that year, in consequence of an excess at table, he was attacked by a disease which carried him off in a few days. His party chose as his successor, John, abbot of Strum, bishop of Albano, whose morals were worse than his, and who was enthroned by the name of Calixtus the Third; notwithstanding the approval of his election by Frederick, the new pope was unable to maintain himself in Rome, but was obliged to wander about among the cities of Italy.

Alexander continued proudly to occupy the palace of the Lateran, and was engaged in repairing the loss of his treasures, "a thing which he understood marvellously well" say the chronicles. Falcand relates a very singular anecdote on this subject; he says Gauthier, the chaplain and preceptor of the king of Sicily, had been promoted to the archbishopric of Palermo, without the consent of the clergy of that church, who rejected his election as simoniacal and sacrilegious. Complaints had been made to Rome of this appointment, and the queen herself, who wished to give this important see to the chancellor Stephen, one of her lovers, had urged the pope to annul the election; Alexander replied through the cardinal of Gaëta, his legate, that the princess had but to count down a thousand ounces of gold and he would at once annul the nomination of Gauthier. In the mean time, the latter having been informed by the pope of the efforts against him, hastened to send to Rome an ecclesiastic of Palermo and two lords, who handed over to the holy father, from the archbishop, two thousand ounces of gold. Alexander, who had already accepted the thousand ounces from the queen to depose Gauthier, then received from the prelate this sum, which was double the first, to maintain him in his see, and he insolently replied to the princess, that the archbishop of Palermo had produced arguments of great weight against her, and that he awaited her reply. The queen was unwilling to continue this strife, and renounced the hope of seeing her favourite on the see of Palermo."

History has preserved a letter of Alexander, addressed to the sultan of Iconium. "We have been apprised by your letters, and by the relation of the faithful, who have visited your kingdom," wrote the holy father, "that you are desirous of being converted to the Christian faith, and that you have already received the pentateuch of Moses, the prophecies of Isaiah and Jeremiah, the epistles of Saint Paul, and the gospels of Saint John and Saint Matthew. We send you, in order to complete your instruction in our religion, a complete exposition of its dogmas, morality, and worship, and we charge our delegates to explain them to you." We are ignorant of the result of this mission.

Albert, archbishop of Saltzburg, had for a long time declared in favour of Pope Alexander, notwithstanding the attempts of the emperor to bring him over to his party. Frederick at length, weary of his obstinacy, determined to take energetic measures, and caused him to be solemnly deposed by the diet at Ratisbon. The metropolitan immediately sent Erchempold, his chaplain, a canon of Reicherperg, to the court of Rome, to complain of the prince and the prelates of Germany. Alexander annulled the decision of the diet, anathematised the intruder in the see of Saltzburg, and declared Albert to be the sole legitimate prelate of that city.

About the same period, a singular quarrel took place in England between an abbot of Malmesbury, and the bishop of Salisbury, his diocesan, in regard to the abbatial benediction, which the prelate wished to sell at too high a price. The monk wishing to buy it for less, went to Wales, and was blessed by the bishop of Llandaff, who was more accommodating. A complaint was immediately made against the monk to the archbishop of Canterbury, by his diocesan, who condemned him to pay his diocesan for a second blessing. Whilst, however, rendering this sentence, the archbishop of Canterbury said, "Abbots are very cowardly, or very miserable, since for an ounce of gold a year they can annihilate the power of the bishops, and obtain an entire independence from the pope." In fact, simony was carried so far at the court of Rome, that the French monks, and especially the regular abbots, obtained for money all kinds of imaginable dispensations, and even purchased the right of dissipating the wealth of their monasteries in shameful debaucheries.

Since the rout of Frederick, Alexander had consolidated his power; he governed his church without the anti-pope dreaming of disturbing him, and most of the Lombard cities recognised his authority. A single city had been able to repulse the attacks of the enemies of the Holy See; it was Alexandria, which was recently built by the Milanese in honour of the pope. The Germans experienced from it the shame of a defeat, and Alexandria had come out of the strife victorious. The holy father, from gratitude, erected it into a bishopric.

Frederick wished to take revenge, and after having repaired the losses he had suffered, entered Italy, for the fifth time, at the head of a numerous army. He pushed into the Milanese, ravaged that province, and put all to fire and sword. The confederated states assembled their troops with equal rapidity, marched to meet him, and engaged him in a furious battle, in which the Germans were cut to pieces. The emperor himself had his horse slain under him, and barely escaped from the strife. This last victory was fatal to the empire, and exalted the pride of the Roman church to the highest point.

Heis says that the emperor was overwhelmed by this new check. "Having been accustomed to conquer and reign in the midst of laurels," adds the German historian, "Frederick, whose character was indomitable, saw himself, by a single blow, compelled to bend before necessity, and to abandon a party which he had sustained for sixteen years against all Christendom. But what still added to his humiliation, was seeing most of the princes of Germany separate themselves from his cause to embrace the interests of the sovereign pontiff. The powerful duke of Saxony and Bavaria, urged on by Alexander, who engaged him to invade Germany to conquer it, showed himself one of his most ardent foes. Frederick, who knew all the plans of his adversaries, saw well that his ruin was imminent; not only were his armies destroyed, but even prince Henry, his oldest son, who commanded his fleet against the Venetians, had been conquered by the generals of the republic; all his vessels had been taken, and he himself made prisoner."

Frederick, however, waited until his generals had obtained some advantages, in order to commence negotiations with the Holy See; and chose as his ambassadors, the metropolitans of Mayence and Magdeburg, and the bishop of Worms, to whom he gave full powers to conclude a definite peace between the church and the empire. They went to Anagni, the residence of the pope, where they were received with great demonstrations of joy. "We have waited for a long time for you, my brethren," said Alexander to them on their entrance, "and we feel a sweet satisfaction at your arrival; for we could hear no more agreeable news in this world, than that of peace between the altar and the throne. If the intentions of your sovereign are sincere, we will recognise him as the greatest of the princes of the earth. But that our union be durable, he must also grant peace to our allies, and especially to the king of Sicily, the Lombards, and the emperor of Constantinople."

Whilst the German ambassadors were treating with the pontiff, Frederick continued the war against the confederate cities; he even gained a great victory, which induced him to hope he might re-establish his affairs by force of arms, and he determined to suspend at once the negotiations which had taken place between his envoys and the holy father. These prelates, who had been already gained over by Alexander, represented to him that this rupture would excite general discontent against him, and as he replied that his resolution could not be shaken, they declared that nothing was left for them, but to retire to their dioceses, from whence they would assist him with their counsels, as they had sworn to do; but that his power extending only over temporal things, they were determined, for the salvation of their souls, to recognise Pope Alexander as the true chief of the church. Frederick, who feared the consequences of such a determination, then appeared to yield to their urgency, and said to them, "That it was but right for a king to conform to the sentiments of his ministers, and the princes of the empire." In fact, on the next day he went to Venice to conclude a definite peace with the pontiff, and especially to obtain the liberation of his son.

Fortunatus Ulmus relates, in the following terms, the humiliating ceremony to which this prince was obliged to submit. "When the emperor arrived in the presence of the pope," says the historian, "he laid aside his imperial mantle, and knelt on both knees with his breast to the earth; Alexander advanced and placed his foot on his neck, whilst the cardinals thundered forth in loud tones, 'Thou shalt tread upon the cockatrice, and crush the lion and the dragon.' Frederick exclaimed; 'Pontiff, this prediction was made of St. Peter and not of thee!' 'Thou liest,' replied Alexander; 'it is written of the apostle and of me;' and bearing all the weight of his body on the neck of the prince, he compelled him to silence; he then permitted him to rise and gave him his blessing, after which the whole assembly thundered forth the Te Deum."

Peace was concluded and signed on the same evening. On the next day, Alexander celebrated a solemn mass at St. Mark's, when Frederick, with a rod in his hand, performed the duties of a beadle, preceding the holy father, and causing the laity to stand aside. He remained without in the choir, with the German prelates and clergy, who chanted the service. The pope mounted the pulpit on the left side of the altar, and delivered a sermon on the concord which had been established between the two powers, touching with pride in the predomance of the sword of St. Peter over that of Cæsar. After the sermo, the emperor came with all his train to prostrate himself before the pope, and to kiss his feet; and, finally, when the mass was finished, the holy father mounted his horse to return to his palace, and Frederick conducted him on foot, holding his horse by the bridle.

Six days afterwards, peace was solemnly sworn to in the great hall of the doge's palace. The pope presided over the assembly; he was placed on a throne above the bishops and cardinals with the prince on his right hand. He pronounced a long discourse, in which he testified the joy he felt at the conversion of the emperor, and declared that he received him with open arms into the bosom of the church, as his dear son. Frederick in turn rose from his seat, laid off his imperial mantle, and loudly declared that he admitted he had been deceived by perfidious counsellors, and accused himself of having persecuted the church whilst he thought he was defending it; he thanked God for having drawn him from this error, and swore that he abandoned the schism; that he recognised Alexander as the lawful head of the church, and that he granted peace to the king of Sicily and the people of Lombardy.

The holy Gospels, the relics, and a piece of the true cross, were brought in, and by orders of the emperor, Henry, count of Dieppe, swore by the soul of Frederick Barbarossa, that he would always maintain peace with the church, that he would grant a truce of fifteen years to the king of Sicily, and another of six years to the cities of Lombardy. Twelve princes of the empire took the same oath. On their side, the ambassadors of Sicily and the deputies of the Lombards, swore faithfully to observe the conditions of the treaty. The holy father then granted absolution to the emperor, and entirely freed him from the anathema.

In the acts which relate these proceedings it is remarkable that Frederick was only absolved from the excommunication which he had incurred as a schismatic, and that no mention is made of his reinstatement as if having been deposed by the Holy See.

After the oath had been taken, the German lords came each in their turn to abjure the heresy at the feet of the pope and receive absolution. Alexander then announced that he would hold a council in the church of St. Mark's on the Sunday of the following week. The German and Lombard prelates, the cardinals, emperor and doge, with the Sicilian ambassadors, composed this magnificent assembly. The session was commenced with the prayers from the litany and a discourse from the holy father. After this all the assistants received lighted candles, and the pontiff lanced a terrible excommunication from the pulpit against those who, in future, should dare to trouble the peace which had been sworn to. The candles were then all extinguished, and the assistants sprang to their feet exclaiming, "Amen."

Such was the termination of this bloody quarrel, brought on by the insatiable ambition of an emperor, and maintained by the indomitable pride of a pope. The people, the passive instruments of tyranny, found the chains of slavery still heavier.

Before leaving Venice the prince and the pontiff appointed three commissioners to proceed to the restitution of the territories of the church which the emperor had conquered. Frederick at last bade farewell to Alexander and returned to Césena; the pope embarked with his train on the Venetian galleys for Lepanto; from thence he went to Troja, thence to Beneventum, and finally, to Anagni, which he entered on the 14th of December, 1176, after an absence of a year.

The anti-pope Calixtus, having heard of the abjuration of the emperor, went to the holy father with some ecclesiastics, and in the presence of cardinals and bishops he abjured the schism, took the oath of fidelity, and implored his pardon. Alexander did not reproach him, but declared, on the contrary, that the Roman church received him with joy and rendered to him good for evil; he afterwards treated him with much distinction and frequently admitted him to his table.

The schism was not, however, entirely extinguished; and some obstinate persons who refused to recognise the holy father, chose in the room of Calixtus, Landositino, of the family of the Frangipani, and proclaimed him by the name of Innocent the Third. A Roman knight, a brother of Octavian, took him under his protection and gave him the castle of Palombara, an impregnable fortress which he had near Rome. But, faithful to his policy of corruption, the pontiff offered the knight a large sum for his castle and all it contained; the unworthy lord accepted the offer, and sold the fortress. Landositino was plunged into the dungeons of Cava, subjected to frightful tortures, and finally strangled. Thus was entirely terminated the schism which had for twenty years desolated Italy, France, and Germany.

In the midst of all the disorders caused by the wars, grievous abuses had been introduced into the church; the pope, under the pretext of putting an end to them, convened a general council at Rome, for the first Sunday of Lent, in the year 1179. In his letter of convocation, Alexander informed the prelates of Italy that their presence at the synod was obligatory, which did not render them more punctual; for all knew that councils were only a mode employed by the pope to levy imposts on bishops and abbots, who preferred to purchase with gold the right of not abandoning their habits of sloth and debauchery. On the appointed day, the assembly, though not very numerous, assembled in the church of the Lateran; the pope was placed on a platform with the cardinals, prefects, senators, and consuls of Rome.

Several canons were made to prevent schisms in the election of popes; they decided that a vote of two thirds of the members of the sacred college was indispensable to render the promotion regular; and that an ecclesiastic not having obtained them, who should, however, assume the title of pope, should be deprived of sacred orders and be excommunicated until his death, as well as all those who should have recognised him. It was then engaged about the alienations of ecclesiastical property; it declared those prelates suspended from sacred orders and episcopal dignity who obliged their suffragans and their diocesans to pledge the revenues of the churches to give them fêtes, or to treat them magnificently, when they made their pastoral inspection. In fact, many of the bishops traversed their dioceses several times a year with all their household, and caused the priests and monks to lodge them, in order to husband their revenues.

Among the different canons made by the council of the Lateran, the last is unquestionably the most remarkable, since it is the decree which laid the foundation of the terrible inquisition. It runs thus: "The church, as the holy Leo saith, whilst it rejects bloody executions from its code of morals, does not admit them in practice, because the fear of corporal punishments sometimes causes sinners to recur to spiritual remedies. Thus the heretics who are called Catharins, Patarins, or Publicans are so strongly fortified in Gascony, among the Albigenses, and in the territory of Toulouse, that they no longer conceal themselves, but openly teach their errors; it is on that account we anathematise them as well as those who grant them an asylum or protection; and if they die in their sin, we prohibit oblations being made for them, or sepulture being granted to them. As for the Brabançons, Arragonese, Navarese, Basques, Cotterels, Triabechins, who respect neither churches nor monasteries, who spare neither widow nor orphan, nor age nor sex, and who pillage plains and cities, we also order those who shall receive, protect or lodge them, to be denounced and excommunicated in all the churches at the solemn feasts; nor do we permit them to be absolved, until after they shall have taken up arms against these abominable Albigenses. We also declare, the faithful who are bound to them by any treaties, to be entirely freed from their oaths; and we enjoin on them for the remission of their sins, to be wanting in faith to these execrable heretics, to confiscate their goods, reduce them to slavery, and put to death all who are unwilling to be converted. We grant to all Christians who shall take up arms against the Catharins, the same indulgences as to the faithful who take the cross for the holy sepulchre."

This infamous decree, and the furious preachings of the legates of the Holy See, excited so well the superstitious zeal of the kings of England and France, that these two monarchs resolved to go in person to convert the heretics or exterminate them. The advice, however, of some lords, prevented these tyrants from directing this sacrilegious crusade in person: and they confided the execution of it to bishops, under the direction of the Roman legate, Peter Chrysogonus.

In his history of the Vandois, Perrin relates the origin of this heresy, and of the terrible consequences which it produced in the south of France. "In the year of our Lord 1160, the penalty of death was pronounced against those who did not believe in the literal interpretation of the sacramental words pronounced by the priest over the eucharist: that is, that Christ was really in the host, in the form of bread with the tenuity and whiteness of that substance, yet preserving the primitive grossness and form of his body, when it was placed on the cross; it was also ordered, under the same penalty, to adore the host, to tapestry the streets on the days of procession, to go on the knees before it, to call it God, and to strike the breast.

"Peter Valdo, a citizen of Lyons, courageously opposed these new superstitions; he spoke against the clergy and the abominations which had crept into the bosom of the Roman church, saying that the pope had abandoned the Christian faith, that the holy city was the prostitute Babylon, the sterile fig-tree which God had cursed, and that they must no longer obey the pope, nor believe him infallible; that the monkish race was a putrid and pestilential body; and that their vows were the fatal marks of the beast of the Apocalypse. He, finally, unmasked the knaveries of the priests, showing that purgatory, masses, the dedication of churches, the veneration of saints, the commemoration of the dead, were but the inventions of the clergy to extort money from the simple. Valdo assembled a numerous audience at all his harangues, as he was held in great esteem in the country on account of his learning and sincere piety; it was also known that he generously expended in alms the great wealth which he had received from his patrimony. He taught that the material bread was for the nourishment of the body, but that the soul must be nourished by humility and charity, which were the sole and true precepts of evangelical morality. He preached still more by example than words, and led an irreproachable life, imitating the apostles, reading the Holy Scriptures unceasingly, and searching in them for the true means of safety.

"A merit so remarkable, a courage so sublime, could not fail to make the priests his enemies; and he who showed himself the most desirous of his destruction, was the metropolitan of Lyons, who was called John des Belles Maisons. This prelate, exasperated at Valdo for having dared to instruct the people and blame the vices of the popes and clergy, sent him an order to stop teaching, under penalty of being excommunicated and burned as an heretic. The philosopher replied to the archbishop, that he did not fear punishment, and that he should continue to preach against the abominable corruption of the priests, since he would rather obey his conscience and his God, than a prelate who was an atheist and an abominable sodomite. This energetic reply increased the rage of John, who at once sent guards to arrest him; but the people took the side of the apostle, and drove away the minions of the archbishop. Valdo remained three years in Lyons, under the protection of his friends; but Pope Alexander, the third of that name, who was very cruel, though he affected not to appear so, having been informed that a great number of the Lyonesse doubted his sovereign authority, and fearful lest this rebellion against his authority should be propagated in France, anathematised Valdo and all his adherents, and ordered John des Belles Maisons to persecute them to their complete extermination. The reformers were then tracked like wild beasts, given up to the most frightful punishments, or compelled to quit Lyons. They spread in bands through the south of France, under the name of Vaudois, derived from Valdo, their chief; and the new doctrines soon made such rapid progress that the countship of Toulouse, and all the people of the southern provinces, declared against the pope”

It was for the purpose of arresting this religious propagation that Alexander fulminated new anathemas, and preached a crusade against the Vaudois. At his call, thousands of fanatics took up arms and marched for Toulouse, which had then for its consul a venerable old man named Peter Durand, who employed his great wealth in succouring the poor, and who was particularly distinguished for his virtues and intelligence. Regardless of his age and character, the legate, John Chryzogonus, seized all his wealth and drove him from France, prohibiting him from returning until he had served the poor for ten years at Jerusalem; he then confiscated the wealth of his relatives, and of those who had communicated with him; he exiled all the opulent citizens because they were suspected of heresy, and put several to the torture to obtain denunciations.

This first expedition against the Vaudois appeared to be terminated, when there arrived another legate named Henry, a former abbot of Clairvaux, who had been elevated to the cardinalate. This execrable prelate advanced at the head of an army of banditti, fortified with merciless orders, which had been sent to him from Rome. Then the scaffolds were erected, the instruments of torture rent anew the victims of superstition; then reappeared all the frightful apparatus which the ministers of tyrants carry with them. Thousands of heretics, old men, women, and children were hung, quartered, broken upon the wheel, or burned alive, and their property confiscated for the benefit of the king and the Holy See.

Whilst Alexander was exterminating the Vaudois or Albigenses, for refusing to recognise his supreme authority, Scotland had revolted on account of the promotion of the Doctor John to the bishopric of St. Andrew's. King William, discontented with the canons of that church for choosing a bishop without his permission, refused to confirm their candidate, and appointed his chaplain Hugh to govern the vacant see. John complained to the court of Rome, and Alexander immediately sent Alexis, a sub-deacon of the Roman church, as his legate to Scotland, who pronounced an interdict against the bishopric of St. Andrew, deposed Hugh as an intruder, and re-instated John as the lawful bishop of the diocese; prohibiting him, however, from taking off the interdict from his church until the king had consented to his election.

William appeared to submit to force, and approved of the election; but as soon as the excommunication had been raised he arrested John, and sent him out of his kingdom. Alexis uttered a new anathema, which was confirmed by the pope in a letter to the bishops of Scotland, and particularly to the clergy of St. Andrew's. Through the inspiration of his machiavelian policy, he gave the legation of Scotland to Roger, the metropolitan of York, who, as an Englishman, was the natural enemy of the Scotch, and ordered him to excommunicate William, to place his kingdom under interdict, and to depose him if he persisted in not leaving John in free possession of the diocese of St. Andrew's. Alexander commanded the prelate to return to Scotland and not to abandon his see, and to merit, if necessary, the palm of martyrdom like St. Thomas of Canterbury. All these steps did not aid the cause of John; he was a second time driven from the kingdom, and prohibited, under penalty of death, from re-entering it. It is true that the prince was immediately excommunicated and Scotland placed under interdict.

This was the last act of authority exercised by Alexander; he died at Citta di Castello, on the 30th of August, 1181, after having occupied the pontifical chair for twenty-two years. This pope, proud, vindictive, avaricious, despotic, and cruel, exhibited a cowardly hypocrisy so long as he had to fear the sword of the emperor Frederick; but as soon as he saw his authority affirmed, he cast aside the mask and revealed himself as implacable as Gregory the Seventh, and even prouder than the monk Hildebrand. How strangely blind are men who even now prostrate themselves before the successors of such monsters.

LUCIUS THE THIRD, THE ONE HUNDRED AND SEVENTY-SIXTH POPE.

[A. D. 1182.]

Election of Lucius the Third—He is driven out of Rome—He makes war on the Romans and re-enters the holy city at the head of an army—He begs for mercy in every kingdom of Europe—He is again driven from Rome—Interview between the pope and the emperor—Council of Verona—Infamous decree against the Vaudois—The affairs of Scotland—New crusade in the East—History of the patriarchess of Jerusalem—Insolence of the patriarch Heraclius—Death of Lucius.

THE decrees of the last council of the Lateran had definitely devolved the elective power on the cardinals. The clergy and people could no longer interfere in the elections by a negative vote, since it was sufficient for the canonical election of a pope to have united two thirds of the votes of the electoral college in his favour. Thus from this time the cardinalship became the first and most important dignity in the church.

In their haste to enjoy their new prerogatives, the cardinals did not even wait until the funeral rites of Alexander were terminated. On the day succeeding his death, they secretly assembled and proclaimed Ubaldo, bishop of Ostia, sovereign pontiff, who was consecrated at Veletri, under the name of Lucius the Third, by Theodin, bishop of Porto, and the archpriest of Ostia. The new pope, born in the city of Lucca, in Tuscany, was, it is alleged, very ignorant, and possessed, as his only merit, a perfect knowledge of the ceremonies of the church.

See why this unfit prelate obtained the honours of the pontificate. The cardinals having, by virtue of the decree which conferred on them the elective power, assembled to choose a successor to Alexander, pledged themselves to each other not to choose a pope from without the college. But when this determination was agreed upon, it produced a great difficulty; all wished to be popes, and no one would vote for any other than himself. Finally, to put an end to the difficulty, they agreed to choose the cardinal Ubaldo, as being the oldest, and consequently as likely soon to give place to the ambition of the others. Notwithstanding their foresight, Lucius lived four years.

The history of the first part of this pontificate is barren, and offers nothing but uncertainty; it only commences to be interesting towards the year 1183. Lucius is accused of a defect which, among sovereigns, is a monstrous vice,—avarice. On the very day of his exaltation, he wished to reform many usages established from time immemorial; for example, the custom of bestowing largesses on the people, at the periods of great solemnities, and the distribution of clothing and food on the anniversaries of the fête of the popes, or of their enthronement.

The Romans fearing lest this rapacious old man would finish by hoarding up all their wealth in the vaults of the palace of the Lateran, revolted against him, invaded the pontifical residence with arms, pursued him from fortress to fortress, and compelled him to quit Rome. The populace then spread themselves through the country which belonged to him, pillaged his houses, ravaged his domains, burned his palaces, and over their smoking ruins all swore to die with arms in their hands rather than obey the infamous Lucius, who had gone to beg aid from the emperor and had obtained his consent that Christian, the metropolitan of Mayence, should replace him on the Holy See, by the aid of a German army. This prelate, who was one of the most skillful generals of the empire, would have doubtlessly re-established the affairs of the pope, if death had not arrested him on his march. After the loss of their chief, the army dared not penetrate into the heart of Italy, and retreated towards Lombardy.

Lucius found himself a second time deprived of all assistance, and far from being in a condition to reduce the rebels, he perceived that he himself would soon be forced to obey them. He then changed his tactics, and not being able to conquer the people, he resolved to corrupt their leaders. As he had no money, he sent his monks to all the courts of Europe for the purpose of extracting it from kings, lords, and the common people. All the sums which he thus procured were distributed among the leaders of the revolt, and by their aid, he returned in triumph to the palace of the Lateran. Unfortunately his success was not of long duration; the Romans, irritated at his wish to impose an extraordinary impost on the city, revolted against his fiscal agents, and drove them away with the odious pontiff.

In this second revolution it is just to say, that the people committed horrible excesses; churches were pillaged and burned, nuns violated and murdered on the public squares, priests killed by stripes and mutilated in a shameful manner, and finally, historians relate, that after sacking a convent, they tore out the eyes of all the monks, covered their heads with mitres by way of derision, and sent them forth in a procession, bound in couples, and led by a lay brother, to whom they had saved one eye.

When Lucius was informed of the cruelties which had been inflicted on his clergy, he broke out into a transport of bitter anger. He fulminated the most terrible anathemas against the Romans, and immediately retired to Verona to hasten the succours which the emperor was about to send him. Frederick joined him there, and renewed to him the oath of fidelity and obedience which he had taken to Pope Alexander, under the condition that he would grant to him an investiture of the estates of the Countess Matilda.

A council was immediately convened; and Lucius officially instructed the fathers to resolve the difficulties which had formerly arisen between the Holy See and the emperor. But, in the secret instructions, he ordered them to dally over the matters in relation to the heritage of the Countess Matilda, and principally to occupy themselves with the condemnation of the Romans, and with the measures to be taken to reduce them. The synod at the same time rendered a decree against the heretics of Italy and France, which included the principal dispositions of the council of the Lateran, with an addition of cruel measures, in order to arrive more promptly at the extermination of people who refused to submit to the court of Rome. "Ecclesiastical justice could not show too much rigour," said Lucius, in this bull, "in annihilating the heresies which now multiply in a large number of the provinces. Already has Rome braved the thunders of the Holy See; and her intractable people have dared, from hatred of our person, to lay a sacrilegious hand upon our priests. But the day of vengeance is preparing; and, until we can return to those Romans the evils they have inflicted on us, we excommunicate all heretics, whatever may be their appellation. Among others, the Catharins, the Patarins, those who falsely call themselves the Humiliated, or the Poor of Lyons, as well as the Passagins, the Josephins, the Arnaudists; and, finally, all those wretches who call themselves Vaudois, or enemies of the Holy See. We strike these abominable sectarians with a perpetual anathema; we condemn those who shall give them shelter or protection to the same penalties, and who shall call themselves Consoled, Perfect Believers, or by any other superstitious name.

"And as the severity of ecclesiastical discipline is sometimes despised and powerless, we order, that those who shall be convicted of favouring heretics, if they are clergy or monks, shall be despoiled of their sacerdotal functions, and of their benefices, and shall be abandoned to all the rigours of secular justice; if laymen, we order that they suffer the most horrid tortures, be proved by fire and sword, torn by stripes, and burned alive. We add, by advice of the bishops, and on the remonstrances of the emperor and the lords, that every prelate shall visit, several times during the year, either in person or by his archdeacon, all the cities of his diocese, and particularly the places in which he shall judge that the heretics hold their assemblies.

They shall cause the inhabitants, and especially the old men, women, and children, to be seized. They shall interrogate them to know if there are any Vaudois in their country, or people who hold secret assemblies, and who lead a life differing from that of the faithful. Those who shall hesitate to make denunciations, shall be immediately put to the torture. When the bishop or archdeacon shall discover the guilty, he shall cause them to be arrested, and shall exact from them an abjuration; or, on their refusal, shall execute the sentence we have pronounced.

"We order, besides, the counts, barons, rectors, and consuls of cities, and other places, to engage by oath, in accordance with the warning of the bishops, to persecute heretics and their accomplices, when they shall be so required to do by the church; and to execute, with all their power, all that the Holy See and the empire have appointed in regard to the crimes of heresy: otherwise, we declare them deprived of their offices and dignities, without the power ever again to hold any employment; and, moreover, they shall be excommunicated for ever, and their property placed under interdict.

"The cities which shall resist our orders, or which, having been warned by the bishops, shall neglect to pursue the heretics, shall be excluded from all commerce with other cities, and shall lose their rank and privileges. The citizens shall be excommunicated, noted with perpetual infamy, and as such declared unfit to fill any public or ecclesiastical function. All the faithful shall have the right to kill them, seize their goods, and reduce them to slavery."

After the reading of this infamous decree, the council heard the explanations of the Scotch bishops, John and Hugh, the same who had contended for the see of St. Andrew's. The pope and cardinals decided that neither had any right to the see, as both had been irregularly chosen and consecrated, and ordered them to resign the title of bishop into the hands of Lucius. A new struggle then took place between the two titularies, to obtain the protection of the holy father. John offered Lucius five hundred pennies of gold, provided he would favour his interests; Hugh gave him two thousand to declare for him against his rival. The pope took the money of the two competitors, and in order to reconcile them, he gave to Hugh the see of St. Andrew's, and to John the see of Dunkeld, with the benefices of which King William had deprived him. When the two prelates returned to Scotland, they wished to enter into the possession of their respective churches, but the king having refused to restore to John the benefices which had been granted to him by Lucius, the war commenced between the two rivals for the see of St. Andrew's, and the kingdom was again troubled by this ridiculous quarrel.

In the east the affairs of the Christians were in a deplorable state. More than a million of men had been buried in the sands of Palestine, and the price of so many sacrifices was the miserable conquest of Jerusalem. On one hand, dissolution of morals, incapacity of leaders, and a want of soldiery, left the Holy Land without defence. On the other, a horrible leprosy and continual sickness rendered Baldwin the Fourth incapable of defending his new subjects against the enterprises of the infidels. In this extremity, the prince determined to send a deputation into Italy to the pope, and to the Christian kings, to lay before them the misfortunes of the East. He chose as the chief of this embassy, the infamous Heraclius, the metropolitan of Jerusalem, the same who had been elevated to this important see, notwithstanding the active opposition of William, archbishop of Tyre. This latter wished to profit by the circumstance, to go himself to Rome, and to renew his accusations before the pope, demanding the deposition of Heraclius. But the sacred college and the pope, already won by gold, refused even to hear the illustrious metropolitan. He, indignant at such cowardice, threatened Lucius to proclaim through all the courts of Christendom the traffic which he was carrying on in ecclesiastical dignities. All was useless; the rich presents of Heraclius caused the balance to declare in his favour, and he was solemnly recognised by the holy father.

Besoldus thus speaks of the morals of Heraclius:—"This patriarch became enamoured of the wife of a tavern-keeper named Pascha de Riveri, of the city of Napolis in Palestine, twelve leagues from Jerusalem. He frequently mounted his horse and came to see his mistress, who accompanied him to the patriarchal palace; after some days of debauchery, he sent her back laden with presents, in order that her journey might not be too displeasing to her husband. The latter, however, worn out by the pleasantries of his neighbours, became enraged at his wife, and threatened to put her to death, if she did not cease her intercourse with the patriarch. The beautiful tavern-keeper informed Heraclius of it, and the next day the husband was found dead in his bed. La Pascha then came to reside at Jerusalem in a rich palace, which she publicly inhabited with the metropolitan. When her lover preached at the cathedral, she went there in the equipage of a queen, followed by a crowd of servants, more richly equipped than those of the princess Sybilla, the sister of the king; and if strangers asked her people what was the name of this lady they boldly replied, the patriarchess.

Heraclius had several children whom he carried about with him publicly, to the temple and the court. It is even related that one day, in full council, in presence of the king, the barons, and the generals, one of the servants of La Pascha came to announce to him that she had been delivered of a boy.

It was, however, in the name of this unworthy priest, in the name of Arnold, grand master of the Templars, and in that of Roger, grand master of the Hospitallers, that the metropolitan of Ravenna exposed to the council of Verona the sad state of the eastern church; and besought Lucius to permit the Christians of the West to go to the succour of the Holy Land. The pope evinced very favourable dispositions towards the ambassadors; unfortunately it was not so with the kings; they showed very little enthusiasm, and replied to the court of Rome, that the welfare of their kingdoms would prevent them from engaging in an enterprise so perilous and so long as a crusade in Palestine. In fact, almost all of them had wars to maintain. Frederick Barbarossa was engaged in re-establishing his authority over Italy; William, king of Sicily, was repulsing the efforts at invasion of Andronicus Comnenus, emperor of Constantinople; Philip the Second, king of France, was engaged in war with the great vassals of the crown; Henry the Second, king of England, was also detained in his kingdom by the incessant revolts of his French provinces, which wished to detach themselves from his authority.

Heraclius, seeing the bad success of his negotiations, wished to make a last effort, and went himself to Paris, where he was received with great distinction by the king and young lords of the French court. All testified to the patriarch their desire to go to Jerusalem; but the wise portion of the prelates and nobles assembled in council, and decided that the sovereign, who was not yet twenty years old, could not direct a crusade, and should remain in his kingdom. Philip then promised the eastern ambassadors to cause the holy war to be preached in his kingdom, and to furnish from his own purse the necessary sums for the equipment and support of those who should take up arms.

After this first rebuff, the metropolitan went to England, persuaded that king Henry could not refuse to undertake the defence of his relative, the king of Jerusalem, especially as he had to fulfil his promise made to the Holy See of going to the aid of the Holy Land, to expiate the murder of Thomas Becket.

On the arrival of the patriarch, Henry convoked the lords and prelates of his kingdom in the city of London, to deliberate on the question of a crusade. The council decided unanimously that the king should not leave his kingdom, and must be content with permitting his subjects to take the cross. Henry then rose and said to the patriarch: "Since our counsellors have decided that our presence is indispensable for the safety of our people, we will follow their decision, because, above all other things, a prince owes himself to his nation; we, however, promise to give from our treasury fifty thousand marks of silver, to succour our cousin, the king of Jerusalem."

This new disappointment exasperated Heraclius. "Prince," he exclaimed, "what matters your munificence to us? we have more gold than we want; and if we have come so far, it was to seek for a man capable of making war on the infidel, and we hoped to find him here. Since our anticipations have been deceived by him who ought to realise them.

learn in your turn, prince, that if you have reigned until this time with glory, it is because the pope reserved you for his defence; but, as you abandon his cause, know that he also will abandon you, and that injustice shall at length punish your ingratitude and your crimes. Have you forgotten, perjured vassal, that you have violated the fidelity you owe to the king of France, your sovereign? Do you no longer remember, infamous prince, the assassination of the holy archbishop of Canterbury?"

At these bitter reproaches, made before all his court, Henry changed colour, and his countenance exhibited the expression of concentrated rage; but Heraclius, without appearing alarmed, continued: "Do not think I fear the effects of the fury which I see on your face; strike me as you struck holy Thomas, and let my martyrdom teach the world that you are more cruel, and more impious than the Saracens." Such was the dread which the priests of that period inspired, that the king, unable longer to restrain himself, and not daring to avenge himself, quitted the assembly.

Pope Lucius died at Verona, before the return of Herachus to Italy, on the 24th of November, 1185, and was interred in the cathedral of that city.

URBAN THE THIRD, THE ONE HUNDRED AND SEVENTY-SEVENTH POPE.

[A. D. 1185.]

Election of Urban—The emperor Frederick decrees the title of Caesar to his son—Quarrel between the pope and the emperor—Complaints of Frederick Barbarossa against the pope—Letters of the German bishops to the holy father—Urban is driven from Verona—Conquests of the Sultan Saladin—Death of the pope.

AFTER the death of Lucius, the Milanese Hubert Crivelli, cardinal of St. Lawrence and metropolitan of Milan, was proclaimed pontiff by the sacred college by the name of Urban the Third.

Frederick Barbarossa, who thought to assure to himself rule over Italy, profited by the moment of respite, which the death of the pope and the care of a new election gave him, to marry his son Henry to Constance, the posthumous daughter of King Roger and niece of William the Second, who then reigned over the states of Sicily. This marriage was celebrated at Milan, on the 27th of January, 1186, and at the conclusion of the ceremony, the emperor had been crowned by the metropolitan of Vienne—Henry by the patriarch of Aquileia, and Constance by a German prelate. Frederick then solemnly declared his son Caesar, and yielded the imperial authority to him.

But Urban, who in the interval had been chosen pope, immediately exhibited intentions hostile to the emperor, and refused to confirm the declaration of the sovereign and the marriage of the young prince, under the pretext that this union threatened to weaken the Roman church. He reproached Frederick with his usurpation of the property bequeathed by the countess Matilda to St. Peter; he accused him of robbing the heritages of bishops after their death, and of obliging their successors to live by extortion; and he finally threatened him with excommunication if he did not restore to the monasteries of men and women the wealth of which he had deprived them by falsely accusing them of employing it in debauchery. All these imputations, how-soever founded, were but pretexts to justify the conduct of the pope; the true motive of his opposition arose from a sentiment of cupidity. Urban coveted for the Holy See the inheritance of King William, who was childless and appeared to be threatened by a speedy death.

Henry was still in Lombardy, at the time of the declaration of the holy father: he immediately retraced his steps, resolved to take vengeance on the court of Rome. He first attacked a bishop whom he met on his way, and imperiously demanded from him, from whom he had received his investiture; on his reply that he had been ordained by Urban, because he possessed neither regalia, offices, nor a royal court, the young prince became excited against him and ordered him to be beaten by his people. He treated still more cruelly a legate who was carrying considerable sums to Rome; he seized the money by force, and in order to punish the ecclesiastic for the resistance he made, ordered his nose to be cut off.

Urban immediately cited the emperor and his son to Rome to be judged by a council, threatening them with a terrible excommunication if they refused to obey his orders. The two princes not only treated the threats of Urban with contempt, but even redoubled their severity towards the prelates who sustained the side of the pontiff; they blocked up the passages of the Alps and the neighbouring countries, to prevent ecclesiastics from passing from Italy into Germany, and to arrest the Germans who wished to go to the court of Rome: they then convened all the prelates and lords of the kingdom of Geilenhusen.

Frederick opened the sitting by the following speech: "Lords and bishops, you know in what manner we have been attacked by the Holy See, without having failed in the respect and obedience we had promised it. The ambitious pontiff however, who now governs the church, wishes to ruin the privileges of our empire in order to snatch the crown with more ease from the brows of our successors. He maintains, that no layman, whatever be his dignity, should take the tithes which the people pay to those who serve the altar; that it is unjust that kings should claim the right of advowson over lands or vassals of the church, and that prelates alone should freely enjoy them. All these exactions are contrary to the usages of the empire, and we do not believe we can change our ancient customs to obey a priest; still, to show how desirous we are of peace with the pope, we will conform to the decisions which this assembly shall make."

Then Conrad, metropolitan of Mayence, rose and replied to the prince, "this is a grave affair, my lord, and it is not possible lightly to resolve it. We will first write to the pontiff to exhort him to peace and to render you justice." All the fathers acceded to this proposal, and a synodical letter was addressed to the holy father.

In this writing, the bishops of Germany

exhibited their profound affliction at the discord which had broken out between the altar and the throne; they reproached the pontiff with the abuse which he made of his authority in wishing to annihilate the imperial power by depriving it of its privileges, and of encroaching daily upon its prerogatives.

Notwithstanding the lively discontent which Urban exhibited at the letter of the prelates of Germany, he remained none the less firm in his resolve to excommunicate the emperor, and he cited him to appear at Verona to be judged and anathematised. This new step of the holy father was unsuccessful; the inhabitants of Verona, alarmed at the consequences which might result to them from the enmity of Frederick, drove the pope from their city, and obliged him to take refuge in Venice. In this city Urban regained all the advantages of his position; he even formed a league against the emperor, and organised an army destined for the succour of the Holy Land. But at the very moment when he was commencing to embark his troops, he learned that the sultan Saladin, after having defeated the Christian army and made Guy of Lusignan prisoner on the day of Tiberiade, had seized the city of Jerusalem, and subjugated all the kingdom. Urban was so chagrined that he fell sick and died three days afterwards, on the 19th of October, 1187.

GREGORY THE EIGHTH, THE ONE HUNDRED AND SEVENTY-EIGHTH POPE.

[A. D. 1187.]

Election of Gregory—Consternation of Christians at the news of the conquest of Jerusalem—The pope negotiates a peace between the Genoese and the Pisans—His death.

ALBERT, a cardinal priest of the order of St. Lawrence and chancellor of the Roman church, succeeded Urban the Third, by a canonical election. He was enthroned by the name of Gregory the Eighth, and consecrated on the following Sunday.

Beneventum was the country of the new pope, who, by the testimony of historians, was learned, eloquent, and of pure and austere morals. Like his predecessor, he was much distressed by the capture of Jerusalem; so that, as soon as he was seated on the pontifical throne, he sent his monks through all Christendom, to preach new crusades for the purpose of re-animating the zeal of the faithful for the deliverance of the Holy Land. By his orders, the missionaries promised plenary indulgences to those who should undertake the journey to Palestine, or furnish money for the wants of the crusaders.

With Gregory the Eighth, as with his predecessors, religion was not the only motive which determined him to aid the Christians of the East against the infidel. The hope of re-establishing in Asia the authority of the Holy See, and of weakening the Greek church, acted most powerfully on the minds of these popes. Besides, this was the policy which had been steadily pursued at Rome since the reign of Gregory the Great.

A contemporary author, Roger Hoveden, relates, that the conquest of Jerusalem produced so terrible an effect on all minds, that the Roman cardinals pledged themselves in writing to renounce their concubines, not to ride on horseback, and not to follow the chase as long as the Holy Land remained in the power of the infidel. Several even engaged to take the cross and to go at the head of the pilgrims into Syria. But, adds he, this increase of devotion only lasted a few days, and all soon resumed their ordinary way of living.

Gregory was diverted from his grief by a difficult negotiation, which he undertook in order to reconcile the Pisans and Genoese, two rival and very powerful cities. His intention was to unite the forces of these two republics, for the purpose of pushing the war in Palestine. Already had his overtures been favourably listened to by the Pisans; he had even decided them to join all their land and sea forces to those of the crusaders; already had the Genoese sent ambassadors to him to treat of peace with the inhabitants of Pisa, when, most fortunately for them, he was attacked by a violent fever which retarded the disasters of a new crusade. He died after a sickness of some days, on the 16th of December, 1187, having filled the Holy See for two months.

CLEMENT THE THIRD, THE ONE HUNDRED AND SEVENTY-NINTH POPE.

[A. D. 1188.]

Election of Clement—Treaty between the pope and the Romans—Clement pursues the plans of his predecessors in regard to the Holy Land—Fanaticism of the Croises of France, England, and Germany—Rules for the new crusade—Saladin's dime—Termination of the Scottish schism—Privilege granted to the king of Scotland—Quarrel between the pope and the king of France—Death of Clement the Third.

PAUL, or Paulinus, cardinal bishop of Palestina, and a Roman by birth, was chosen to succeed Gregory the Eighth, by the name of Clement the Third. The ceremony of his consecration took place at Pisa, some days after the death of his predecessor. He was scarcely seated on the throne of St. Peter, when his first care was to put an end to the quarrel between the people of Rome and the Holy See. For this purpose, he sent deputies to the senate and the prefect, to make arrangements in regard to the city of Tusculum, which was the chief cause of the discord, and of which the popes claimed possession, to the prejudice of the city. His ambassadors displayed great skill in the negotiation; they showed to the Romans the loss they would sustain if the popes were obliged to choose another city for their residence; they besought them not, themselves, to bring about the destruction of the ancient capital of the Christian world, by refusing to receive the pontiff as their father, and unconditionally. The Romans did not fall into the snare which was laid for them, knowing too well that the presence of the pontiff produced discords and disasters among them. They however replied, that, in order to obtain peace, they would receive Clement within their walls, provided he would aid them to repair the losses suffered in their wars with the Holy See on account of Tusculum.

The pontiff, finding it impossible to deceive the Romans, finally acceded to their just demands, and signed the treaty which was imposed on him.

All things being arranged on both sides, Clement made his dispositions to return to the pontifical city. Before, however, removing from Pisa, he did not lose sight of his project of a crusade; he assembled the citizens in the great church, delivered a long exhortation to them to determine them to undertake the journey to the Holy Land, and even gave the standard of St. Peter to Hubald, the metropolitan of that diocese, with the title of legate;

after this he took the road to Rome, into which he made a triumphal entry.

As soon as the holy father had regulated the administration of the church, he sent the cardinal Henry, bishop of Albano, with William of Tyre, in the capacity of legates to France, to put an end to the quarrels between kings Henry and Philip, and to determine these two princes to unite their armies to march to the conquest of Jerusalem. This embassy was entirely successful. Henry and Philip were reconciled. They received the cross from the hands of the legates, and pledged themselves to go to Palestine. A great number of the lords of both nations following their example, took the cross. The French adopted a red cross, the English a green one.

Whilst the metropolitan of Tyre was fanaticising the people of France, the other legate, Henry of Albano, had separated from his colleague, and had gone to Germany for the same purpose. Thus, on the very day on which King Philip assembled his parliament at Paris to demand subsidies for the succour of Jerusalem, Frederick held a solemn diet at Mayence, in order to publish the crusade. The emperor took the cross with his son Frederick, the duke of Suabia, and sixty-eight of the most powerful lords of his empire. The rendezvous for their departure was fixed at Ratisbon, on the day of the festival of St. George, in the following year; but in order to prevent the disorders which the movements of such large bodies of troops produced, by the conjunction of all the vagabonds who follow armies, under the name of sutlers, valets, and others, all who could not go to the expense of three marks of silver were prohibited, under penalty of excommunication, from joining the crusaders.

Henry of England levied in his kingdom an extraordinary impost of one tenth of the revenues and moveables of all his subjects, excepting only arms, horses, the dress of the officers, as well as the books, garments, and benefices of the clergy. This impost, known by the name of Saladin's dime, was collected in each parish by a monk, nominated by the bishop, and assisted by a sergeant of the king, and a templar or hospitaller. The king of England made, besides, different ordinances for the discipline of his army,—proscribing dice and other games of chance, interdicting to his knights furs of ermine, martin, and sable, scarlet clothing, and ornamented dresses. He also prohibited the officers from blaspheming, from having more than two kinds of meat served at table, and from introducing women into the camp, with the exception of some old and homely sutlers. He authorised the crusaders who had before pledged their property, to exact from their creditors one year's revenues, without this new debt bearing interest during the expedition; finally, he permitted his subjects, even the ecclesiastics, to mortgage their estates for three years, and reserved for those who died during the journey the right of disposing of the money which they carried with them, in favour of their domestics, or for the aid of the Holy Land.

Philip Augustus levied also the Saladin dime in his kingdom, and made ordinances similar to those of king Henry.

Whilst France, England, and Germany were thus preparing for a war in Palestine, the pope was engaged in extinguishing the schism which separated Scotland from the Holy See. For this purpose he wrote to king William and the clergy of that kingdom: "We inform you, my lord, that Hugh not having presented himself at the court of Rome, as he was ordered by Urban the Third, we have declared him deprived of the bishopric of St. Andrew's, and have suspended him from all ecclesiastical functions, freeing his vassals from the oath of fidelity and obedience. We also order, in conformity with the holy canons, which prohibit churches from being left without pastors, that the chapter of St. Andrew shall immediately assemble to choose a worthy priest; and we recommend to it bishop John, whose merit we know. We exhort you, our dear son, to give your aid to this prelate. . . ." William, after having taken cognizance of these letters, was reconciled to the bishop John; he surrendered to him the see of Dunkeld, with its revenues, on condition that he would renounce the diocese of St. Andrew in favour of Hugh. This determination of the king smoothed all difficulties; John was installed in his bishopric, and Hugh went to Rome to be reinstated in his see. He received absolution from the pope, and died on his return.

William, desiring to guarantee his kingdom for the future from the censures of English metropolitans, sent deputies to Italy, instructed to negotiate with Clement for a bull which should declare the church of Scotland subject to that of Rome, and independent of that of England. The brief rendered on this occasion terminated with the following clause: "From henceforth the church of Scotland shall be immediately freed from its dependency on the Holy See, and no pope, or legate 'à latere,' shall be permitted to lanch or publish, interdict or excommunication upon this kingdom. No one, for the future, shall be able to exercise the functions of a legate, unless he is a Scotchman, or taken from the body of the Roman church; and differences which shall break out in regard to benefices situated in Scotland, shall not be brought before any foreign tribunal, except that of Rome, and by way of appeal."

This dispute of the Scotch and English was scarcely settled, when a terrible war broke out between Henry the Second and Philip, on account of the sister of the latter, whom Richard, the son of the king of England, wished to espouse in despite of his father. At first the young prince placed himself at the head of a body of French troops and made war on his father, who, fearing the ambition of his son, obstinately refused to consent to this marriage. Philip then, finding the war protracted, took arms on the side of Richard; and the two people, French and English, murdered each other for a quarrel of their tyrants. As all the money of the Saladin dime was swallowed up in these interminable disputes, the holy father, fearful of seeing his hopes of the crusades vanish, sent a new legate, John of Anagni, who obtained an agreement from the princes to meet at Ferté Bernard, to confer upon a mode of terminating the war.

In this interview, Philip exhibited an inconceivable pride; he imperiously demanded the accomplishment of the marriage arrested between his sister Alice and Richard, count of Poitiers; demanding, besides, that the prince should do homage to him for his estates, and that his brother John should assume the cross. Henry of England offered to espouse Alice to the younger of his sons: but Philip rejected this proposal with insolence, and conducted himself in outrageous language; when the legate interposing between the two monarchs, threatened Philip to excommunicate him, and to place his kingdom under interdict, if he refused the conditions offered by the king of England.

Philip then protested against the decree of the legate, maintaining that it did not pertain to the Roman church to censure a kingdom, when the prince was repressing his rebellious vassals, and avenging the injuries done his crown; and soon the war recommenced more furiously than ever. Henry the Second having died at Chinon soon after, his son Richard succeeded him and restored peace to the two nations.

The two kings were then able to accomplish the vow they had made to conquer the Holy Land; they embarked together towards the end of the year 1190, and sailed for Syria, where Frederick Barbarossa had already arrived at the head of one hundred and fifty thousand men. This unfortunate emperor was drowned in crossing the river Salef, or Cydnus. Henry the Sixth, his son and successor, immediately quitted the army of the crusaders, and came to Italy, to receive the crown from the hands of the pope, and to claim at the same time the succession of William the Good, king of Sicily, who died without children. On his route, he learned that Clement the Third, attacked by a severe malady, had rendered his last sigh on the 28th of March, 1191.— This pontiff, gifted with great political skill, had re-established during his reign the supremacy of the altar over the throne and had paved the way for his successors to rule all Europe.

CELESTIN THE THIRD, THE ONE HUNDRED AND EIGHTIETH POPE.

[A. D. 1191.]

Election of Celestin—His consecration is deferred—Coronation of the emperor Henry the Sixth—Exhumation of the dead body of Tancred—Frightful punishment of Count Jourdain—Return of King Philip to France—Troubles in England—Complaint against the bishop of Ely—The Normans refuse to receive the legates of the pope—The king of England made prisoner by the duke of Austria—New crusade—Quarrel between the courts of Rome and France—Death of the emperor—Sordid avarice of the pope and cardinals—Philip repudiates Ingerburge—Death of Celestin.

Two days after the death of Clement, cardinal Hyacinth was chosen sovereign pontiff. He was a Roman by birth, and was eighty-five years old when he reached the papacy. He was enthroned by the name of Celestin the Third; but, before being ordained, the sacred college decided that a treaty of peace should be preliminarily made with Henry the Sixth, and that he should oblige the prince to make a composition with the Romans, for the restitution of Tusculum.

Celestin having given his adhesion to this measure, a deputation was sent to the king of Germany, to claim the restoration of Tusculum and of the other fortresses near Rome, promising, that on this condition the pope would crown Henry emperor of Italy. The king consented to this arrangement, and the ambassadors returned with this reply: "You perceive, holy father, that I occupy your estates with my army; I can ravage your farms, your vineyards, and your olive plantations; do not then put off my consecration; since, instead of injuring you, I pledge myself to do honour to your city, obey your holiness, and pay you a tribute."

Celestin replied to the king, that he accepted his proposals of alliance, and immediately made preparations to proceed to his ordination, fixing on Easter Monday for the consecration of the emperor and the empress Constance, his wife. The following was the ceremony:—The holy father was seated on his throne, with the imperial crown deposited at his feet; Henry approached the apostolic chair, and knelt to receive the diadem; the pope, without rising, placed it on the brows of the monarch; he then knocked it off with his foot, wishing to figure by this action that the Holy See was the sole dispenser of thrones, and could at its pleasure make or unmake emperors. Henry having bowed his head in sign of assent, the cardinals lifted up the crown and placed it anew upon his head.

Thus was accomplished the sacrilegious

compact which united two implacable tyrants. Celestin sacrificing the unfortunate inhabitants of Tusculum to the interests of his ambition, destroyed their city to its foundation, and drove away its citizens. Henry, on his side, abandoned himself to all the inspirations of his ferocious character. He passed over into Apulia, to punish it for having named another as king of Sicily, to the prejudice of his pretended rights; he caused the dead body of Tancred, whom he regarded as an usurper, to be exhumed, and following the example of the infamous pontiff Stephen towards Formosus, he caused his head to be cut off by the executioner! His revenge was not arrested by a sacrilege. The young William, the son of Tancred, was condemned to have his eyes burned out by a hot iron, and this unfortunate youth had his natural parts torn off in his presence. Finally, this monster, this unchained tiger, wishing to stifle the spirit of rebellion by frightening his enemies, invented an atrocious punishment, which, until his time, no tyrant had yet conceived. A Count Jourdain, one of the Norman counts, took up arms to dispute with him a fief which belonged to his family; Henry having seized him by treachery, condemned him, in derision, to die upon a burning throne. The count was bound by chains on a bed of heated iron, and crowned with a diadem of burning silver, which was fastened on his head!!

Whilst the emperor Henry was ravaging Calabria, Apulia, and Sicily, the kings of France and England were leading their armies on the shores of Syria. These two princes, who before the death of Henry the Second appeared to be united in an indissoluble friendship, soon became implacable enemies. This division was caused on the part of Philip by his opposition to the massacre of the inhabitants of Messina, whom the English army wished to put to the sword; on the part of Richard by his refusal to ratify his engagement contracted with Alice of France, and by his marriage with Berengaria, the daughter of the king of Navarre.

On their arrival in the Holy Land, the princes no longer dissimulated the feelings of hatred which actuated them, and their discord took the character of open hostility. Philip had declared for the marquis of Montserrat, and had recognised him as king of Jerusalem, to the detriment of Lusignan. Richard immediately took the part of Lusignan, against the king of France, and Leopold, duke or marquis of Austria, who, in the absence of the emperor of Germany had remained in command of his troops, and had joined Philip to avenge himself for an insult of the English monarch. These divisions soon disorganized the Christian army, and caused them to lose sight of the objects of the crusade.

Phillip, attacked by a sickness which caused his nails and hair to fall off, was forced to abandon his troops and return to Europe. He embarked for Otranto where he arrived on the 10th of October, 1191; from thence he went to Rome, where he was received with honour by Pope Celestin, who released him from his vow, bestowing on him the emblems of a pilgrim, the palm branch and the cross. The prince then took leave of the holy father and continued his route to Paris, where he arrived during the Christmas festivities.

Soon after the departure of Philip, Duke Leopold followed his example, and returned to Germany. Richard alone remained in Syria, and performed prodigies of valour; but his courage was only of assistance to his glory, for his absence caused him even to lose the kingdom of England, rent by the factions of the earl of Morlay and of Geoffrey, metropolitan of York. These two lords, availing themselves of the absence of the king, formed a powerful party against William, bishop of Ely, chancellor of the kingdom and legate of the Holy See, and, in this capacity, invested with the supreme power. They constrained him to quit Great Britain and take refuge in Normandy. His enemies even pushed their boldness so far as to send ambassadors to the Holy See to complain of him, and to have their rebellion sanctioned. Notwithstanding the accusations brought against William, Celestin refused to condemn him; he drove his detractors from Rome and sent this reply to the English prelates:

"King Richard being absent on the service of God, we are compelled to take his kingdom under our protection. Having been apprised that John, earl of Morlay, and some other disturbers have risen against his authority, and have even driven from England our venerable brother, William, bishop of Ely, we order you to assemble and excommunicate all the guilty, to the sound of the bells and with lighted candles; we also interdict divine service in all the estates of these criminals, until they shall come to Rome to implore our pity."

An express was also sent into the East to Richard, to inform him of the troubles which were desolating his kingdom. The prince hastened to conclude a truce of three years with Saladin, and embarked on his return to Europe. Unfortunately he encountered a tempest in the Adriatic, and stranded on the shores of Venice. This misfortune, which retarded his arrival in his kingdom, determined him to take the land route and traverse the provinces of the duke of Austria in the disguise of a trader. During his journey he was denounced by a priest and arrested by his enemy the duke, who kept him as a prisoner at Vienna, and then sent him to the emperor, Henry the Sixth. Richard finally obtained his liberty by paying a ransom of one hundred and fifty thousand marks of silver, and continued on his journey. But his brother, John Lackland, assisted by the king of France, had already seized on the crown of England, and Richard of the Lion Heart was obliged to reconquer his states.

During the following year, died the Sultan of Egypt and Syria, the celebrated Saladin, whose sword had been so redoubtable to the Christians. This illustrious conqueror left several sons, heirs of his power, but not of his courage and talents. His death revived the ambition of the Holy See. Celestin then conceived the hope of reconquering the kingdom of Jerusalem, and caused a new crusade to be preached in France and Germany. Cardinal Gregory, the legate of the pope in Germany, convened a general diet at Worms, and spoke with so much eloquence in favour of the holy sepulchre, that a great number of prelates, lords, and magistrates determined to take the cross; the emperor himself wished to command the expedition in person, and would have done it if wise counsels had not diverted him from it.

Some time after, Henry at length received the chastisement due his crimes. He died, poisoned by his wife Constance and a lord of his court, the paramour of that princess. This tragical end excited no regret, so much hatred had this monster raised against himself by his cruelties and exactions. Celestin who had excommunicated him on account of the captivity of Richard, prohibited his dead body from being interred; and only departed from his severity, on condition that his successor should restore to the Holy See the one hundred and fifty thousand marks of silver which the king of England had paid. He had even the audacity to demand for the coronation of the son of Henry a thousand marks of silver for each of his cardinals, and moreover compelled the empress Constance to swear upon the consecrated host, that the young prince was really of the blood of the emperor, and not the fruit of her adulteries.

At this same period, Philip Augustus espoused Ingerburge, the daughter of Valdemar the First, and sister of Canute the Sixth, king of Denmark. All writers of the time agree in describing this princess to have been as beautiful as virtuous. According to Mezerai, she had a secret defect which rendered her unfit for marriage. Immediately, from the very first night of his marriage, Philip separated from her, and demanded from his bishops a sentence of separation. The judgment was pronounced by the metropolitan of Rheims, the legate of the pope, and by some prelates who were moved to join in the divorce, under a pretext of relationship in the sixth degree. This unfortunate princess was confined in the convent of Soissons, and her husband left her in such destitution, that she was reduced to sell her household vessels, and even her clothing for her subsistence. The king of Denmark complained to the Holy See against his son-in-law, and obtained an annulment of the sentence of separation. Celestin even ordered the king to take Ingerburge back again, and to treat her as Queen of France: prohibiting him, under penalty of excommunication, from contracting a new alliance. Philip, without disquieting himself about the threats of the pontiff, married the daughter of the duke of Bohemia.

Notwithstanding this opposition to his orders, Celestin did not launch an anathema against the king, perhaps because he had abandoned the cause of the princess—perhaps because, worn down by years and infirmities, he thought of nothing but dying. Towards the festival of Christmas (1197) he assembled the cardinals, and besought them to choose John of St. Paul, a cardinal priest of the order of St. Prisque, in whose favour he offered to abdicate. But as all the cardinals coveted the apostolical chair for themselves, they refused to accede to the wishes of Celestin, under the pretext, that it was irregular, and contrary to the canons, for a pontiff to lay down the tiara. Some days afterwards, on the 8th of January, 1198, the holy father died at the age of ninety-three years, having governed the church for six years and nine months.

During the twelfth century, we have seen the popes arrogate to themselves the right of disposing of the imperial crown, and deposing princes. It was from this time that the power of the Holy See could be regarded as really constituted; and it chiefly owed its new influence to the organization of the college of cardinals, which found itself charged with the election of the chiefs of the church.

THE THIRTEENTH CENTURY.

INNOCENT THE THIRD, THE ONE HUNDRED AND EIGHTY-FIRST POPE.

[A. D. 1198.]

Reflections of the historian Mathew Paris on the church in the thirteenth century—Cardinal Lothaire chosen pope by the name of Innocent the Third—His history before his election—Commencement of his pontificate—Treaty between the pope and the queen of Sicily—Innocent preaches a new crusade—He places France under interdict—Pretensions of the pope in regard to the elections of emperors of the west—Innocent erects himself into an arbiter of peace and war between all powers—Foundation of the Latin empire of Constantinople and temporary reunion of the Greek and Latin churches—Coronation of the king of Arragon—Coronation of the emperor Otho—Massacre of the unfortunate Albigenses—St. Dominick orders the burning of Beziers—The pope bestows England on the king of France—The king of England declares himself a vassal of the pope—Council of Lateran—Curious adventure of St. Francis of Assise—The English and French refuse to obey the pope—Death of Innocent the Third—Reflections on his character.

A MONK of St. Alban's named Mathew Paris, who wrote the cotemporaneous history of the thirteenth century, thus speaks of the church: "The little faith which still existed under the last popes, and which was but a spark of the divine fire, was extinguished during this century—all belief is annihilated; simony is no longer a crime; usury is no longer disgraceful, and greedy priests can devour without sin the substance of the people and the lords. Evangelical charity has now taken its flight towards the heavens; ecclesiastical liberty has disappeared, religion is dead, and the holy city has become an infamous prostitute, whose shamelessness surpasses that of Sodom and Gomorrah. Every country is abandoned to the rapacity of monks in rags, ignorant and unlettered, who fall upon the provinces armed with Roman bulls, and with effrontery adjudge to themselves all the revenues granted by our ancestors for the subsistence of the poor and the exercise of hospitality. Those who resist this dilapidation of the public money, or who refuse a part of their demand to the envoys of the pope, are immediately stricken with the thunders of anathema.

"Thus the pontiffs not only exercise an odious tyranny, which is still the more insupportable, as their agents, like true harpies armed with iron talons, not only snatch even the last rags which cover the faithful to maintain the luxury of the court of Rome, but even overthrow the traditions of the first ages of the church, and drive away from the domains of St. Peter the citizens who directed them to replace them with wretches, called Roman farmers, who leave the work of the fields to pillage the inhabitants of the provinces, and who, in hopes of meriting the good graces of the holy father, send to Rome the spoils of the unfortunate. Thus do we deplore such scandals, and say, in the grief of our soul, that we would rather die than assist at this sight of horror and abomination."

As soon as the burial honours were rendered to pope Celestin the Third, the cardinals secretly assembled in a place called Septa Solis, in order to confer with more freedom upon the election of a new pontiff; they first assisted at the mass of the Holy Spirit; they then saluted one another and gave to each the kiss of peace. After this, they proceeded to an election and named the tellers. On the first ballot, the votes were proclaimed, in a loud voice, and it was ascertained that a majority of the votes were given to the cardinal Lothaire who was but thirty-seven years old. His age was discussed at length and, finally, they agreed to choose him chief of the church, and at the tenth ballot he had two thirds of the votes, and was proclaimed pope by the name of Innocent the Third. The election having been proclaimed, the clergy and people conducted him, with acclamations of praise, to the church of Constantine, and from thence to the palace of Lateran.

Lothaire was the son of Trasimond, and, according to some authors, was descended from the counts of Segni. His childhood was passed in Anagni, his native city, and it was only when he had attained the age of sixteen that his mother, named Clarina, a noble Roman dame, conducted him to the holy city and entrusted him to skilful masters to finish his education. Having become a man, he went to Paris to hear the learned dissertations of the professors of the University of that capital; finally, he returned to Bologna to enter into orders. At length Lothaire was named canon of St. Peter's at Rome. Gregory the Eighth conferred on him the subdeaconate, and Clement the Third made him a cardinal deacon of the order of St. Sergius. As he was only a deacon when he reached the papacy, they were obliged to defer his consecration, in order to confer on him the other ecclesiastical degrees.

After his consecration, he received the oath of fidelity and liege homage from Peter, prefect of Rome, who bestowed on him a mantle as the investiture of his charge, a right which belonged to the emperor. This proud beginning was followed by a series of political acts which presaged his future plans for Italy. He visited, in person, the duchy of Spoleto, Tuscany, and the other provinces which were formerly dependent on the Holy See, in order to bring them back to his authority, affecting all the time not to be engaged in temporal affairs, and repeating, unceasingly, that sentence of scripture—"Whoso toucheth pitch shall defile himself," he loudly declared himself an enemy to the venality of offices, in order to render himself popular; and even fixed the salary of the officers of his court, prohibiting them from exacting any thing from the faithful. He abolished the office of door-keeper of the chamber of the notaries, in order that the access to it should be free; and caused to be taken away from the palace of the Lateran, as unworthy of pontifical majesty, a counter, at which were sold, on account of the pope, vessels of plate, and where they trafficked in ornaments and false stones. He set in action the sittings of the public consistory, whose use was almost abolished. Three times a week he gave a solemn audience to all the faithful who had complaints to bring; and in the judgments he pronounced as supreme arbiter, he had no regard to the quality of persons nor their fortunes, but only to the justice of their claims.

As he anticipated, his reputation for impartiality soon drew to his tribunal appeals in all important or celebrated cases; for it must be said, that this great ostentation of equity did not take its rise only in a love for justice, but flowed more particularly from an insatiable thirst for authority and despotism, as appeared in the case of Andreas, son of Belas the Third, king of Hungary, who was obliged to go to the Holy Land under penalty of excommunication, and the loss of the inheritance of his father. It was with the same arrogance that he demanded the restitution of the prisoners whom the emperor had made in the last war, and, in particular, that the metropolitan of Salerno should be set at liberty. His legates audaciously signified to the prince that they would grant him twenty-four hours to restore the captives, if he did not wish his whole kingdom to be placed under interdict; at the same time they sent to the prelates of Spire, Strasburg, and Worms different bulls, which ordered these bishops to aid the measures of the Holy See, and to join themselves to the abbot of Sutri, and to St. Anastasius, abbot of the order of Citeaux, who were commissioned to foment the troubles in Germany.

Thus Pope Innocent, faithful to the maxim of the church, that the hatred of the priest should be eternal and implacable, continued to pursue Barbarossa in the person of his grandson Frederick, as his predecessors had done in the person of the emperor Henry. On the day of the death of that prince, the young Frederick was hurled from his throne by two powerful factions—the one led by Philip, his uncle and tutor, who had caused himself to be chosen king of the Romans, the other by Otho, duke of Saxony, who caused himself to be proclaimed emperor, under the pretext that his competitor was incapacitated from possessing the crown because he was excommunicated. Then Philip, who was deeply interested in being absolved from the anathema pronounced against him, approached the holy father, and by means of money, obtained his absolution. The price of this felony, besides the payment of large sums, had been the promise of setting at liberty, without a ransom, the archbishop of Salerno and the prelates who were his fellow prisoners. This done, the bishops of Sutri proceeded in his pontifical habit, with the ceremony of the coronation of Philip.

Ten years of civil war was the result to Germany of the astute policy of the court of Rome. The pope did not fail to profit by these deplorable divisions, to recover, by temporal and spiritual arms, Romagna, the March of Ancona, the duchy of Spoleto, and the patrimony of the countess Matilda. After this he despoiled the senate and prefects of Rome of all their rights, and sought to render the pontifical see independent of the authority of the emperors.

During this year (1198) the empress Constance, the widow of Henry the Sixth, died at Palermo; appointing Innocent the Third regent of the kingdom of Sicily, and leaving him enormous sums to assure him the reimbursement, in advance, of all the expense he would be obliged to be at in defence of the estates of her son. This regency was so profitable to the holy father, that after exercising it for one year, Innocent had not only repaired the losses of his treasury, but had been able to lay by enough money to undertake an active war against the neighbouring princes, for the purpose of re-establishing his authority over the old domains of the church.

The pope, content with his actions in Italy, wished to perform the same beyond it. He published new crusades, and sent his legions of monks through all parts of Europe, to excite the fanaticism of the nations. As usual, France was the first to range itself beneath the flag of Christ, notwithstanding the active opposition of king Philip, who was excommunicated. Thanks to the skill of Peter of Capua, the legate of the Holy See, the prince was constrained to obey the church and make peace with England, in order to send his best troops into the Holy Land. A part of his army went to Marseilles, and the rest to Venice, for the purpose of passing over into Syria more expeditiously; it, however, turned out otherwise, on account of the failure of vessels and money. Fortunately, the doge of Venice consented to place the galleys of the republic at the service of the crusaders, provided they would aid him in chastising the pirates of the Adriatic, and would besiege Zara, a maritime city belonging to the Venetians, but which had been conquered by the Hungarians. This arrangement was agreed to; and without farther delay, the French invested Zara and carried it by storm, without troubling themselves concerning the prohibition of the pope, who had taken it under his protection. This event did not make much noise, and the conquerors were excused on the payment of a sum of money to the court of Rome, to raise the excommunication they had incurred by making war against a crusader.

Innocent, whose only object was the extension of his authority over foreigners, endeavoured to enter into negotiations with the eastern empire; but his excessive pride caused him to repel all kinds of concessions; furious, then, at not having been able to subject the Greeks to his sway, he resolved to destroy them by inciting the Bulgarians to revolt, and detaching from the empire a great part of Servia, which he gave to Voulk, the governor of that province. He had even commanded the French to march against Constantinople, when a new rupture took place between the courts of Rome and France, occasioned by the second marriage of Philip with Agnes of Meranie. The pope, whose policy was hostile to this union, ordered his legate, Peter of Capua, to place the kingdom under interdict, until the prince had retaken his first wife Ingerburge, and made his submission to the Holy See. At the same time he wrote to all the French prelates, declaring himself to be the sovereign dispenser of churches, and that they must observe and execute the sentence in the dioceses of their jurisdiction, under penalty of deposition, and the loss of their benefices. The prelates of France, fearing the thunders of Rome, obeyed the orders of the holy father with such rigour, that all the churches were closed for eight months, and the dead remained unburied. Finally, as such a state of things could not continue without serious injury to the royal authority, Philip solicited pardon, and the excommunication was raised, on condition that he would take back his wife Ingerburge, before the expiration of a delay, which was fixed at six months, six weeks, six days, and six hours.

Germany continued exposed to the horrors of a civil war, in consequence of the divisions excited by the Holy See. The empire of the West had three emperors, the young Frederick, Philip of Suabia, and Otho of Saxony, who disputed for the imperial crown with arms. Innocent had at first declared for Philip; he then suffered himself to be gained over by the presents of Otho of Saxony, and recognised him as emperor, to the prejudice of the young king of Sicily, his pupil, alleging as a pretext for such strange conduct, that Frederick would be too formidable to the Holy See, if he united on his head the crowns of Sicily and Germany, and that Philip of Suabia was unworthy of the crown, having invaded the patrimony of St. Peter with arms.

The pope consequently wrote to Otho: "By the authority which God has given us in the person of St. Peter, we declare you king, and we order the people to render you, in this capacity, homage and obedience. We, however, shall expect you to subscribe to all our desires as a return for the imperial crown." The legate charged with the publication of this bull came to Cologne, where he convened in an assembly all the partizans of Otho; in their presence he declared him emperor of Germany, and excommunicated all who bore arms against him, and, in particular, Philip of Suabia and his partizans.

The decree of the holy father was received by the people of Cologne with great demonstrations of joy; but it was not so in the northern provinces of Germany. A great number of prelates and lords refused to confirm the election of Otho, and sent the following ener-

tine, and the price of so many sacrifices was the miserable conquest of Jerusalem. On one hand, dissolution of morals, incapacity of leaders, and a want of soldiery, left the Holy Land without defence. On the other, a horrible leprosy and continual sickness rendered Baldwin the Fourth incapable of defending his new subjects against the enterprises of the infidels. In this extremity, the prince determined to send a deputation into Italy to the pope, and to the Christian kings, to lay before them the misfortunes of the East. He chose as the chief of this embassy, the infamous Heraclius, the metropolitan of Jerusalem, the same who had been elevated to this important see, notwithstanding the active opposition of William, archbishop of Tyre. This latter wished to profit by the circumstance, to go himself to Rome, and to renew his accusations before the pope, demanding the deposition of Heraclius. But the sacred college and the pope, already won by gold, refused even to hear the illustrious metropolitan. He, indignant at such cowardice, threatened Lucius to proclaim through all the courts of Christendom the traffic which he was carrying on in ecclesiastical dignities. All was useless; the rich presents of Heraclius caused the balance to declare in his favour, and he was solemnly recognised by the holy father.

Besoldus thus speaks of the morals of Heraclius:—"This patriarch became enamoured of the wife of a tavern-keeper named Pascha de Riveri, of the city of Napolis in Palestine, twelve leagues from Jerusalem. He frequently mounted his horse and came to see his mistress, who accompanied him to the patriarchal palace; after some days of debauchery, he sent her back laden with presents, in order that her journey might not be too displeasing to her husband. The latter, however, worn out by the pleasantries of his neighbours, became enraged at his wife, and threatened to put her to death, if she did not cease her intercourse with the patriarch. The beautiful tavern-keeper informed Heraclius of it, and the next day the husband was found dead in his bed. La Pascha then came to reside at Jerusalem in a rich palace, which she publicly inhabited with the metropolitan. When her lover preached at the cathedral, she went there in the equipage of a queen, followed by a crowd of servants, more richly equipped than those of the princess Sybilla, the sister of the king; and if strangers asked her people what was the name of this lady they boldly replied, the patriarchess.

Heraclius had several children whom he carried about with him publicly, to the temple and the court. It is even related that one day, in full council, in presence of the king, the barons, and the generals, one of the servants of La Pascha came to announce to him that she had been delivered of a boy.

It was, however, in the name of this unworthy priest, in the name of Arnold, grand master of the Templars, and in that of Roger, grand master of the Hospitallers, that the metropolitan of Ravenna exposed to the coun-oil of Verona the sad state of the eastern church; and besought Lucius to permit the Christians of the West to go to the succour of the Holy Land. The pope evinced very favourable dispositions towards the ambassadors; unfortunately it was not so with the kings; they showed very little enthusiasm, and replied to the court of Rome, that the welfare of their kingdoms would prevent them from engaging in an enterprise so perilous and so long as a crusade in Palestine. In fact, almost all of them had wars to maintain. Frederick Barbarossa was engaged in re-establishing his authority over Italy; William, king of Sicily, was repulsing the efforts at invasion of Andronicus Comnenus, emperor of Constantinople; Philip the Second, king of France, was engaged in war with the great vassals of the crown; Henry the Second, king of England, was also detained in his kingdom by the incessant revolts of his French provinces, which wished to detach themselves from his authority.

Heraclius, seeing the bad success of his negotiations, wished to make a last effort, and went himself to Paris, where he was received with great distinction by the king and young lords of the French court. All testified to the patriarch their desire to go to Jerusalem; but the wise portion of the prelates and nobles assembled in council, and decided that the sovereign, who was not yet twenty years old, could not direct a crusade, and should remain in his kingdom. Philip then promised the eastern ambassadors to cause the holy war to be preached in his kingdom, and to furnish from his own purse the necessary sums for the equipment and support of those who should take up arms.

After this first rebuff, the metropolitan went to England, persuaded that king Henry could not refuse to undertake the defence of his relative, the king of Jerusalem, especially as he had to fulfil his promise made to the Holy See of going to the aid of the Holy Land, to expiate the murder of Thomas Becket.

On the arrival of the patriarch, Henry convoked the lords and prelates of his kingdom in the city of London, to deliberate on the question of a crusade. The council decided unanimously that the king should not leave his kingdom, and must be content with permitting his subjects to take the cross. Henry then rose and said to the patriarch: "Since our counsellors have decided that our presence is indispensable for the safety of our people, we will follow their decision, because, above all other things, a prince owes himself to his nation; we, however, promise to give from our treasury fifty thousand marks of silver, to succour our cousin, the king of Jerusalem."

This new disappointment exasperated Heraclius. "Prince," he exclaimed, "what matters your munificence to us? we have more gold than we want; and if we have come so far, it was to seek for a man capable of making war on the infidel, and we hoped to find him here. Since our anticipations have been deceived by him who ought to realise them learn in your turn, prince, that if you have reigned until this time with glory, it is because the pope reserved you for his defence; but, as you abandon his cause, know that he also will abandon you, and that injustice shall at length punish your ingratitude and your crimes. Have you forgotten, perjured vassal, that you have violated the fidelity you owe to the king of France, your sovereign? Do you no longer remember, infamous prince, the assassination of the holy archbishop of Canterbury?"

At these bitter reproaches, made before all his court, Henry changed colour, and his countenance exhibited the expression of concentrated rage; but Heraclius, without appearing alarmed, continued: "Do not think I fear the effects of the fury which I see on your face; strike me as you struck holy Thomas, and let my martyrdom teach the world that you are more cruel, and more impious than the Saracens." Such was the dread which the priests of that period inspired, that the king, unable longer to restrain himself, and not daring to avenge himself, quitted the assembly.

Pope Lucius died at Verona, before the return of Heraclius to Italy, on the 24th of November, 1185, and was interred in the cathedral of that city.

URBAN THE THIRD, THE ONE HUNDRED AND SEVENTY-SEVENTH POPE.

[A. D. 1185.]

Election of Urban—The emperor Frederick decrees the title of Caesar to his son—Quarrel between the pope and the emperor—Complaints of Frederick Barbarossa against the pope—Letters of the German bishops to the holy father—Urban is driven from Verona—Conquests of the Sultan Saladin—Death of the pope.

AFTER the death of Lucius, the Milanese Hubert Crivelli, cardinal of St. Lawrence and metropolitan of Milan, was proclaimed pontiff by the sacred college by the name of Urban the Third.

Frederick Barbarossa, who thought to assure to himself rule over Italy, profited by the moment of respite, which the death of the pope and the care of a new election gave him, to marry his son Henry to Constance, the posthumous daughter of King Roger and niece of William the Second, who then reigned over the states of Sicily. This marriage was celebrated at Milan, on the 27th of January, 1186, and at the conclusion of the ceremony, the emperor had been crowned by the metropolitan of Vienne—Henry by the patriarch of Aquileia, and Constance by a German prelate. Frederick then solemnly declared his son Caesar, and yielded the imperial authority to him.

But Urban, who in the interval had been chosen pope, immediately exhibited intentions hostile to the emperor, and refused to confirm the declaration of the sovereign and the marriage of the young prince, under the pretext that this union threatened to weaken the Roman church. He reproached Frederick with his usurpation of the property bequeathed by the countess Matilda to St. Peter; he accused him of robbing the heritages of bishops after their death, and of obliging their successors to live by extortion; and he finally threatened him with excommunication if he did not restore to the monasteries of men and women the wealth of which he had deprived them by falsely accusing them of employing it in debauchery. All these imputations, how-soever founded, were but pretexts to justify the conduct of the pope; the true motive of his opposition arose from a sentiment of cupidity. Urban coveted for the Holy See the inheritance of King William, who was childless and appeared to be threatened by a speedy death.

Henry was still in Lombardy, at the time of the declaration of the holy father: he immediately retraced his steps, resolved to take vengeance on the court of Rome. He first attacked a bishop whom he met on his way, and imperiously demanded from him, from whom he had received his investiture; on his reply that he had been ordained by Urban, because he possessed neither regalia, offices, nor a royal court, the young prince became excited against him and ordered him to be beaten by his people. He treated still more cruelly a legate who was carrying considerable sums to Rome; he seized the money by force, and in order to punish the ecclesiastic for the resistance he made, ordered his nose to be cut off.

Urban immediately cited the emperor and his son to Rome to be judged by a council, threatening them with a terrible excommunication if they refused to obey his orders. The two princes not only treated the threats of Urban with contempt, but even redoubled their severity towards the prelates who sustained the side of the pontiff; they blocked up the passages of the Alps and the neighbouring countries, to prevent ecclesiastics from passing from Italy into Germany, and to arrest the Germans who wished to go to the court of Rome: they then convened all the prelates and lords of the kingdom at Geilenhusen.

Frederick opened the sitting by the following speech: "Lords and bishops, you know in what manner we have been attacked by the Holy See, without having failed in the respect and obedience we had promised it. The ambitious pontiff however, who now governs the church, wishes to ruin the privileges of our empire in order to snatch the crown with more ease from the brows of our successors. He maintains, that no layman, whatever be his dignity, should take the tithes which the people pay to those who serve the altar; that it is unjust that kings should claim the right of advowson over lands or vassals of the church, and that prelates alone should freely enjoy them. All these exactions are contrary to the usages of the empire, and we do not believe we can change our ancient customs to obey a priest; still, to show how desirous we are of peace with the pope, we will conform to the decisions which this assembly shall make."

Then Conrad, metropolitan of Mayence, rose and replied to the prince, "this is a grave affair, my lord, and it is not possible lightly to resolve it. We will first write to the pontiff to exhort him to peace and to render you justice." All the fathers acceded to this proposal, and a synodical letter was addressed to the holy father.

In this writing, the bishops of Germany

exhibited their profound affliction at the discord which had broken out between the altar and the throne; they reproached the pontiff with the abuse which he made of his authority in wishing to annihilate the imperial power by depriving it of its privileges, and of encroaching daily upon its prerogatives.

Notwithstanding the lively discontent which Urban exhibited at the letter of the prelates of Germany, he remained none the less firm in his resolve to excommunicate the emperor, and he cited him to appear at Verona to be judged and anathematised. This new step of the holy father was unsuccessful; the inhabitants of Verona, alarmed at the consequences which might result to them from the enmity of Frederick, drove the pope from their city, and obliged him to take refuge in Venice. In this city Urban regained all the advantages of his position; he even formed a league against the emperor, and organised an army destined for the succour of the Holy Land. But at the very moment when he was commencing to embark his troops, he learned that the sultan Saladin, after having defeated the Christian army and made Guy of Lusignan prisoner on the day of Tiberiade, had seized the city of Jerusalem, and subjugated all the kingdom. Urban was so chagrined that he fell sick and died three days afterwards, on the 19th of October, 1187.

GREGORY THE EIGHTH, THE ONE HUNDRED AND SEVENTY-EIGHTH POPE.

[A. D. 1187.]

Election of Gregory—Consternation of Christians at the news of the conquest of Jerusalem—The pope negotiates a peace between the Genoese and the Pisans—His death.

ALBERT, a cardinal priest of the order of St. Lawrence and chancellor of the Roman church, succeeded Urban the Third, by a canonical election. He was enthroned by the name of Gregory the Eighth, and consecrated on the following Sunday.

Beneventum was the country of the new pope, who, by the testimony of historians, was learned, eloquent, and of pure and austere morals. Like his predecessor, he was much distressed by the capture of Jerusalem; so that, as soon as he was seated on the pontifical throne, he sent his monks through all Christendom, to preach new crusades for the purpose of re-animating the zeal of the faithful for the deliverance of the Holy Land. By his orders, the missionaries promised plenary indulgences to those who should undertake the journey to Palestine, or furnish money for the wants of the crusaders.

With Gregory the Eighth, as with his predecessors, religion was not the only motive which determined him to aid the Christians of the East against the infidel. The hope of re-establishing in Asia the authority of the Holy See, and of weakening the Greek church, acted most powerfully on the minds of these popes. Besides, this was the policy which had been steadily pursued at Rome since the reign of Gregory the Great.

A contemporary author, Roger Hoveden, relates, that the conquest of Jerusalem produced so terrible an effect on all minds, that the Roman cardinals pledged themselves in writing to renounce their concubines, not to ride on horseback, and not to follow the chase as long as the Holy Land remained in the power of the infidel. Several even engaged to take the cross and to go at the head of the pilgrims into Syria. But, adds he, this increase of devotion only lasted a few days, and all soon resumed their ordinary way of living.

Gregory was diverted from his grief by a difficult negotiation, which he undertook in order to reconcile the Pisans and Genoese, two rival and very powerful cities. His intention was to unite the forces of these two republics, for the purpose of pushing the war in Palestine. Already had his overtures been favourably listened to by the Pisans; he had even decided them to join all their land and sea forces to those of the crusaders; already had the Genoese sent ambassadors to him to treat of peace with the inhabitants of Pisa, when, most fortunately for them, he was attacked by a violent fever which retarded the disasters of a new crusade. He died after a sickness of some days, on the 16th of December, 1187, having filled the Holy See for two months.

CLEMENT THE THIRD, THE ONE HUNDRED AND SEVENTY-NINTH POPE.

[A. D. 1188.]

Election of Clement—Treaty between the pope and the Romans—Clement pursues the plans of his predecessors in regard to the Holy Land—Fanaticism of the Croises of France, England, and Germany—Rules for the new crusade—Saladin's dime—Termination of the Scottish schism—Privilege granted to the king of Scotland—Quarrel between the pope and the king of France—Death of Clement the Third.

PAUL, or Paulinus, cardinal bishop of Palestina, and a Roman by birth, was chosen to succeed Gregory the Eighth, by the name of Clement the Third. The ceremony of his consecration took place at Pisa, some days after the death of his predecessor. He was scarcely seated on the throne of St. Peter, when his first care was to put an end to the quarrel between the people of Rome and the Holy See. For this purpose, he sent deputies to the senate and the prefect, to make arrangements in regard to the city of Tusculum, which was the chief cause of the discord, and of which the popes claimed possession, to the prejudice of the city. His ambassadors displayed great skill in the negotiation; they showed to the Romans the loss they would sustain if the popes were obliged to choose another city for their residence; they besought them not, themselves, to bring about the destruction of the ancient capital of the Christian world, by refusing to receive the pontiff as their father, and unconditionally. The Romans did not fall into the snare which was laid for them, knowing too well that the presence of the pontiff produced discords and disasters among them. They however replied, that, in order to obtain peace, they would receive Clement within their walls, provided he would aid them to repair the losses suffered in their wars with the Holy See on account of Tusculum.

The pontiff, finding it impossible to deceive the Romans, finally acceded to their just demands, and signed the treaty which was imposed on him.

All things being arranged on both sides, Clement made his dispositions to return to the pontifical city. Before, however, removing from Pisa, he did not lose sight of his project of a crusade; he assembled the citizens in the great church, delivered a long exhortation to them to determine them to undertake the journey to the Holy Land, and even gave the standard of St. Peter to Hubald, the metropolitan of that diocese, with the title of legate;

after this he took the road to Rome, into which he made a triumphal entry.

As soon as the holy father had regulated the administration of the church, he sent the cardinal Henry, bishop of Albano, with William of Tyre, in the capacity of legates to France, to put an end to the quarrels between kings Henry and Philip, and to determine these two princes to unite their armies to march to the conquest of Jerusalem. This embassy was entirely successful. Henry and Philip were reconciled. They received the cross from the hands of the legates, and pledged themselves to go to Palestine. A great number of the lords of both nations following their example, took the cross. The French adopted a red cross, the English a green one.

Whilst the metropolitan of Tyre was fanaticising the people of France, the other legate, Henry of Albano, had separated from his colleague, and had gone to Germany for the same purpose. Thus, on the very day on which King Philip assembled his parliament at Paris to demand subsidies for the succour of Jerusalem, Frederick held a solemn diet at Mayence, in order to publish the crusade. The emperor took the cross with his son Frederick, the duke of Suabia, and sixty-eight of the most powerful lords of his empire. The rendezvous for their departure was fixed at Ratisbon, on the day of the festival of St. George, in the following year; but in order to prevent the disorders which the movements of such large bodies of troops produced, by the conjunction of all the vagabonds who follow armies, under the name of sutlers, valets, and others, all who could not go to the expense of three marks of silver were prohibited, under penalty of excommunication, from joining the crusaders.

Henry of England levied in his kingdom an extraordinary impost of one tenth of the revenues and moveables of all his subjects, excepting only arms, horses, the dress of the officers, as well as the books, garments, &

benefices of the clergy. This impost, known by the name of Saladin's dime, was collected in each parish by a monk, nominated by the bishop, and assisted by a sergeant of the king, and a templar or hospitaller. The king of England made, besides, different ordinances for the discipline of his army,—proscribing dice and other games of chance, interdicting to his knights furs of ermine, martin, and sable, scarlet clothing, and ornamented dresses. He also prohibited the officers from blaspheming, from having more than two kinds of meat served at table, and from introducing women into the camp, with the exception of some old and homely sutlers. He authorised the crusaders who had before pledged their property, to exact from their creditors one year's revenues, without this new debt bearing interest during the expedition; finally, he permitted his subjects, even the ecclesiastics, to mortgage their estates for three years, and reserved for those who died during the journey the right of disposing of the money which they carried with them, in favour of their domestics, or for the aid of the Holy Land.

Philip Augustus levied also the Saladin dime in his kingdom, and made ordinances similar to those of king Henry.

Whilst France, England, and Germany were thus preparing for a war in Palestine, the pope was engaged in extinguishing the schism which separated Scotland from the Holy See. For this purpose he wrote to king William and the clergy of that kingdom: "We inform you, my lord, that Hugh not having presented himself at the court of Rome, as he was ordered by Urban the Third, we have declared him deprived of the bishopric of St. Andrew's, and have suspended him from all ecclesiastical functions, freeing his vassals from the oath of fidelity and obedience. We also order, in conformity with the holy canons, which prohibit churches from being left without pastors, that the chapter of St. Andrew shall immediately assemble to choose a worthy priest; and we recommend to it bishop John, whose merit we know. We exhort you, our dear son, to give your aid to this prelate. . . ." William, after having taken cognizance of these letters, was reconciled to the bishop John; he surrendered to him the see of Dunkeld, with its revenues, on condition that he would renounce the diocese of St. Andrew in favour of Hugh. This determination of the king smoothed all difficulties; John was installed in his bishopric, and Hugh went to Rome to be reinstated in his see. He received absolution from the pope, and died on his return.

William, desiring to guarantee his kingdom for the future from the censures of English metropolitans, sent deputies to Italy, instructed to negotiate with Clement for a bull which should declare the church of Scotland subject to that of Rome, and independent of that of England. The brief rendered on this occasion terminated with the following clause: "From henceforth the church of Scotland shall be immediately freed from its dependency on the Holy See, and no pope, or legate 'à latere,' shall be permitted to lanch or publish, interdict or excommunication upon this kingdom. No one, for the future, shall be able to exercise the functions of a legate, unless he is a Scotchman, or taken from the body of the Roman church; and differences which shall break out in regard to benefices situated in Scotland, shall not be brought before any foreign tribunal, except that of Rome, and by way of appeal."

This dispute of the Scotch and English was scarcely settled, when a terrible war broke out between Henry the Second and Philip, on account of the sister of the latter, whom Richard, the son of the king of England, wished to espouse in despite of his father. At first the young prince placed himself at the head of a body of French troops and made war on his father, who, fearing the ambition of his son, obstinately refused to consent to this marriage. Philip then, finding the war protracted, took arms on the side of Richard; and the two people, French and English, murdered each other for a quarrel of their tyrants. As all the money of the Saladin dime was swallowed up in these interminable disputes, the holy father, fearful of seeing his hopes of the crusades vanish, sent a new legate, John of Anagni, who obtained an agreement from the princes to meet at Ferté Bernard, to confer upon a mode of terminating the war.

In this interview, Philip exhibited an inconceivable pride; he imperiously demanded the accomplishment of the marriage arrested between his sister Alice and Richard, count of Poitiers; demanding, besides, that the prince should do homage to him for his estates, and that his brother John should assume the cross. Henry of England offered to espouse Alice to the younger of his sons: but Philip rejected this proposal with insolence, and conducted himself in outrageous language; when the legate interposing between the two monarchs, threatened Philip to excommunicate him, and to place his kingdom under interdict, if he refused the conditions offered by the king of England.

Philip then protested against the decree of the legate, maintaining that it did not pertain to the Roman church to censure a kingdom, when the prince was repressing his rebellious vassals, and avenging the injuries done his crown; and soon the war recommenced more furiously than ever. Henry the Second having died at Chinon soon after, his son Richard succeeded him and restored peace to the two nations.

The two kings were then able to accomplish the vow they had made to conquer the Holy Land; they embarked together towards the end of the year 1190, and sailed for Syria, where Frederick Barbarossa had already arrived at the head of one hundred and fifty thousand men. This unfortunate emperor was drowned in crossing the river Salef, or Cydnus. Henry the Sixth, his son and successor, immediately quitted the army of the crusaders, and came to Italy, to receive the crown from the hands of the pope, and to claim at the same time the succession of William the Good, king of Sicily, who died without children. On his route, he learned that Clement the Third, attacked by a severe malady, had rendered his last sigh on the 28th of March, 1191.—This pontiff, gifted with great political skill, had re-established during his reign the supremacy of the altar over the throne and had paved the way for his successors to rule all Europe.

CELESTIN THE THIRD, THE ONE HUNDRED AND EIGHTIETH POPE.

[A. D. 1191.]

Election of Celestin—His consecration is deferred—Coronation of the emperor Henry the Sixth—Exhumation of the dead body of Tancred—Frightful punishment of Count Jourdain—Return of King Philip to France—Troubles in England—Complaint against the bishop of Ely—The Normans refuse to receive the legates of the pope—The king of England made prisoner by the duke of Austria—New crusade—Quarrel between the courts of Rome and France—Death of the emperor—Sordid avarice of the pope and cardinals—Philip repudiates Ingerburge—Death of Celestin.

Two days after the death of Clement, cardinal Hyacinth was chosen sovereign pontiff. He was a Roman by birth, and was eighty-five years old when he reached the papacy. He was enthroned by the name of Celestin the Third; but, before being ordained, the sacred college decided that a treaty of peace should be preliminarily made with Henry the Sixth, and that he should oblige the prince to make a composition with the Romans, for the restitution of Tusculum.

Celestin having given his adhesion to this measure, a deputation was sent to the king of Germany, to claim the restoration of Tusculum and of the other fortresses near Rome, promising, that on this condition the pope would crown Henry emperor of Italy. The king consented to this arrangement, and the ambassadors returned with this reply: "You perceive, holy father, that I occupy your estates with my army; I can ravage your farms, your vineyards, and your olive plantations; do not then put off my consecration; since, instead of injuring you, I pledge myself to do honour to your city, obey your holiness, and pay you a tribute."

Celestin replied to the king, that he accepted his proposals of alliance, and immediately made preparations to proceed to his ordination, fixing on Easter Monday for the consecration of the emperor and the empress Constance, his wife. The following was the ceremony:—The holy father was seated on his throne, with the imperial crown deposited at his feet; Henry approached the apostolic chair, and kneeled to receive the diadem; the pope, without rising, placed it on the brows of the monarch; he then knocked it off with his foot, wishing to figure by this action that the Holy See was the sole dispenser of thrones, and could at its pleasure make or unmake emperors. Henry having bowed his head in sign of assent, the cardinals lifted up the crown and placed it anew upon his head.

compact which united two implacable tyrants. Celestin sacrificing the unfortunate inhabitants of Tusculum to the interests of his ambition, destroyed their city to its foundation, and drove away its citizens. Henry, on his side, abandoned himself to all the inspirations of his ferocious character. He passed over into Apulia, to punish it for having named another as king of Sicily, to the prejudice of his pretended rights; he caused the dead body of Tancred, whom he regarded as an usurper, to be exhumed, and following the example of the infamous pontiff Stephen towards Formosus, he caused his head to be cut off by the executioner! His revenge was not arrested by a sacrilege. The young William, the son of Tancred, was condemned to have his eyes burned out by a hot iron, and this unfortunate youth had his natural parts torn off in his presence. Finally, this monster, this unchained tiger, wishing to stifle the spirit of rebellion by frightening his enemies, invented an atrocious punishment, which, until his time, no tyrant had yet conceived. A Count Jourdain, one of the Norman counts, took up arms to dispute with him a fief which belonged to his family; Henry having seized him by treachery, condemned him, in derision, to die upon a burning throne. The count was bound by chains on a bed of heated iron, and crowned with a diadem of burning silver, which was fastened on his head!!

Whilst the emperor Henry was ravaging Calabria, Apulia, and Sicily, the kings of France and England were leading their armies on the shores of Syria. These two princes, who before the death of Henry the Second appeared to be united in an indissoluble friendship, soon became implacable enemies. This division was caused on the part of Philip by his opposition to the massacre of the inhabitants of Messina, whom the English army wished to put to the sword; on the part of Richard by his refusal to ratify his engagement contracted with Alice of France, and by his marriage with Berengaria, the daughter of the king of Navarre.

On their arrival in the Holy Land, the princes no longer dissimulated the feelings of hatred which actuated them, and their discord took the character of open hostility. Philip had declared for the marquis of Montserrat, and had recognised him as king of Jerusalem, to the detriment of Lusignan. Richard immediately took the part of Lusignan, against the king of France, and Leopold, duke or marquis of Austria, who, in the absence of the emperor of Germany had remained in command of his troops, and had joined Philip to avenge himself for an insult of the English monarch. These divisions soon disorganized the Christian army, and caused them to lose sight of the objects of the crusade.

Phillip, attacked by a sickness which caused his nails and hair to fall off, was forced to abandon his troops and return to Europe. He embarked for Otranto where he arrived on the 10th of October, 1191; from thence he went to Rome, where he was received with honour by Pope Celestin, who released him from his vow, bestowing on him the emblems of a pilgrim, the palm branch and the cross. The prince then took leave of the holy father and continued his route to Paris, where he arrived during the Christmas festivities.

Soon after the departure of Philip, Duke Leopold followed his example, and returned to Germany. Richard alone remained in Syria, and performed prodigies of valour; but his courage was only of assistance to his glory, for his absence caused him even to lose the kingdom of England, rent by the factions of the earl of Morlay and of Geoffrey, metropolitan of York. These two lords, availing themselves of the absence of the king, formed a powerful party against William, bishop of Ely, chancellor of the kingdom and legate of the Holy See, and, in this capacity, invested with the supreme power. They constrained him to quit Great Britain and take refuge in Normandy. His enemies even pushed their boldness so far as to send ambassadors to the Holy See to complain of him, and to have their rebellion sanctioned. Notwithstanding the accusations brought against William, Celestin refused to condemn him; he drove his detractors from Rome and sent this reply to the English prelates:

"King Richard being absent on the service of God, we are compelled to take his kingdom under our protection. Having been apprised that John, earl of Morlay, and some other disturbers have risen against his authority, and have even driven from England our venerable brother, William, bishop of Ely, we order you to assemble and excommunicate all the guilty, to the sound of the bells and with lighted candles; we also interdict divine service in all the estates of these criminals, until they shall come to Rome to implore our pity."

An express was also sent into the East to Richard, to inform him of the troubles which were desolating his kingdom. The prince hastened to conclude a truce of three years with Saladin, and embarked on his return to Europe. Unfortunately he encountered a tempest in the Adriatic, and stranded on the shores of Venice. This misfortune, which retarded his arrival in his kingdom, determined him to take the land route and traverse the provinces of the duke of Austria in the disguise of a trader. During his journey he was denounced by a priest and arrested by his enemy the duke, who kept him as a prisoner at Vienna, and then sent him to the emperor, Henry the Sixth. Richard finally obtained his liberty by paying a ransom of one hundred and fifty thousand marks of silver, and continued on his journey. But his brother, John Lackland, assisted by the king of France, had already seized on the crown of England, and Richard of the Lion Heart was obliged to reconquer his states.

During the following year, died the Sultan of Egypt and Syria, the celebrated Saladin, whose sword had been so redoubtable to the Christians. This illustrious conquerer left several sons, heirs of his power, but not of his courage and talents. His death revived the ambition of the Holy See. Celestin then conceived the hope of reconquering the kingdom of Jerusalem, and caused a new crusade to be preached in France and Germany. Cardinal Gregory, the legate of the pope in Germany, convened a general diet at Worms, and spoke with so much eloquence in favour of the holy sepulchre, that a great number of prelates, lords, and magistrates determined to take the cross; the emperor himself wished to command the expedition in person, and would have done it if wise counsels had not diverted him from it.

Some time after, Henry at length received the chastisement due his crimes. He died, poisoned by his wife Constance and a lord of his court, the paramour of that princess. This tragical end excited no regret, so much hatred had this monster raised against himself by his cruelties and exactions. Celestin who had excommunicated him on account of the captivity of Richard, prohibited his dead body from being interred; and only departed from his severity, on condition that his successor should restore to the Holy See the one hundred and fifty thousand marks of silver which the king of England had paid. He had even the audacity to demand for the coronation of the son of Henry a thousand marks of silver for each of his cardinals, and moreover compelled the empress Constance to swear upon the consecrated host, that the young prince was really of the blood of the emperor, and not the fruit of her adulteries.

At this same period, Philip Augustus espoused Ingerburge, the daughter of Valdemar the First, and sister of Canute the Sixth, king of Denmark. All writers of the time agree in describing this princess to have been as beautiful as virtuous. According to Mezerai, she had a secret defect which rendered her unfit for marriage. Immediately, from the very first night of his marriage, Philip separated from her, and demanded from his bishops a sentence of separation. The judgment was pronounced by the metropolitan of Rheims, the legate of the pope, and by some prelates who were moved to join in the divorce, under a pretext of relationship in the sixth degree. This unfortunate princess was confined in the convent of Soissons, and her husband left her in such destitution, that she was reduced to sell her household vessels, and even her clothing for her subsistence. The king of Denmark complained to the Holy See against his son-in-law, and obtained an annulment of the sentence of separation. Celestin even ordered the king to take Ingerburge back again, and to treat her as Queen of France: prohibiting him, under penalty of excommunication, from contracting a new alliance. Philip, without disquieting himself about the threats of the pontiff, married the daughter of the duke of Bohemia.

Notwithstanding this opposition to his orders, Celestin did not launch an anathema against the king, perhaps because he had abandoned the cause of the princess—perhaps because, worn down by years and infirmities, he thought of nothing but dying. Towards the festival of Christmas (1197) he assembled the cardinals, and besought them to choose John of St. Paul, a cardinal priest of the order of St. Prisque, in whose favour he offered to abdicate. But as all the cardinals coveted the apostolical chair for themselves, they refused to accede to the wishes of Celestin, under the pretext, that it was irregular, and contrary to the canons, for a pontiff to lay down the tiara. Some days afterwards, on the 8th of January, 1198, the holy father died at the age of ninety-three years, having governed the church for six years and nine months.

During the twelfth century, we have seen the popes arrogate to themselves the right of disposing of the imperial crown, and deposing princes. It was from this time that the power of the Holy See could be regarded as really constituted; and it chiefly owed its new influence to the organization of the college of cardinals, which found itself charged with the election of the chiefs of the church.

THE THIRTEENTH CENTURY.

INNOCENT THE THIRD, THE ONE HUNDRED AND EIGHTY-FIRST POPE.

[A. D. 1198.]

Reflections of the historian Mathew Paris on the church in the thirteenth century—Cardinal Lothaire chosen pope by the name of Innocent the Third—His history before his election—Commencement of his pontificate—Treaty between the pope and the queen of Sicily—Innocent preaches a new crusade—He places France under interdict—Pretensions of the pope in regard to the elections of emperors of the west—Innocent erects himself into an arbiter of peace and war between all powers—Foundation of the Latin empire of Constantinople and temporary reunion of the Greek and Latin churches—Coronation of the king of Arragon—Coronation of the emperor Otho—Massacre of the unfortunate Albigenses—St. Dominick orders the burning of Beziers—The pope bestows England on the king of France—The king of England declares himself a vassal of the pope—Council of Lateran—Curious adventure of St. Francis of Assise—The English and French refuse to obey the pope—Death of Innocent the Third—Reflections on his character.

A MONK of St. Alban's named Mathew Paris, who wrote the contemporaneous history of the thirteenth century, thus speaks of the church: "The little faith which still existed under the last popes, and which was but a spark of the divine fire, was extinguished during this century—all belief is annihilated; simony is no longer a crime; usury is no longer disgraceful, and greedy priests can devour without sin the substance of the people and the lords. Evangelical charity has now taken its flight towards the heavens; ecclesiastical liberty has disappeared, religion is dead, and the holy city has become an infamous prostitute, whose shamelessness surpasses that of Sodom and Gomorrah. Every country is abandoned to the rapacity of monks in rags, ignorant and unlettered, who fall upon the provinces armed with Roman bulls, and with effrontery adjudge to themselves all the revenues granted by our ancestors for the subsistence of the poor and the exercise of hospitality. Those who resist this dilapidation of the public money, or who refuse a part of their demand to the envoys of the pope, are immediately stricken with the thunders of anathema.

"Thus the pontiffs not only exercise an odious tyranny, which is still the more insupportable, as their agents, like true harpies armed with iron talons, not only snatch even the last rags which cover the faithful to maintain the luxury of the court of Rome, but even overthrow the traditions of the first ages of the church, and drive away from the domains of St. Peter the citizens who directed them to replace them with wretches, called Roman farmers, who leave the work of the fields to pillage the inhabitants of the provinces, and who, in hopes of meriting the good graces of the holy father, send to Rome the spoils of the unfortunate. Thus do we deplore such scandals, and say, in the grief of our soul, that we would rather die than assist at this sight of horror and abomination."

As soon as the burial honours were rendered to pope Celestin the Third, the cardinals secretly assembled in a place called Septa Solis, in order to confer with more freedom upon the election of a new pontiff; they first assisted at the mass of the Holy Spirit; they then saluted one another and gave to each the kiss of peace. After this, they proceeded to an election and named the tellers. On the first ballot, the votes were proclaimed, in a loud voice, and it was ascertained that a majority of the votes were given to the cardinal Lothaire who was but thirty-seven years old. His age was discussed at length and, finally, they agreed to choose him chief of the church, and at the tenth ballot he had two thirds of the votes, and was proclaimed pope by the name of Innocent the Third. The election having been proclaimed, the clergy and people conducted him, with acclamations of praise, to the church of Constantine, and from thence to the palace of Lateran.

Lothaire was the son of Trasimond, and, according to some authors, was descended from the counts of Segni. His childhood was passed in Anagni, his native city, and it was only when he had attained the age of sixteen that his mother, named Clarina, a noble Roman dame, conducted him to the holy city and entrusted him to skilful masters to finish his education. Having become a man, he went to Paris to hear the learned dissertations of the professors of the University of that capital; finally, he returned to Bologna to enter into orders. At length Lothaire was named canon of St. Peter's at Rome. Gregory the Eighth conferred on him the subdeaconate, and Clement the Third made him a cardinal deacon of the order of St. Sergius. As he was only a deacon when he reached the papacy, they were obliged to defer his consecration, in order to confer on him the other ecclesiastical degrees.

After his consecration, he received the oath of fidelity and liege homage from Peter, prefect of Rome, who bestowed on him a mantle as the investiture of his charge, a right which belonged to the emperor. This proud beginning was followed by a series of political acts which presaged his future plans for Italy. He visited, in person, the duchy of Spoleto, Tuscany, and the other provinces which were formerly dependent on the Holy See, in order to bring them back to his authority, affecting all the time not to be engaged in temporal affairs, and repeating, unceasingly, that sentence of scripture—"Whoso toucheth pitch shall defile himself," he loudly declared himself an enemy to the venality of offices, in order to render himself popular; and even fixed the salary of the officers of his court, prohibiting them from exacting any thing from the faithful. He abolished the office of door-keeper of the chamber of the notaries, in order that the access to it should be free; and caused to be taken away from the palace of the Lateran, as unworthy of pontifical majesty, a counter, at which were sold, on account of the pope, vessels of plate, and where they trafficked in ornaments and false stones. He set in action the sittings of the public consistory, whose use was almost abolished. Three times a week he gave a solemn audience to all the faithful who had complaints to bring; and in the judgments he pronounced as supreme arbiter, he had no regard to the quality of persons nor their fortunes, but only to the justice of their claims.

As he anticipated, his reputation for impartiality soon drew to his tribunal appeals in all important or celebrated cases; for it must be said, that this great ostentation of equity did not take its rise only in a love for justice, but flowed more particularly from an insatiable thirst for authority and despotism, as appeared in the case of Andreas, son of Belas the Third, king of Hungary, who was obliged to go to the Holy Land under penalty of excommunication, and the loss of the inheritance of his father. It was with the same arrogance that he demanded the restitution of the prisoners whom the emperor had made in the last war, and, in particular, that the metropolitan of Salerno should be set at liberty. His legates audaciously signified to the prince that they would grant him twenty-four hours to restore the captives, if he did not wish his whole kingdom to be placed under interdict; at the same time they sent to the prelates of Spire, Strasburg, and Worms different bulls, which ordered these bishops to aid the measures of the Holy See, and to join themselves to the abbot of Sutri, and to St. Anastasius, abbot of the order of Citeaux, who were commissioned to foment the troubles in Germany.

Thus Pope Innocent, faithful to the maxim of the church, that the hatred of the priest should be eternal and implacable, continued to pursue Barbarossa in the person of his grandson Frederick, as his predecessors had done in the person of the emperor Henry. On the day of the death of that prince, the young Frederick was hurled from his throne by two powerful factions—the one led by Philip, his uncle and tutor, who had caused himself to be chosen king of the Romans, the other by Otho, duke of Saxony, who caused himself to be proclaimed emperor, under the pretext that his competitor was incapacitated from possessing the crown because he was excommunicated. Then Philip, who was deeply interested in being absolved from the anathema pronounced against him, approached the holy father, and by means of money, obtained his absolution. The price of this felony, besides the payment of large sums, had been the promise of setting at liberty, without a ransom, the archbishop of Salerno and the bishops of Sipontine, who were his felproceeded in his pontifical habit, with the ceremony of the coronation of Philip.

Ten years of civil war was the result to Germany of the astute policy of the court of Rome. The pope did not fail to profit by these deplorable divisions, to recover, by temporal and spiritual arms, Romagna, the March of Ancona, the duchy of Spoleto, and the patrimony of the countess Matilda. After this he despoiled the senate and prefects of Rome of all their rights, and sought to render the pontifical see independent of the authority of the emperors.

During this year (1198) the empress Constance, the widow of Henry the Sixth, died at Palermo; appointing Innocent the Third regent of the kingdom of Sicily, and leaving him enormous sums to assure him the reimbursement, in advance, of all the expense he would be obliged to be at in defence of the estates of her son. This regency was so profitable to the holy father, that after exercising it for one year, Innocent had not only repaired the losses of his treasury, but had been able to lay by enough money to undertake an active war against the neighbouring princes, for the purpose of re-establishing his authority over the old domains of the church.

The pope, content with his actions in Italy, wished to perform the same beyond it. He published new crusades, and sent his legions of monks through all parts of Europe, to excite the fanaticism of the nations. As usual, France was the first to range itself beneath the flag of Christ, notwithstanding the active opposition of king Philip, who was excommunicated. Thanks to the skill of Peter of Capua, the legate of the Holy See, the prince was constrained to obey the church and make peace with England, in order to send his best troops into the Holy Land. A part of his army went to Marseilles, and the rest to Venice, for the purpose of passing over into Syria more expeditiously; it, however, turned out otherwise, on account of the failure of vessels and money. Fortunately, the doge of Venice consented to place the galleys of the republic at the service of the crusaders, provided they would aid him in chastising the pirates of the Adriatic, and would besiege Zara, a maritime city belonging to the Venetians, but which had been conquered by the Hungarians. This arrangement was agreed to; and without farther delay, the French invested Zara and carried it by storm, without troubling themselves concerning the prohibition of the pope, who had taken it under his protection. This event did not make much noise, and the conquerors were excused on the payment of a sum of money to the court of Rome, to raise the excommunication they had incurred by making war against a crusader.

Innocent, whose only object was the extension of his authority over foreigners, endeavoured to enter into negotiations with the eastern empire; but his excessive pride caused him to refuse all offers of concessions; furious, he was not able to subject the Greeks to his sway, he resolved to destroy them by inciting the Bulgarians to revolt, and detaching from the empire a great part of Servia, which he gave to Voulk, the governor of that province. He had even commanded the French to march against Constantinople, when a new rupture took place between the courts of Rome and France, occasioned by the second marriage of Philip with Agnes of Meranie. The pope, whose policy was hostile to this union, ordered his legate, Peter of Capua, to place the kingdom under interdict, until the prince had retaken his first wife Ingerburge, and made his submission to the Holy See. At the same time he wrote to all the French prelates, declaring himself to be the sovereign dispenser of churches, and that they must observe and execute the sentence in the dioceses of their jurisdiction, under penalty of deposition, and the loss of their benefices: The prelates of France, fearing the thunders of Rome, obeyed the orders of the holy father with such rigour, that all the churches were closed for eight months, and the dead remained unburied. Finally, as such a state of things could not continue without serious injury to the royal authority, Philip solicited pardon, and the excommunication was raised, on condition that he would take back his wife Ingerburge, before the expiration of a delay, which was fixed at six months, six weeks, six days, and six hours.

Germany continued exposed to the horrors of a civil war, in consequence of the divisions excited by the Holy See. The empire of the West had three emperors, the young Frederick, Philip of Suabia, and Otho of Saxony, who disputed for the imperial crown with arms. Innocent had at first declared for Philip; he then suffered himself to be gained over by the presents of Otho of Saxony, and recognised him as emperor, to the prejudice of the young king of Sicily, his pupil, alleging as a pretext for such strange conduct, that Frederick would be too formidable to the Holy See, if he united on his head the crowns of Sicily and Germany, and that Philip of Suabia was unworthy of the crown, having invaded the patrimony of St. Peter with arms.

The pope consequently wrote to Otho: "By the authority which God has given us in the person of St. Peter, we declare you king, and we order the people to render you, in this capacity, homage and obedience. We, however, shall expect you to subscribe to all our desires as a return for the imperial crown." The legate charged with the publication of this bull came to Cologne, where he convened in an assembly all the partizans of Otho; in their presence he declared him emperor of Germany, and excommunicated all who bore arms against him, and, in particular, Philip of Suabia and his partizans.

The decree of the holy father was received by the people of Cologne with great demonstrations of joy; but it was not so in the northern provinces of Germany. A great number of prelates and lords refused to confirm the election of Otho, and sent the following energetic letter to the pope: "Holy father, we cannot understand your conduct. From whence have you derived examples of such audacity? Who are the popes, your predecessors, who have interfered in the election of kings? Did not Jesus Christ separate the temporal from the spiritual power, in order that the apostles and their successors should not be seated on the thrones of the world? . . ."

Innocent replied to this letter: "You are ignorant, unskilful priests, and rude laymen, that princes derive the right to choose emperors from us. Is it not the Holy See which granted them this privilege, when it took from the Greeks the empire of the West, in order to transfer it to the Romans in the person of Charlemagne? Do you think the popes have not reserved the right of examining those who are chosen emperors, when it is they who bestow the crown and the consecration? Learn then, that if we judge him whom you have nominated as sovereign, unworthy of the throne, we are exercising our right in refusing to crown him, and even in choosing another prince to govern the people."

Notwithstanding this manifestation of hostility, Philip of Suabia continued to solicit the aid of the court of Rome; but every thing, entreaties and threats, was useless. Innocent replied to the ambassadors of the different powers, who had interested themselves in favour of the prince of Suabia, these words of evangelical charity, "I hate this family of the Barbarossas; either Philip must lose his crown, or I my pontificate." "In fact," says the abböt of Ursperg, "he lighted the torch of civil war in unfortunate Germany, and committed such deplorable acts, that he deserves to be regarded as the most execrable of the popes."

Whilst the court of Rome was urging on the people of the west to wars of extermination, the crusaders were finishing their preparations for departure. Already had a part of the troops embarked, and were only waiting a favourable wind to set sail for the coasts of Syria, when the young Alexis Angelus arrived at Venice, having escaped from the prisons of Constantinople to claim the protection of the crusaders against his uncle, the usurper Alexis. They consulted the pope as to their course in such an occurrence, which promised a powerful aid to the army of Palestine, and might bring about the reunion of the Greek and Latin churches. But Innocent, who had shortly before been gained to the cause of the usurper Alexis, by the large sums which had been sent to him, and by the promise of recognising him as supreme pontiff, refused to give his consent to an expedition which was to hurl that prince from his throne. He even imperiously ordered the crusaders to renounce every enterprise of this kind, and to embark immediately for Palestine.

It was not difficult for the French and Venetians to discover the secret motives which actuated the pope: thus, without stopping on account of the menaces of the court of Rome, the confederated fleets changed their first destinuation; the crusaders attacked Constantinople, which they carried by assault, and reinstated Isaac Angelus and his son upon the throne. This success immediately changed the hostile dispositions of the holy father, and from being the enemy of the two princes, he became their devoted friend; he declared that the crusaders had acted for the greatest good of Christendom, and demanded the submission of the Eastern churches. But the Greeks were already tired of the Latin yoke; they refused to obey the orders of the pope, and even declared war on the crusaders. The Venetians and French then returned with their fleets beneath the walls of Constantinople, besieged it a second time, and took it on the 12th of April, 1204.

From that period until 1260, that is, for fifty-six years, the Eastern empire was subject to the sway of French princes. Baldwin, the count of Flanders, was the first who was chosen emperor, and reduced beneath his authority the provinces of Europe, which were still dependencies of the crown. All the cities of Asia, however, as well as their territories, remained with the Greeks, who founded independent kingdoms. Michael Theodore Lascaris established himself at Nice in Bithynia; Michael Comnenus reigned over a part of Epirus; David governed Heraclea, Pontus, and Paphlagonia, and his brother Alexis installed himself in the city of Trebizond, which continued to form a separate empire from that of Constantinople, even after the reunion of the other states. These princes, with the exception of Theodore, were all descendants of the family of the Comneni.

Baldwin was authorised by the pope, who had gone over to the side of the conqueror, to preserve his conquests, under the express condition that he would compel the churches to recognise the supremacy of Rome, and would restore all the domains which the emperors had taken from the Holy See, as well as the right of supreme jurisdiction, and the right of nomination of bishops. But the Greeks obstinately refused to resubmit to the yoke of the Latin church, and as neither punishment nor tortures could overcome their determination, Baldwin was forced to permit the prelates to govern their dioceses as they chose.

Towards the end of the year, Peter the Second, king of Arragon, came to Rome to be crowned by the sovereign pontiff. He took an oath in the confessional of St. Peter to be submissive to the pope, both himself and his people, to defend the liberty and immunities of the church at the price of his blood; finally, he deposited on the master altar his sceptre, his crown, and a deed, by which he bound himself to pay each year a considerable rent to the Holy See.

Affairs had changed in Germany; Philip of Suabia, after six years of strife, had finally gained a great victory over Otho of Saxony; had taken the city of Cologne by assault, and had in consequence compelled his competitor to take refuge. Philip, with his uncle, King, . . . informed of the success of Philip, he abandoned the party of Otho, in accordance with his policy, declared for the conqueror, and recognised him as emperor. Otho, seeing no hope of again raising up his party, determined to make his submission, and even demanded Beatrice, the daughter of Philip, in marriage. But Innocent was not the man to permit his enemies to live a long time; a secret plot was formed at the instigation of the pope, and the unfortunate Philip of Suabia was assassinated by a count palatine, named Otho de Witelspach. Otho the Saxon at the same time assembled an army, which he led to Bologna, where he had convened an assembly of all the orders of the empire, to decide on the measures to be taken in this circumstance. The result of the deliberations was, as had been arranged in advance by the confidants of the prince, to send ambassadors to treat with Innocent on the conditions of his consecration.

The patriarch of Aquileia and the bishop of Spire went promptly to the pope, who gave them the formula of an oath which Otho should take to his legates. It ran as follows:

“Holy father: we promise to render you the honour and obedience which our predecessors have rendered to you; we promise you not to interfere in the elections of prelates, nor in appeals to the Holy See in ecclesiastical affairs. We declare the ancient abuses, by which our predecessors seized upon the property of deceased ecclesiastics or vacant churches, abolished; and we promise to labour efficaciously in the extermination of heresies. Finally, we will leave in possession of the Roman church the property which it has obtained from emperors and other persons; and we will aid it in preserving it, and even in recovering that which has been unjustly retained by its enemies.”

As every thing had been arranged in advance, it was soon agreed to; the German army received orders to march, and the prince encamped before Rome. On the next day Otho was consecrated at St. Peter's, after having sworn over the body of the apostle to be the defender of the church and its patrimony. Unfortunately, a few days after the ceremony, a fatal collision took place between the Romans and the German soldiers; all ran to arms, and it was computed that in the affray eleven hundred German knights lost their lives.

Otho immediately quitted the holy city, very much discontented with his reception, and retired towards Bologna; from thence he wrote to the pope, that regarding the unfortunate events which had occurred at Rome as traitorous, he refused to restore the patrimony of the countess Matilda; he even threatened to attack the territories of the king of Sicily, under the pretext that Apulia belonged to the empire, and advised him that he would retake several provinces which were formerly dependencies of his crown, and on which the pope had seized during the minority of the prince. Furious at having found an enemy more powerful than himself, Innocent lanced the thunders of excommunication against Otho, declared all his subjects relieved from their oath of fidelity, and prohibited them, under pain of anathema, from recognising him as their sovereign; at the same time he ordered his legate to excommunicate the podesta and people of Bologna, and even to threaten them with closing their schools, which were the source of the city's prosperity, if they again opened their gates to his enemies.

In the midst of all these wars with princes and kings, Innocent did not lose sight of heresies. He had already sent the monks Rainier and Guy, to the south of France, with power to constrain the Vaudois to abjure, and to employ for this purpose the sword, water, and fire, as these good monks should judge it necessary to use one or the other, or all three together, for the greater glory of God. “Thus,” says Perrin, “all Christendom was agitated by the sight of unfortunate men hung to gallows, tortured on wooden horses, or burned on funeral piles, because they placed their trust in God alone and refused to believe in the vain ceremonies invented by men.” As the monks, notwithstanding their utmost endeavours, failed in their task, and did not progress sufficiently in their work, in the opinion of the pope at least, three new legates left Rome commissioned to exterminate all heretics to the last man; that is to say, four fifths of the southern population. These three monks who were invested with the confidence of the holy father, were called Arnaud, Pierre de Castelnau, and Ralph, worthy monks of the order of the Citeaux. The obstinacy of the Vaudois was such, that notwithstanding preachings and persecutions the sect increased daily, and even found recruits among the great lords of the country; amongst others, Raymond the Fourth, count of Toulouse, and Raymond Roger, count of Foix. The executions then became more difficult for the missionaries; the executioners refused to perform their duty; the people rose and in a moment of effervescence stoned Pierre de Castelnau, who was the most cruel of the three. As soon as the pope was informed of this murder he resolved to avenge it terribly, so that its example might not affect the catholic provinces, and he caused a crusade to be preached against the unfortunate Vaudois. The count of Toulouse and his subjects were excommunicated; plenary indulgences were granted to those who should arm against the heretics; and the palm of martyrdom was promised to the fanatics who should perish in this war.

The unfortunate Raymond, foreseeing the disasters which were to fall on his states, soon made his submission to the legates of the pope and took the oath of obedience and fidelity to the Holy See. Nothing could appease the wrath of Innocent the Third; the count himself was obliged to take the cross against his own subjects, after having submitted to an infamous punishment.

Perrin in his history of the Albigenses thus relates the humiliating ceremonial to which the count was submitted: "The legate caused Count Raymond to be stripped of all his clothing on the threshold of the church of St. Gilles; he put a stole around his neck and caused him to make the tour of the grave of Pierre de Castelnau nine times, scourging him with rods in the presence of counts, marquises, barons, prelates, and a great concourse of people. And as Raymond protested against this penance which was inflicted on him for a sin that he had not committed, the legate imposed silence on him by saying that he was guilty, as the sin had been committed in his states. He then caused him to swear on the crucifix, the gospel, and the relics, an entire submission to the Holy See, and named him chief of the crusade, in order that the Vaudois might see that they were lost, since their friends and protectors combated against them."

The crusaders could not, however, penetrate into the interior of the country until the arrival of a new legate named Dominick, and the count de Montfort, who brought with him an army of twenty-four thousand men. Then only did the operations of the campaign commence, and they laid siege to Beziers. This flourishing city courageously resisted the efforts of the fanatics for an entire month; at length a horrible famine constrained the inhabitants to make proposals of surrender; but as these infamous persecutors had sworn to exterminate this brave population, all offers were rejected. In vain did the Count de Beziers and the venerable prefect of the city cast themselves at the feet of St. Dominick, beseeching him to spare at least the Catholics, who formed a majority of the inhabitants of Beziers—the monk was inflexible, and replied, that he had received orders from the pope to burn the city and put all the population to the sword; and that, moreover, after the massacre God would recognise his friends.

The siege was pushed with more vigour than before, and, in a last assault, the city fell into the power of the crusaders. Then commenced a butchery of which history affords no second example. The frightful Dominick, with the cross in one hand and the bull of the pope in the other, animated the combatants and incited them to carnage, to rape, to incendiarism! He fulfilled so well the orders of the pope that sixty thousand dead bodies of both sexes, men, women, children, and old persons, were swallowed up beneath the smoking ruins of their city, reduced to ashes! Those among the unfortunate whom the soldiers spared on account of their youth, or their beauty, were reserved for new scenes of horror. Young girls and young boys were led, entirely naked, before the tomb of Pierre de Castelnau—were beaten by the monks with thongs loaded with lead, and when their bodies were entirely covered with blood, were abandoned to the brutality of the soldiers, then murdered, and their dead bodies horribly polluted!

All these atrocities were not arrested at the single city of Beziers. The executioners having no more victims at hand, pursued their march and attacked the Count de Beziers, who had retired to Carcassonne, well resolved to defend that place to the last. But he had not foreseen that he should have all the forces of the crusaders upon him, and he was soon obliged to propose terms. At Carcassonne, as at Beziers, St. Dominick was inflexible: he replied, that the only condition he could offer was, that the inhabitants of Carcassonne, men, women, and children, should abandon their walls, without clothing, and should retire to a neighbouring place to await their fate. The lord of Beziers, knowing his enemies, refused to expose his subjects to the rage of these tigers, and continued his defence for a month longer. Treason finally came to the aid of the crusaders. Carcassonne was delivered up to the Count de Montfort, and was treated with the same cruelty as Beziers. Toulouse, Alby, Castelnau, and all the cities of the south which contained Albigenes, were also devastated by this army of assassins.

Innocent was not contented with exercising his despotism over France, Italy, Germany, and Greece, he wished to extend it also over England, and gave the archbishopric of Canterbury to one of his cardinals, Stephen Langton, without consulting King John, who had proposed another prelate to him. This act of authority was illy received by the king of England, who wrote the following energetic letter to him:—"Wherefore, pope of Satan, hast thou rejected the election of the bishop of Norwich? Is it because thou hast sold the metropolitan see of Canterbury to a prelate, who is only known to us from his intimate connection with our enemies of France? We declare that if thou dost not retract thy nomination, we will prevent our subjects from going to Rome to make their offerings, and will take from thee the jurisdiction of our churches."

Innocent became furious on reading this letter, and immediately wrote to the bishops of London, Ely, and Worcester to place the kingdom under interdict, unless John immediately confirmed the election of Stephen Langton. They, sold to the interests of the court of Rome, immediately acquitted themselves of their mission; they sought out the king, and exhibited to him the terrible orders they had received from Rome, and which they would be forced to put in execution if he refused to obey the injunctions of the Holy See.

John, indignant at the insolence of the pope and the hypocrisy of the prelates, drove them from his presence, threatening them, that if they should have the audacity to lanch the interdict, he would banish them from England, confiscate their property, and send them to Rome to be maintained at the expense of St. Peter. Such, however, was the influence of the popes of that period, that nothing could intimidate the prelates; the bull of Innocent was published throughout the kingdom, and divine service was suspended. John endeavoured, in vain, to reduce the clergy to submission; monks preferred to abandon their convents, and bishops to lose churches and their property, rather than contravene the orders of the pope. In the midst of this strife, a terrible sentence of the court of Rome aggravated the disorders; John was declared dispossessed of his crown; the nation freed from its oaths of fidelity; all Christians were ordered to oppose the king of England; Philip Augustus was designated to replace him, and a crusade was preached against Great Britain.

The ambitious Philip, who had recently been reconciled with Innocent, immediately made immense preparations and threatened a descent on England. In this extremity, the unfortunate king, finding himself abandoned by all the world, determined to submit to the pope, and take the oath which Innocent had pointed out, and which was as follows:—
“We promise by the Christ and the holy evangelists, to be reconciled with Stephen Langton, the metropolitan of Canterbury, and with the five bishops, William of London, Eustace of Ely, Giles of Hertford, Jocelyn of Bath, and Herbert of Lincoln, as well as with all other persons, as well clerical as lay, who have opposed us by the orders of the holy father; we will restore to them all that has been taken from them, and we will liberally recompense them for the losses which we have made them suffer. We swear entire submission to the Holy See, and we recognise in it alone the right of nominating prelates, and of governing the churches of our kingdom.”

But this oath was only the prelude for new exactions of the court of Rome; and two days after, the Roman legate remitted a deed by which John declared, that for the expiation of his sins, with the advice of his barons, and of his own free and entire will, he gave to pope Innocent and his successors, the kingdoms of England and Ireland, with all their rights; that he held them as the vassal of the pontiff, and in that capacity did him liege homage. In addition to all this, as a token of his subjection, he engaged to pay a thousand marks of gold annually to the court of Rome, besides Peter's pence. He bound, by the same deed, all his successors to maintain this donation, under penalty of being deprived of the crown. The English lords, according to Mathew Paris, refused to ratify this disgraceful treaty which subjected them to the popes; they revolted against the king and reclaimed their franchises.

John thus still found himself on the eve of losing his crown, by having taken the means which he believed the best fitted to preserve it. He hastened to send deputies to Rome to inform the holy father of the revolt of the English barons, and to ask from him the aid of spiritual censures, in order to reduce them to their duty. Innocent having heard the complaints of his ambassadors, frowned and exclaimed, “What! do these English barons wish to dethrone a king who is under the protection of our See, and give to another the property of the Roman church. By St. Peter, we will not suffer this effort to go unpunished.” He immediately called a scribe, and dictated this sentence to him, “We cancel all the concessions which King John has made or shall make to his barons, prohibiting him from having any regard thereto, under penalty of excommunication. We order all the English and Irish lords to renounce the privileges which they have extorted from their king, and we order them to come to Rome to lay their demands before us, in order that justice may be done them.” Neither this bull of the pope nor the threats of the bishops could arrest the disorders; and the barons continued to carry on the war to obtain new franchises.

In the same year (1215), Innocent held a general council in the palace of the Lateran, for the coronation of Frederick the Second, who was definitely recognised as the legitimate emperor, under the condition that Sicily and Germany should be separated.

The counts of Toulouse and Foix, also appeared before the fathers, demanding justice against the infamous Simon de Montfort, who had seized upon their estates, and in concert with St. Dominick, was continuing his massacres of the unfortunate Albigenses. Far from showing any indignation at the recital of the atrocities committed by his legate, the pope fiercely replied, that he had but executed his orders, and that he could not censure orthodox Christians from exhibiting too much zeal in their holy mission. He, however, appeared to yield to the urgency of these two lords, and engaged to re-establish them in their domains—a false promise—since at that very moment he was sending secret orders to Dominick and Simon de Montfort to redouble their severities towards the Albigenses.

Ferrand maintains that St. François d'Assise came also to the council of the Lateran, to have the regulations which he had made for governing his convents approved. The history of this visionary is so remarkable that we translate one of the episodes of his life, related by Ferrand, “St. François d'Assise,” says the chronicler, “at the commencement of his conversion, cast himself into a ditch full of ice, in the middle of winter, to conquer the demon of the flesh, and preserve from the fire of pleasure the white robe of his chastity. This pious anchorite preferred to suffer great cold in the flesh, than the warmth of the demon in his soul. Thus, one day, he underwent great temptation at the sight of a beautiful young girl, who came to demand his blessing. François, instead of listening to the inspirations of concupiscence, suddenly entered his cell, and reappeared, entirely naked, with a discipline of iron, striking himself redoubled blows, to the great edification of his brethren and the villagers, until his body was streaming with blood. He then rolled in the snow of the garden, crying out that the Holy Spirit had seized on him; in fact he made seven enormous balls with the snow, tinged with his blood, and his soul thus spoke to his body.—‘The largest and handsomest of these balls is your wife, the four others are your concubines, and the two last your servants; hasten then to conduct them to your fireside, for they are dying of cold.' The saint having pushed them one after another before a brazier, they soon disappeared before the heat of the fire, and only left on the stones a large place soiled by blood and water; the soul of the saint thus continued; 'profit by this example, my body, and perceive how the delights of the flesh should vanish in the presence of the spirit.'"

Bayle also relates, very gravely, a pleasant strife, which took place between Dominick, the leader of the crusade against the Albigenses, and St. François d'Assise. "These two saints," says he, "having one day quarrelled, came to blows. As François was the weakest, he escaped from the arm of his terrible adversary and concealed himself beneath a bed. Dominick not being able to reach him, armed himself with a spit from the kitchen, and inflicted on him five terrible blows; but God, who cherished the two monks, himself directed the spit, softened the blows, and preserved St. François from death; he, however, retained from this fight scars like the five wounds of Jesus Christ."

D'Aubigne has been more severe than these legends on the founder of the order of the Franciscans. "If any bishop or cardinal," says the historian, "became enamoured of his page, he need not fear to be damned; on the contrary, he would deserve to be canonized, since he would follow the example of St. François d'Assise, who called his carnal intercourse with brother Maceus sacred loves."

Notwithstanding his fight with St. Dominick, and his well-established reputation as a sodomite, François d'Assise was received with great honours at the pontifical court, and left Rome laden with presents; and, what was still more extraordinary, he alone, of all who had assisted at the synod, was not obliged to borrow from the usurers to make presents to Innocent, but even received gifts from the sovereign pontiff.

Whilst the holy father was trying the strength of his anathemas against those who refused to recognise his absolute authority, Philip undertook the conquest of England, and sent his son Louis into that kingdom, whither a powerful party called him. The young prince was already recognised as sovereign of Great Britain in several provinces, when he had the imprudence to inform the Roman legate that his new kingdom would never be the patrimony of St. Peter. Innocent, informed of this, immediately ordered a great ceremonial in the church of St. Peter: he mounted the tribune, and preached on these words of Ezekiel: "Sword, sword, leave thy scabbard, and sharpen thyself to kill." After the sermon, he declared Louis deprived of the throne of England, and excommunicated him and his adherents.

Finally came the decisive hour in which tyrants, like other men, must go to render an account to God of their good and evil actions. This fatal day came to Innocent; at the termination of a debauch at the table he was seized with a violent fever, which brought him to the tomb on the 16th of July, 1216.

Mathew Paris, in his history, represents Pope Innocent as the proudest, the most ambitious, and the most avaricious of men; affirming that there was no crime which he was not capable of committing or favouring for money. This judgment is entirely justified by the life of this pope. St. Lutgarde, a nun of the order of the Citeaux in Brabant, relates that, in a vision which she had after the death of Innocent, she saw the holy father surrounded by flames; and as she asked him why he was thus tormented, he replied that it was chiefly for three crimes; and that he would have been infallibly condemned to have burned for ever, but for the intercession of the Mother of God, in honour of whom he had founded a monastery—that notwithstanding even this powerful protection, he could not enter heaven until the day of the last judgment—and, after having suffered tortures incomprehensible by the human mind. Thomas of Cantimpré, who relates this, adds, that he was informed by Lutgarde, herself, of the three causes of the sufferings of the holy father; but that they were so horrible he could not make them known without abandoning the memory of Innocent the Third to the execration of men.

HONORIUS THE THIRD, THE ONE HUNDRED AND EIGHTY-SECOND POPE.

[A. D. 1216:]

CENCIO SAVELLI, a Roman by birth, had been chamberlain during the pontificate of Clement the Third. This post giving him the superintendence of all the revenues of the Holy See, had created for him numerous partizans. He himself was not without merit; and a remarkable work, called the Book of Rents of the Roman Church, composed from old records, was attributed to him. His literary labours had augmented the reputation he had already acquired, and had procured for him the title of cardinal. He afterwards composed a complete collection of ecclesiastical ceremonies, which is known by the title of the Roman Order.

After the death of Innocent, the cardinal Cencio Savelli was chosen to succeed him, and took the name of Honorius the Third. A faithful imitator of the policy of his predecessor, like him he wished to govern at once the east and the west. On the very day of his coronation he wrote to the king of Jerusalem, that he was about to raise the people of the west against the Saracens. He also addressed letters to the French emperor, who governed Constantinople, to reanimate his zeal against the Greek schismatics, and the Mussulmen. The same instructions were sent to the Roman legates in France, England, and Germany, to again light the torches of fanaticism, by preaching a new crusade.

As the war of usurpation undertaken by Louis of France, for the crown of England, retarded the execution of his plans, Honorius resolved to put an end to the disputes by declaring in favour of king John. After the death of that prince, he took his son, Henry the Third, under his protection, recognising him as the only lawful sovereign. In consequence of the new orders of the pope, the clergy of Great Britain every Sunday regularly excommunicated the young Louis and his adherents, throughout the whole kingdom. Little by little, the English deserted his cause, and as he received no assistance from his father, he was finally obliged to quit Great Britain, to avoid falling into the power of his competitor, and to urge the departure of new troops which he was levying on the continent. But during his absence, the legate of the pope used the time to such advantage as to fulminate terrible anathemas against the rebels, and pathetically exhorted the English to return to their duty, and remain faithful to their new sovereign, that is, the Holy See. They distributed so skilfully, gold, threats, and promises, that they were enabled to organise so powerful a party, that on his return to England, though accompanied by a powerful army, Louis was repulsed from all the cities, and forced to re-embark for France.

Having obtained this great success, Honorius could direct all his efforts to the end which his ambition proposed, the conquest of Palestine and Asia. For this purpose, he sent to all the bishops of the west a letter from the grand master of the Templars, announcing that the Saracens were extremely weakened, and that a single army would be sufficient to exterminate them. At the same time, he ordered public prayers at Rome, and went in procession to St. Maria Majora's, with his clergy and people walking with naked feet and carrying before him the heads of St. Peter and St. Paul in their shrines. Similar ceremonies took place in all the cities of Christendom, and contributed powerfully to the organization of the numerous troops of crusaders who came together from all quarters, and directed their steps towards the Holy Land.

The king of Hungary was the first who marched at the head of an army; he was soon followed by a prodigious number of undisciplined bands, which, like torrents of lava, left but ruin and desolation on their passage. The alarm which the approach of the crusaders every where excited, became the source of enormous profits to Honorius, and he extracted ransoms from cities and princes, by threatening to cause these terrible avalanches to fall on them. It was the means he used against Theodore Comnenus, the king of Epirus, to compel him to set at liberty John Colonna, one of his legates, who had been retained a prisoner at his court. Neither entreaties nor threats could induce the Greek prince to send back the ambassador of the Holy See; Honorius then promised indulgences to the crusaders who should go to Epirus to avenge the injury done to the Roman church. Theodore Comnenus immediately changed his resolve, hastened to set the legate at liberty, and even furnished him with an escort to accompany him as far as Constantinople.

Though the pope appeared to be very much occupied with the new crusade, he did not, however, lose sight of the heretics of the west, and by his orders, St. Dominick and De Montfort continued their massacres in France, and covered all the southern provinces with funeral piles and scaffolds. The two instruments of pontifical despotism at length excited such a hatred in the generous population of the south, that the cities of Marseilles and Avignon, instead of marching against the heretics, as they had been required to do by the pope, sent re-inforcements to Toulouse, which was a second time besieged by the execrable Simon de Montfort. God did not permit him to renew in this city the frightful scenes of the first siege; he was killed beneath the walls of the place whilst he was preparing the gibbets and instruments of torture which he designed for the inhabitants.

Dominick being left alone to continue the massacres, soon showed, by the new ardour which he brought to the persecution, that he had promised the court of Rome to replace Simon, and alone to perform the task of two executioners. Difficult as it was, he was fulfilling his promises, when death struck him in his turn, and gave some repose to the Abigenses.

This double loss would have discouraged any other than a pope; Honorius thought only of replacing his legate; and as it appeared to him that the work of an executioner could not be performed better than by a king, he wrote to Louis the Eighth, who had succeeded Philip Augustus: "Very dear Son, you know that Christian princes are compelled to render an account to God of their defence of the church, their mother. You should then be deeply afflicted at seeing the heretics attack religion in the provinces of the Albigenses; if it is your duty to pursue robbers in your kingdom, you should the more purge it of those who wish to ravish souls. We find the efforts we have made against the heretics have become useless; and more than three hundred thousand crusaders have fallen in this holy cause, without making it triumph. Errors are more and more propagated; and it is feared lest they may soon infect your kingdom, which, until this time, has shown itself, by a particular blessing of God, to be more strengthened in the faith than other kingdoms. It is on this account, that in the name of Christ we exhort and conjure you, Catholic prince and successor of Catholic kings, to offer up to God the first fruits of your reign, by exterminating the heretics of the south. We are informed that Amaury, the new count of Toulouse, and son of the glorious Count de Montfort, has offered you all the rights which he has over the provinces of the Albigenses, and consents to unite these lands to your domains, in exchange for your protection. We authorise you to accept his proposals for yourself and your descendents, that they may show themselves to be ardent protectors of orthodoxy, in the south of France. Finally, we inform you that Raymond, the son of the former Count of Toulouse, so dreads your power, that he will not fail to submit immediately to the church, when he shall know that you are marching against him. Act then as religion wishes! Take arms, since God and your interest command it!"

In conformity with the orders of the pope, Louis levied an army, and joined his troops to those of Amaury de Montfort, to crush the unfortunate Albigenses. Raymond, pursued by his enemies, enclosed in his states, was soon compelled to submit to the Holy See. The heretics finding themselves exposed, defenceless, to all the rage of their persecutors, abandoned France, and took refuge in Lombardy, whither sacerdotal hatred still pursued them; for Honorius wrote to the bishop of Brescia, "It is our will, that the towers of all the lords who have given an asylum to heretics, be razed to the earth, without being able to be ever rebuilt, and those of the less guilty be dismantled to the half or third part, according to the importance of the crime."

As after the departure of the king, the Albigenses had again raised their heads, the pope wrote to Louis, to put an end to his disputes with the king of England, in order to direct all his troops upon the southern provinces. "And in order," said Honorius, "that my conduct should be in conformity with evangelical morality, which orders popes to use their power to put an end to useless wars, and to direct the sword against the enemies of God. You know that it was said to the high priest Jeremy, 'I have set thee over the people to destroy and to build up.' Thus popes have the power of disposing of armies and kingdoms, and of raising or destroying empires! It is on this account, that we order you to restore to the English prince the territories which you have invaded, to cease all hostilities against him, and to employ your troops in the extermination of your heretical subjects."

These representations acted powerfully on the superstitious mind of Louis the Eighth; he concluded a treaty with the king of England, took the cross from the hands of the Roman legate, and went towards the south of France, at the head of his army. Avignon was the first city which fell into his power; its walls were thrown down, ditches filled up, and all its courageous population put to the sword. But divine justice did not permit this monster to continue the course of his cruelties; he fell sick and died, thirty days after the capture of Avignon.

Whilst half of France, in obedience to the sacrilegious orders of the pope, was precipitating itself upon the south, Frederick the Second was endeavouring again to strengthen the great imperial edifice, so much shaken by the rough attacks which proud pontiffs, during preceding reigns, had made on it. The better to succeed in his purposes, he feigned to be animated by a great zeal for the crusades, and was among the first to enrol himself in the sacred militia; he, however, retarded his departure under new pretexts, now alleging important affairs, now giving it as a reason that he could not quit his kingdom, until he had been crowned emperor.

Honorius penetrated his secret intentions, and in order not to furnish him with an excuse, he decided solemnly to consecrate him in the church of St. Peter at Rome. After the ceremony, Frederick received the cross from the hands of cardinal Hugolin, bishop of Ostia, and publicly renewed his vow to go to the Holy Land; as he however still deferred his departure, the pope, wearied with his tardiness, wrote to him:

"Would to God, prince, that you would consider with what impatience you are waited for by the eastern church, which hopes to see you abandon all other cares for the deliverance of Jerusalem. In France, England, and even in Italy, it is asked why you defer the execution of your vow, by retarding the departure of the galleys which you have armed for Syria, and where they would be of so much assistance to the crusaders in the defence of Damietta."

Frederick did not even reply to this letter, and continued to occupy himself in the administration of his estates. But when the loss of Damietta was known at Rome, the anger of the holy father broke forth; he accused the emperor of being the cause of the checks which the Christians had experienced in the east, and threatened to excommunicate him, if he did not go immediately with his army to combat the infidel.

So much insolence exasperated the young prince. He came to an open rupture with the Holy See, seized on several domains which the pope had usurped, drove from the kingdom of Naples and Sicily all the prelates whom he suspected, and named others in their place in accordance with the privileges of the ancient monarchy of Sicily. He then wrote to the court of Rome, that the time had come to restore to him the rights of which Innocent the Third had despoiled him, and also those which Honorius had taken away at the time of his coronation, threatening in case of a refusal to march on Rome and sack it.

The pope discovering that he had been too hasty, and not daring then to engage in a strife which could only be fatal to him, immediately retracted, and replied to the prince with hypocritical mildness—"I exhort you, my dear son, to recall to your recollection that you are the protector of the Roman church; do not forget what you owe to that good mother, and take pity on her daughter the church of the East, which extends towards you her arms like an unfortunate who has no longer any hope but in you."

Notwithstanding this apparent mark of submission, the holy father none the less continued the organization of a powerful league against the emperor of Germany and Italy. Frederick, who was informed of it, immediately convened the German bishops and his nobility, in the city of Ferentina, to put the pope on his trial. Honorius, far from exhibiting fear, went to this assembly accompanied by John of Brienne, king of Jerusalem, and his daughter Yolande, by the commander of the templars, the grand master of the Teutonic knights, and several other great persons from various countries. The adroit pontiff knew how to avail himself skilfully of the beauty of the daughter of king John in serving his purposes; he brought about secret interviews between her and Frederick; and when the young prince, smitten by the charms of the beautiful Yolande, expressed a wish to marry her, the pope declared to the two lovers that the marriage could only take place on condition that the king should go definitely into Syria to reconquer the throne of his father-in-law. Frederick appeared to yield to these proposals, in order to clear away the obstacles which opposed themselves to his union, and occupied himself with assembling his forces by land and sea, as if he was really going to transport them into Palestine. But as soon as the marriage was concluded, his ardour for the crusade relaxed, and he demanded further delay.

Honorius, who had had time to take his measures, refused to accede to the demands of Frederick, and immediately caused all the cities of Lombardy to revolt. The emperor essayed to re-establish order in his kingdom, and wished to levy troops in the duchy of Spoleto; but the clergy had there kindled the fire of rebellion, and the Spoletins refused to grant the troops without an order from the pope, whose vassals they declared themselves to be. This universal resistance alarmed the emperor. Through necessity he approached the Holy See, and promised to put his journey to the Holy Land in execution; and, as a proof of his submission, he placed his kingdom under the protection of the Roman church, and bound himself to pay it a considerable annual tribute.

The pope, fearful lest new obstacles to his plans should rise up, consented to make peace, and pressed the departure of the crusaders in all the countries of Europe. He died in the interval, and had not the satisfaction to see his policy triumph. His body was buried at St. Maria Majora, on the 20th of March, 1227. Honorius showed himself, in the course of his reign, to be as cruel and ambitious as his infamous predecessor.

GREGORY THE NINTH, THE ONE HUNDRED AND EIGHTY-THIRD POPE.

[A. D. 1227.]

Opinion of Maimburg about Gregory—Enthronement of the new pope—War against the Albigenses—Quarrel between the emperor and the pope—Frederick is excommunicated—He avenges himself on Gregory—His departure for the Holy Land—The pope makes war on his lieutenants—His return to Germany—He is again excommunicated—Great inundation at Rome—Peace between the emperor and pope—Gregory is driven from Rome by the people—He becomes reconciled with the Romans—New discords between the altar and the throne—Frederick the Second is excommunicated the fourth time—The pope offers the imperial crown to the king of France, who refuses it—Convocation of a council for a crusade—St. Louis prohibits the pope from levying dimes in his kingdom—Death of Gregory.

MAIMBURG affirms that Gregory was well made in his person, of a majestic carriage, and especially very learned in the canon law and Holy Scriptures. He adds, however, that we must deplore the extreme severity and violence of his character, which urged him to extremes which were frequently very prejudicial to his interests. Having become pontiff, he abandoned the title of cardinal bishop of Ostia, though still keeping the revenues of that see, and gave up his name of Hugolin to take that of Gregory. He was originally from Anagni, and was descended from the illustrious family of the counts of Segni, as was his predecessor Innocent the Third.

His exaltation was made with unusual pomp; on the day of the ceremony he went to St. Peter's with an imposing train of cardinals and archbishops; and after having celebrated divine service, he went to take possession of the pontifical palace, traversing the streets of Rome mounted on a white horse, richly caparisoned with scarlet housings, all shining with gold and precious stones. Every where on his passage were spread flowers and perfumes; the houses were hung with tapestry resplendent with gold and silver; at the head of the cortège walked young girls singing hymns of joy; then came the monks in double file, with the children of the schools, all carrying palm branches or bunches of flowers; after these followed the officers of the magistracy and the army clothed in silk and gold; and finally, the president of the senate and the prefect of Rome, walked by the side of the pope, leading his horse by the bridle. Behind this magnificent cortège, which extended from the great palace to the banks of the Tiber, followed by an innumerable crowd of priests and citizens, Gregory thus arrived in triumph at the palace of the Lateran, where he was submitted to the usual proofs.

On the day succeeding his installation, the new pontiff wrote to all the bishops of Europe to accelerate the departure of the crusaders, under the penalty of incurring ecclesiastical censures. He sought at the same time to reanimate the persecutions against the unfortunate Albigenses, and availing himself of the ascendancy which he exercised over the mind of Blanche of Castille, the mother of St. Louis, who had been appointed regent of the kingdom during the minority of her son, he induced her to confide the command of her troops to Imbert of Beaujeu, one of the most ardent fanatics of the day. Under the command of that lord, the religious war recommenced as terribly as in the time of Simon de Montfort. All the Albigenses who fell into the power of the Catholics were massacred with extreme cruelty; and those who, to avoid death, surrendered, were pitilessly condemned to the funeral pile by Arnellin, the legate of the pope. "But," says Perrin, "the more the persecution increased, the more did the number of the heretics multiply."

Gregory, though much occupied with the Albigenses, was not forgetful of Germany, and he ordered the emperor to depart for the Holy Land, in fulfilment of the vow which he had taken at the time of his marriage with the daughter of the king of Jerusalem. As it was no longer possible for Frederick to put off his departure, he promised to obey him, and in fact fixed on a general rendezvous for his troops at Brindés. It was then in the middle of summer; an epidemic soon broke out in the army, and in a few days a large number of soldiers were carried off by the scourge.

The emperor took advantage of the general panic to invent a new trick to free himself from his promise. By his orders a priest appeared in the camp of the crusaders, representing himself to be a legate from the pope, and instructed by the holy father to release them from their vows, and authorise them to return home. This trick was entirely successful; on that very day the army disbanded, and the emperor remained with his own guards; he, however, embarked for Palestine, to fulfil, as he said, the promise made to the holy father; but three days afterwards he returned to the port of Otranto, alleging as an excuse, that he had discovered the impossibility of his supporting the fatigues of a voyage.

Furious at the emperor, Gregory was no longer careful in his proceedings; he went to the cathedral of Anagni, his residence, and there, clothed in his pontifical ornaments, surrounded by the cardinals, bishops, and other prelates of his suite, he thundered forth a sermon on this text, "We must remove the scandal from Christendom;" and after the sermon, he lanced ecclesiastical thunders against the emperor. Frederick replied by a manifesto against the Holy See, in which this passage occurs: "Learn, people of Italy, that the Roman church not only swallows up, in its orgies, the wealth which it snatches from the superstition of the faithful, but that it even despoils sovereigns, and renders them tributary. We do not speak of the simony, exactions, and usury with which it has infected all the west; for every one knows that the popes are insatiable blood suckers. The priests affirm that the church is our mother, our nurse; it is, on the contrary, an infamous step-mother, which devours those whom its hypocritical voice calls children. It sends its legates into all quarters to lanch excommunications, to order massacres, and to steal the wealth of princes and people. In its hands the morality of Christ has become a terrible arm, which permits it to murder men in order to ravish from them their treasures, as a brigand would do upon the highway. Under the name of indulgences it impudently sells the right to commit every crime, and gives the best places in paradise to those who bring it the most money."

The publication of this manifesto increased still further the exasperation of the pope; he immediately returned to Rome, lanced a second excommunication against Frederick, and endeavoured to excite a rebellion in Apulia. For this purpose he addressed the following circular to the bishops of that country: "We have drawn against the emperor," said he, "the medicinal sword of St. Peter, and with a spirit full of mildness we have lanced our thunders against that proud prince who refused to fulfil his vows regarding the Holy Land." He then ordered the prelates to place all the cities and country which the emperor traversed under interdict, and to excite the inhabitants to assassinate him. On his side, Frederick, in order to resist the pon tiff, called to his aid the Frangipani, and other Roman lords, who were enemies to the Holy See. He bought from them all the property which they possessed at Rome in houses and lands; he then restored to them their titles to their fiefs, on condition that they would become his allies, and would aid him on all occasions against the church. This done, the Frangipani returned to Rome, excited the people against Gregory, and on Easter Monday, whilst he was celebrating mass in the church of St. Peter, a revolt broke out in the city; the pope was insulted at the very altar, pushed out of the church, driven from the city, and forced to take up his residence at Perouse.

Some months afterwards, the emperor was apprised of the death of Noraddin, the sultan of Damascus; this news changed all his policy; judging the moment favourable for passing over into Syria, and reconquering the throne of Jerusalem, to which he had rights from his marriage with the daughter of John de Brienne, he immediately sent five hundred knights into Palestine, whilst he himself prepared to embark with a formidable army. The holy father, who saw with chagrin the triumph of his enemy, prohibited him from crossing the sea, before receiving absolution from the censures of the church. But the emperor having testified no more regard for its prohibition than he had for its injunction, Gregory excommunicated him for going to the Holy Land as he had before anathematised him for his refusal to go. Then taking advantage of the absence of Frederick, the holy father declared war on Rainald of Aversa, duke of Spoleto, who had been left by that prince in the government of Sicily, Apulia and Calabria. He sent an army against him, commanded by cardinal John Colonna and John of Brienne, the father-in-law of the emperor, who had taken up arms against his son-in-law out of base jealousy, because he saw him on the point of re-seizing a kingdom which he would never have abandoned, if he had entertained a thought of ever being able to reconquer it.

The papal army obtained for this war the same dispensations as the crusaders, and the only thing which distinguished the soldiery of the pope from the soldiery of Christ, was the sign they bore on the shoulder; the one had the cross, the other the keys; as to the rest their conduct was alike. As they had a provision of plenary indulgences, they stopped, neither the one nor the other, at the commission of massacres, rapes, and burnings, and it would be difficult to tell who excelled in cruelties and sacrilege: for the Christians of Apulia were treated with such barbarities by the legates of the pope, that it appears impossible for the infidels to have suffered greater disasters from the crusaders.

Thomas of Acquin, count of Acerra, rendered an account to the emperor of the invasion by the troops of the pope, in the following terms: "After your departure, illustrious prince, Gregory assembled a numerous army by the aid of John of Brienne, and of some other lords; his legates then entered your territories, saying, that they would conquer by the sword, since they had not been able to break you down by an anathema. Their troops have burned the villages, pillaged the cultivators, violated the women, devastated the fields, and, without respecting churches or cemeteries, have stolen the sacred vessels and robbed the tombs; never did a pope act so abominably. He has now caused all the ports to be guarded, in order to seize your person if you arrive with a suite too weak to defend you; he is, finally, even intriguing in the Holy Land, in which you are; and he has made a compact with the templars to put you to death by the poinard of an assassin. May God keep you from the pope and his vicars!"

This letter enlightened Frederick as to the dangers which he incurred in the camp of the crusaders, and he hastened to enter into negotiations with Melec Camel, the sultan of Egypt, to conclude a treaty. He did well: for during the conferences the templars and hospitallers sought to betray him, and had written to the sultan to inform him that Frederick was about to make a pilgrimage on foot, and almost without an escort, to the river Jordan, on the third day succeeding the reception of that letter, and that thus the Mussulmen could, without a blow, take him a prisoner or put him to death. Fortunately, Melec Camel was a generous enemy; and after having heard the message, he informed the emperor. The latter, judging that it was not prudent to allow his indignation to appear, feigned entire ignorance, promptly concluded his arrangements with the sultan, and embarked for Italy. His arrival changed the face of affairs: the papal troops were compelled to retreat, and the Sicilian army, in its turn, acted on the offensive.

But Gregory was not the man readily to abandon his aim; and as money was wanting to him for the continuance of the war, he gave orders to squeeze all Christian countries. England was taxed with a tenth part of the moveable goods of the kingdom. "All the children of the church must come to our aid," wrote the holy father to his legates; "for if we fail in our present contest with the empire, all the clergy will perish with their chief."

This extraordinary tithe was levied with the approval of the king; the legates acted with such rapacity, that they included in moveable goods, even the crops which were yet on the ground; and, as the holy father was unwilling to wait for the realization of this impost, they sold its collection to the bishops, at a low price, in order to receive the money at once; or in default of money, chalices, reliquaries, and the other sacred vases of their churches. After England, the pope ransacked Italy, France, Germany, Spain, Portugal, and even Denmark and Sweden. With this money, drawn from the credulity of the faithful, he levied troops, and essayed to retake the country; but the new recruits were cut to pieces, and the emperor continued to advance on Rome, where his party was all-powerful, thanks to the Frangipani, who had remained masters of the forts built since the expulsion of the pontiff.

Gregory, recognising the impossibility of subjugating Frederick by the sword, tried ecclesiastical thunders, and fulminated the following anathema. "We release all the subjects of Frederick the excommunicated, from their oaths of fidelity, especially those of the kingdom of Sicily; because Christians should not regard the sanctity of an oath towards him who is the enemy of God, and who tramples under feet the decrees of the church." Still the spiritual arms were impotent to arrest the march of the emperor, and Rome only awaited his arrival to open her gates to him, when a terrible event changed the disposition of their minds.

In a single night, at the end of a storm, the Tiber left its bed, and its waters covered the city even to the tops of the houses; a prodigious number of the inhabitants were drowned: others were crushed beneath the edifices which fell down; and, finally, others deprived of all succour, died of famine; and to heighten the disasters, when the waters had by degrees regained their bed there remained in the streets and cellars a great filth, which, mingling with the dead bodies in a state of putrefaction, engendered an epidemic which decimated the population.

The partizans of Gregory hastened to dwell on this public calamity, by representing it as a heavenly punishment; and they determined the citizens to send a deputation to Perouse to offer to restore the pope to the palace of the Lateran; it was accepted promptly, and Frederick, who knew the superstitious spirit of the Romans, dared not go further and even sought to enter into an arrangement with the holy father. His envoys were at first repulsed by the sacred college: presents then produced their usual effect, and it was decided to enter into conferences with them.

The following were the conditions of the treaty proposed by the pope:—"Frederick shall permit that, for the future, in the kingdom of Sicily, the elections, postulations, and confirmations of churches and monasteries shall be made in accordance with the decretals of the general council; he shall indemnify the templars and hospitallers for the damages which they have sustained in defence of the church, during the divisions; he shall pay all the expenses incurred in this war; and, finally, he shall give the Holy See sufficient security to guarantee the execution of the present convention."—Frederick ratified all the clauses of this treaty, and, in token of submission, went to Anagni, after which the two allies dined together, and renewed the oath to maintain the peace which they had signed.

But each sought to deceive his enemy, having decided to seize the favourable moment to overthrow the other. The emperor continued his intrigues at Rome, and the pope was soon driven a second time from the holy city, and compelled to take refuge at Nice; on his side the pope had sent secret emissaries to Henry king of Germany, the oldest son of Frederick, to urge the young prince to revolt against his father. He had also, under pretence of pacifying the cities of Lombardy, sent into that province a celebrated preacher named John of Vincenza, to preach to the people union against the empire in case the emperor should wish to oppress them. Finally, for the same end, Gregory had published a collection of decretals, forming a species of code, in which all the decisions of the court of Rome, upon causes in which the pope was to judge as an arbitrary sovereign, were found classified. This collection was afterwards called the Book of the Decretals of Pope Gregory the Ninth, and aided the popes in attributing to themselves the absolute government of benefices.

Such was the situation of affairs when the new revolt broke out against Gregory. He immediately wrote to Frederick to demand his aid, feigning ignorance of the part which he had taken in the matter. As the prince, in his reply, did not even take the pains to conceal the joy which he felt at the expulsion of the holy father, the latter made dispositions to take his revenge, and under pretext of a war against the Romans, sent legates into all Christian kingdoms to obtain a tenth of their revenues. The ambassadors of the pope were the bearers of the following bull: "In the war which we maintain against the Romans, we act merely, my brethren, for the interests of the whole church, we consequently order you to send us the tenth of the produce of your goods, and a proper succour of men-at-arms; that we may be enabled to crush our adversaries, so that for the future they shall not dare to rise against us." The sovereigns of France, Castile, Arragon, Navarre, Portugal, Barcelona, Roussillon, Germany and Austria, hastened to obey the orders of the pontiff, to prevent their being excommunicated. These reinforcements of men were directed not on Rome, but Milan, to aid the Lombards who were in open revolt, and who recognised king Henry as their lawful sovereign.

In this extremity, Frederick endeavoured to reconcile himself with the pope anew, and offered conditions so advantageous to the Holy See, that Gregory immediately abandoned the unfortunate prince whom he had placed at the head of the revolt. Henry, reduced to his own forces, could do nothing but submit; he laid down his arms and came to implore the clemency of his father. The emperor, justly irritated against him, confined him in a strong fortress, where he died some years afterwards.

When peace was entirely re-established in his kingdom, Frederick again dreamed of taking vengeance on the pope, and sent into Sardinia Henry, one of his bastards, with a formidable army to conquer it; after which he declared him king of it to the prejudice of the rights of the Holy See, which for ages claimed the possession of that island. Gregory, furious at the success of his enemy, immediately assembled his cardinals in council, and fulminated this new sentence of excommunication:—

“By the authority of the Father, Son and Holy Spirit, and that of the apostles St. Peter and St. Paul, we anathematise Frederick who calls himself emperor, as sacrilegious and a heretic. We excommunicate him because he has excited seditions in Rome against the church, for the purpose of overthrowing us from the apostolic throne, and of upsetting the sacred college of our cardinals. We anathematise him, because he calls us Anti-Christ, Balaam, and Prince of Darkness; because he has hindered our legate from persecuting the Albigenses; because he has seized upon the territory of the church, and especially Sardinia; and because he refuses to return to the Holy Land. We declare all his subjects absolved from the oaths they have taken to him, and we prohibit them, under penalty of excommunication, from obeying him until he shall have come to implore our mercy.”

Frederick was at Padua when he received the bull of anathema fulminated against him, and in his rage he replied with a terrible manifesto. Thus recommenced the war between the pope and the emperor. Frederick drove from Sicily all the preaching friars; he levied subsidies upon all ecclesiastics without distinction, and prohibited his subjects from going to Rome without especial authority. On his side the pope called to his aid the crusaders, who were ready to embark for Palestine, seized upon pious legacies and alms destined for their wants, and as he was not yet strong enough to attack the emperor, he sent legates to the court of France to solicit money and troops.

St. Louis permitted the ambassadors of the Holy See to convoke an assembly of the clergy and nobility at Senlis, and they there obtained permission to seize a twentieth of the revenues of the kingdom to succour Rome. Gregory was so well pleased with the conduct of the French, who for the third time, and at periods so approximate, had granted to him enormous subsidies, that he offered the imperial crown to Robert, count of Artois, the brother of the king. St. Louis rejected this odious proposal. “How has the pope dared to depose so great a prince?” he said to the legate. “If Frederick has merited the censures of the church, he ought above all to be judged in a general council, and not by his enemies. For our part, we regard him as innocent and as unjustly anathematised; we know that he has combated bravely in the Holy Land, and that he was exposed to all the dangers of war whilst the pope was seeking treacherously to deprive him of his kingdom and even to cause him to be assassinated.

“We are unwilling, then, to imitate the conduct of Gregory, and to combat against this prince to deprive him of his crown; we know that the holy father is not desirous of Christian blood when it flows for his temporal interests. Besides, if we were weak enough to subserve his fury what would it avail us? After the victory for which he would be indebted to us, he would turn against us and trample us under foot, as his predecessors have so often done to the kings of France or emperors of Germany. You have asked for money from us: we have granted it to you, but we refuse to give you the soldiers you ask for to conquer a crown you are not permitted to dispose of.”

Gregory then wished to assemble a general council in order solemnly to depose the emperor; and as he feared lest Frederick would throw obstacles in the way of its assembling if he penetrated the true object, he entered into negotiations with him and gave out that the synod was to fix the basis of a definite peace between the altar and the throne. At the same time his legates spread themselves through France and England to distribute the letters of convocation, and to impress the bishops of these provinces favourably to him.

But Frederick was not the dupe of this ruse, and he wrote to the king of France, “You have already, prince, refused to become the instrument of the fury of Gregory, and to declare against us; the implacable pontiff has not, however, renounced the hope of ranging you on his side, and he essays a new trick to surprise your piety. No, the council which he wishes to assemble is not to be the mediator of peace; it is, on the contrary to be subservient to his ambition and to overthrow our empire. We declare to you then, to you, illustrious prince, whose interests are the same as our own, that as long as war shall exist between the empire and the Holy See we will not authorise the convocation of a council, because we consider it unbecoming in a king to submit to the decision of priests a case which has such important bearings on our secular power. We accordingly forewarn you that we will pursue to extremity those of your prelates who shall go to this assembly. We also inform you that the enormous sums which you have permitted to be raised in your estates are actually expended for the pay of the soldiers destined to make war on us; and that they are preparing to make new demands on you for money.”

In fact, the pope, seconded by his legates, had made a fourth levy of money in all the monasteries of France, and he waited for these new supplies to reinforce his army and attack the emperor. St. Louis, apprised of this by Frederick, stopped this money, already on its way towards Italy, and appropriated it to himself for the wants of his kingdom.

At the same time, the emperor surrounded all the sea-ports, and made prisoners of the cardinals and bishops who were going to the council. The war was pursued on both sides with equal vigour; at length the cardinal Colonna, the best general of the pope, having entered the service of Frederick, the party of the Ghibelines had the advantage; Beneventum, Faenza, Spoleto, Assise, and a great number of other cities fell into the power of that prince, and his troops were soon enabled to make incursions beneath the very walls of Rome.

Notwithstanding these reverses, the stubborn

Gregory obstinately refused to make peace with the empire, as a letter addressed to the king of France, by Frederick, testifies. "We learn," wrote the prince, "that the Tartars have invaded Hungary, and threaten to blot out the empire and the church; but ardent as is our desire to oppose the progress of this new invasion, we are constrained above all else to contend with the pope, our implacable enemy. It is on this account we are marching towards Rome; and we are about to besiege it, since we cannot obtain peace."

In the month of August, Frederick, having taken Tivoli, and the fortified castles of the monastery of Farsa by assault, established his camp at the grotto Ferra, from whence he ravaged the campagna of Rome.

Gregory continued to maintain himself in the holy city, although the inhabitants were divided into two powerful factions, the Guelphs and the Ghibelines, who daily came to blows, and according as one or the other were victorious, hoisted the imperial standard or the pontifical banner. In the midst of these alternatives of fear and hope, Gregory fell sick, and died on the 20th of August, 1241, after having filled Italy with disasters during a reign of fourteen years. This implacable old man was almost an hundred years old. He was buried in the church of St. John of the Lateran.

This embittered strife between the popes and the emperors is a very remarkable fact in the history of the church. Since the pontificate of Gregory the Seventh, the Holy See, which derived all its power from the emperors of the West, declares itself their implacable enemy. The court of Rome no longer defends its rights by invoking charters granted by princes; it is from God alone that it pretends to hold its temporal as well as its spiritual power; and this principle of theocracy once established, the popes deduce from it frightful consequences; they declare themselves the masters and rulers of the entire world; they call themselves infallible; they attribute to themselves the same prerogatives as the divinity; they proudly call themselves the vicars of Christ, the representatives of God on earth!!

Thus they dispose of thrones and empires, overthrow the one, reconstruct the other, and according to the caprices of their imagination or the interests of their policy, they urge nations into interminable wars. Men are for them machines which they use to draw gold from the bowels of the earth, instruments which they employ to raise statues and palaces for them. Finally, these hypocritical pontiffs in the name of a God of humility, elevate the chair of St. Peter above the throne of kings. In the name of a God of charity, despoil the unfortunate people. In the name of a God of mercy, cause the unfortunate victims of their fanaticism to expire in tortures.

CELESTIN THE FOURTH, THE ONE HUNDRED AND EIGHTY-FOURTH POPE.

[A. D. 1241:]

Division in the sacred college—The cardinals nominate two popes—Both compelled to abdicate—Election of Celestin the Fourth—His moderation—His plans of reform—He is poisoned by the priests.

At the time of the death of Gregory, there were but ten cardinals at Rome. These wrote to Frederick to beseech him to set at liberty the prelates whom he retained in his camp, in order that the sacred college might be enabled to assemble and proceed to the election of a new pontiff. The prince acceded to their request, and permitted his prisoners to go to Rome to meet the conclave, on condition that they would choosethe cardinal Otho, one of his creatures. He granted besides to the absent cardinals safe conduct to re-enter the holy city.—But so great a confluence of electors was not counted upon by the prelates who were assembled. As each of them had already made his terms when he sold his vote, they feared they could not control the majority of the assembly, because too numerous; and they hastened to terminate the election before the arrival of their colleagues.

Geoffrey, bishop of Sabine, had five votes, and the other three were given for Romain, bishop of Porto. At the defeat of his protégé, the emperor declared that he would approve of the nomination of Geoffrey, who was generally esteemed for his virtues; but he pronounced with energy against that of Romain, the same prelate who had figured in the massacre of the Albigenses, and who had afterwards excited violent disputes against the university of Paris by means of the assistance of Queen Blanche, his mistress. Moreover, the two elections were null in themselves, neither of the prelates having received two thirds of the votes which the constitution of Alexander the Third required. They were both accordingly obliged to abdicate. On the next day they proceeded to a new election. On this occasion such a quarrel broke out in the conclave, that from words they would have come to blows but for the intervention of the senate and the prefect; finally, in this strife, Geoffrey gained one vote, and was solemnly proclaimed chief of the church.

The new pontiff was originally from Milan. He had first been a canon, and chancellor of the church of that city; then he had taken the monastic habit in the order of the Citeaux. Afterwards, Honorius the Third had ordained him a cardinal priest; and finally, during the pontificate of Gregory, he had been promoted to the bishopric of Sabine. After having undergone the usual proofs, he was enthroned by the name of Celestin the Fourth.

This good pope endeavoured to reform the infamous morals of his clergy. Unfortunately he was not prudent enough to discard from his person the courtiers of the preceding reign; and eighteen days after his election, he died of poison, not having been consecrated.

INNOCENT THE FOURTH, THE ONE HUNDRED AND EIGHTY-FIFTH POPE.

THE poisoning of Celestin the Fourth plunged Rome into consternation and alarm. The people, who had placed all their hopes on the life of this pontiff, loudly demanded the punishment of the guilty, and threatened those whom the public voice designated as the assassins, with a terrible vengeance. A rigid examination, in fact, was commenced, and it led to such strange revelations that the magistrates were compelled to stop their inquiries, the murderers being cardinals and archbishops. These, finding themselves discovered, and fearful of a just punishment, secretly escaped from the city, abandoning to their colleagues the care of choosing a new pope. There then remained in the sacred college but six cardinals, all ambitious of the papacy, and each of them unwilling to make a concession to his competitors; thus, with such pretensions, it became impossible to nominate a pontiff.

Frederick, tired of waiting for the termination of their quarrels, threatened to hang them all if they prolonged the scandal of their rivalry any more. "Is it not shameful," he wrote to them, "that the faithful can justly say, it is not Christ who is among you, but Satan himself?"—St. Louis, on his side, had also addressed several letters to them, exhorting them to put an end promptly to the long vacancy of the Holy See.

The emperor, finally discovering that they regarded neither entreaties nor threats, quitted Apulia, whither he had returned after the death of Gregory, re-entered the land of Labour in the month of March, 1243, and led his army beneath the walls of Rome. The city was so closely blockaded, that provisions could no longer enter it by land or water; the magistrates then sent a deputation to Frederick to represent to him that it was unjust to punish them for a fault of which the cardinals alone were guilty, since the citizens were disposed to drive from the city the authors of all the disorders—which was done on the very same day.

Frederick yielded to these representations, raised the siege and placed the members of the sacred college under the ban of the empire. By his orders, all the domains of the Guelphs were ravaged, not only their lands and castles, but even the monasteries, churches, and convents of the nuns. Those who held out for the cardinals were pitilessly massacred; the city of Albano especially, which had opened its gates to them, was treated with the greatest cruelty. These latter, finally, finding themselves driven from their domains, despoiled of their dignities, and pursued by indefatigable enemies, determined to name a pope. It is said, moreover, that that which alarmed them the most, was the news that the French were preparing to erect an independent patriarchate to govern the church.

The conclave assembled anew in the city of Viterbo on the 24th of June, 1243, and elected as sovereign pontiff, Sinibald of Fiesca, of the family of the counts of Lavagne, and a cardinal priest of the order of St. Lawrence.

rence. He was enthroned by the name of Innocent the Fourth, submitted to the usual tests, and consecrated some days after his promotion.

He had been the intimate friend of the emperor, therefore the ministers of Frederick congratulated him on an election which could not fail to be advantageous to the empire. But the prince, who knew the ambitious character of the new pope, interrupted them by saying: "Cease your congratulations, for this change of fortune is about to take from me the friendship of the cardinal and bring on me the hatred of the Holy See." We shall see, in the end, Innocent the Fourth, pursue his old friend with even more fury than his predecessor Gregory. Notwithstanding his sinister forebodings, the emperor caused masses to be celebrated throughout all his kingdom to render thanks to God for the election of a sovereign pontiff; and some days after, having returned into Sicily, he sent a solemn embassy to compliment Innocent, and offer him the aid of his arms, in order to assure the maintainance of the dignity and liberty of the church.

The holy father listened kindly to the ambassadors, and sent them back with three nuncios, Peter of Colmieu, the metropolitan of Rouen, William, the former bishop of Modena, and William, the abbot of St. Fagon, in Galicia, to treat of the conditions of peace with Frederick. The instructions given to his envoys were, that they should demand that he should immediately set at liberty all the ecclesiastics who had been taken by the galleys of the Genoese, but without giving any satisfaction in exchange; and that after having heard all the proposals of Frederick, they should reply, that all questions in litigation between the church and the empire could only be judged of by a general council of kings, princes, and prelates. This first negotiation was without any result, on account of the obstinacy of the pope, who rejected the just claims of the emperor on the Holy See.

Towards the end of the month of October, Innocent left the city of Anagni, and came to Rome, where every thing was prepared for his reception. He found there the young Raymond, count of Toulouse, who had come to solicit his absolution; the holy father, who was aware of the diplomatic abilities of the count, resolved to employ him for the interests of the Roman church; he granted him absolution from all the anathemas which he had incurred, and induced Frederick to appoint him one of the imperial commissioners who, with Peter of Vignes, and Thadeus of Sweden, were to arrange the basis of a treaty. On his side, the pope appointed the bishop of Ostia and three other cardinals, Stephen, Giles, and Otho, to defend the privileges of the church.

With such commissioners, it was agreed to the holy father to have all the clauses of the treaty approved. Thus there was a speedy arrangement. The following were the conditions of the treaty: — Frederick was to restore the territories which he had taken from the Holy See, and to recognise by a public confession that it was not from contempt that he had refused to submit to the sentences pronounced against him by Gregory the Ninth, but through the inspiration of the devil: he was to proclaim that the pope, even though the greatest of criminals, alone possessed supreme power over all Christians, whatever might be their rank: and, finally, the prince was bound to set at liberty all those who had risen against him during his excommunication, and to found churches, hospitals, and monasteries, to expiate his crime of rebellion against the church. All these articles were sworn to by the commissioners of the king, amidst the applause of the cardinals and pope; but when Frederick had been informed of the treason of his delegates, he sharply refused to execute the treaty.

Innocent, not daring to break with the emperor, whose anger he dreaded, proposed an interview with him at Sutri. The prince refused to go there before having received his letters of absolution, and declared that it was at Rome itself he would cause his rights to be recognised. This threat, and the approach of the imperial troops, alarmed the holy father—secret orders were expedited to Genoa, to make dispositions of the galleys; and when all was ready, by night, without admitting any one into his confidence, to avoid being stopped by the Ghibelines, he laid aside the insignia of his dignity, armed himself lightly, mounted a strong horse, and, accompanied by a single domestic, took the road to Civita Vecchia.—He urged his flight so rapidly, that he had traversed eleven leagues by daybreak; he then caused his domestic to return, to inform Peter of Capua, and seven cardinals of his party of his flight, that they might join him at Civita Vecchia, where twenty-three galleys, each manned by sixty well-armed men, and one hundred and twenty rowers awaited them. These vessels had come under the leading of the admiral of the republic of Genoa, and the relatives of the pope. Innocent embarked on the same night with the cardinals and some bishops, and arrived on the 5th of July, 1244, at Genoa, his country. On his disembarkation, he was harangued by the principal persons of the republic, and borne in triumph by the clergy to the cathedral, amidst the acclamations of the people.

Frederick, informed by his spies that the pontiff meditated a second flight out of Italy, blockaded all the routes by sea and land, to make him a prisoner. Innocent had already asked from the king of France permission to establish himself at Rheims, the see of which was vacant, and the latter had replied, that the barons of the kingdom, jealous of the liberties of the Gallic church, were unwilling to permit the pope to fix his residence in France. Like refusals had been received to the overtures which had been made in Spain, England, and several other kingdoms; "for," says Mathew Paris, "they knew too well the avidity and despotism of the Roman court to wish for the presence of the holy father; the people were beginning to comprehend that religion was only a pretext made use of by the legates to pillage them; and they had learned from recent examples that popes and their cardinals, like swarms of grasshoppers, left behind them but ruin and desolation."

Disgracefully repulsed on all sides, and not daring to remain in Italy, Innocent determined to go to Lyons, a neutral city belonging to an archbishop. He had scarcely arrived when he expedited circular letters for the convocation of a general council. — His aim, he said, was to raise up the church which had bowed its forehead before an horrible tempest, to conquer the Holy Land, re-establish the empire of Romania, repulse the Tartars and other infidels, and, finally, constrain the emperor to humble himself before St. Peter.

According to the usage of his predecessors, the pope, regardless of the rights of the venerable archbishop who had received him, seized on his palace, his goods, and all his authority; he disposed of cures, prebends, and benefices, and sold them to strangers, or gave them to persons of his train. At length the Lyonese canons, indignant at the conduct of Innocent, revolted against him, and protested with oaths, that if the Italian priests showed themselves in their churches, they would cast them into the Rhone; the people took part with them, and a chamberlain of the pope having dared to strike with his wand a citizen who asked an audience of the pope, the latter drew his sword and cut off his hand.

Curiosity or fanaticism, however, drawing to Lyons bishops and French lords, the council took place, and behold, according to Mathew Paris, what were the events which passed in the assembly. "The emperor Frederick," says the historian, "sent ambassadors to defend his rights. They held, previously, a council to hear Thadeus of Sweden, who, in the name of the prince, his master, offered to re-establish concord between the empire and the church; to bring back to the obedience of the Holy See the states of Romania; to oppose the Tartars, Chorasmiens, Saracens, and other enemies of the court of Rome; to go in person to deliver the Holy Land, and, finally, to restore to St. Peter that which he had taken from him, and do penance for the sins which he had committed." Innocent, who assisted at the conference, exclaimed, "Oh, these great promises! We see, my lord Thadeus, that your master fears the blow which threatens him. If I accepted his offers, and he should then break his oaths, what would be the security? Who would force him to keep his engagements?" Thadeus replied, "The kings of France and England, most holy father." Innocent immediately rejoined, "We refuse them; for if the emperor failed in his word, we should be compelled to turn to these princes and chastise them like him, which would excite against the church the three most redoubtable sovereigns of the West. No: we will not thus depart from the line of our policy, which is to reduce kings and people by making them combat each other." "Who are the people," adds the chronicler, "who can read these terrible pages of the history of the popes, without raging with indignation? How long will kings, princes, and people consent to obey as slaves the court of Rome, and to bow before an insolent priest, who arrogates to himself the right to chastise them?"

At the close of the first session of the synod, Innocent pronounced the sentence of excommunication and deposition against Frederick, declaring the empire vacant, and ordering the electors to choose a new emperor. Philip Fontaine, bishop of Ferrara, was sent immediately into Germany with orders to cause Henry, landgrave of Thuringia and Hesse, to be chosen king of the Romans and the metropolitan of Mayence, who had taken part in all these intrigues, was charged to preach a crusade against Frederick. Not content with creating confusion in the empire by means of his intrigues, the pope took assassins into his pay, and organised a vast conspiracy, into which he induced the relatives, friends, and even familiars of the emperor to take part. But the plot was discovered, and all the conspirators payed for the treason of the pope with their heads.

"Then," says Jurien, "the empire was covered by armed men, who ravaged by turns the most beautiful provinces. In Germany, Conrad combated for his father; in Italy Frederick disputed with his enemies for his crown and life. We see nothing but leagues, revolts, factions, sieges and battles; everywhere pillage, incendiarism and massacres reigned. The landgrave Henry, he whom the pope had proclaimed king, having been killed in a skirmish, Innocent proclaimed in his place, William, Count of Holland, who, in his turn, was forced to fly before the arms of young Conrad. During an entire year the war continued with the same fury, and Christian blood was shed by torrents in the name of an execrable pope."

Innocent, who wished to raise the whole world against Frederick, so implacable was his hatred, was infamous enough, vicar of Christ, to write to the sultan Melec Saleh, to induce him to make a descent on Italy, thus violating the faith sworn to the emperor. The Mussulman replied to him, "We have received your letters and given audience to your envoy. He has spoken to us of Jesus Christ, whom we know better than you appear to, and whom we honour more than you do. We refuse your request.—Safety."

During this same year, the pope, furious at seeing all his efforts fail, wished to try his power over princes less redoubtable than the emperor; he excommunicated James, king of Arragon, to punish him for having cut out the tongue of the bishop of Gironne, who had sold his enemies secrets of state. Upon the deposition of the prelates of Portugal, he also excommunicated King Sancho the Second. The dict was pronounced against his states, the sovereign was deposed and the regency given to count Alphonso the father of the prince. These two communications gave rise to civil wars in Spain, and during several years the Arragonese and Portugese covered their countries with massacres and incendiarisms.

The ecclesiastical thunders were not so successful in England, and the legates of the Holy See, though armed with anathemas, were driven disgracefully from Great Britain, and prohibited from re-entering the kingdom, and levying new tenths upon the people. Innocent the Fourth, informed that a monarch dared to protect his subjects against the rapacity of his legates, immediately lanced a bull of excommunication against him, but he found no one who consented to publish it, and the holy wrath served but to unmask his hypocrisy.

In the midst, however, of all his crimes, we should give him credit for the protection which he extended to the Jews of Germany, who were crushed beneath the tyranny of bishops and archbishops. Thanks to him, the unfortunate Israelites could breathe in peace, without fear of being pillaged, robbed, and massacred by Catholics. It is true, that they paid dearly for the friendship of the pope, and that several among them, from being rich were reduced to misery.

During the sojourn of Innocent at Lyons, chance brought to that city a knight of the emperor, who had retired from his service in consequence of some discontent. As he lodged in the same hotel as Walter d'Ocre, doctor and counsellor of the prince, the two Germans soon made acquaintance, and became friends. The pope, informed by his spies that two partizans of the emperor inhabited the same hotel, soon originated a great piece of scandal, and sent emissaries through the city to report that Frederick desired to assassinate him. As absurd as was this accusation, the two Germans, fearing to be submitted to the torture, hastened to quit Lyons to regain Germany. Innocent did not discontinue the investigations; and as the hotel keeper, named Renaud, fell seriously ill, he gave him, as a confessor, in his last moments, an Italian priest, who, on the succeeding day, deposed before an assembly of the chapter of the cathedral, that the dying man had revealed to him the infamous plot of the agents of Frederick. This odious falsehood was published through all Europe; and, to give it more credence, the pope feigned that he dared not leave his palace, keeping about his person a guard of fifty armed men, who accompanied him even to the altar whenever he celebrated divine service. He did not, however, obtain from this new trick any of the advantages that he hoped for. He then fell back upon preaching crusades, which were inexhaustible sources of profit for the popes; his legates traversed all Christian countries, and came as far as Norway, from whence they brought to fifteen thousand sterling marks, the value of the presents, and a donation as a penance of five marks of silver for each diocese of that country; other kingdoms produced the holy father in the same proportions as Norway.

France, according to custom, distinguished herself by her religious enthusiasm; although exacted three times during the pontificate of Gregory the Ninth, it was she who furnished the most money to the pope: she alone then consented to make a new expedition into Palestine for the remission of the sins of St. Louis. That stupid and devotee king assembled a numerous army of crusaders, and departed on the 12th of June, 1248, for the Holy Land. At first he gained some advantages over the infidel, and seized upon Damietta, but the Saracens soon took their revenge; the French army was cut to pieces, and the king himself fell into their power. This new disaster lost the kingdom all its valiant youth, and the remainder of its gold, which it had to give for the ransom of its imbecile monarch.

Thus terminated the first crusade of St. Louis. The priests did not fail to attribute the reverses of the crusaders to their sins and their abominations, in order to explain the false prophecies which had announced great victories. These accusations were well founded: for, according to contemporary historians, the French lords abandoned themselves to so many excesses, that they appeared to be rather the defenders of Satan than the servants of Christ. Behold how the Sieur de Joinville, one of the actors in this crusade, expresses himself:—"The barons, knights, and other nobles, who were in the camp of St. Louis, and who should have wisely kept the money which they had for their future wants, spent it foolishly in banquets and festivities. Thus, when their ruin was commenced, they were obliged, in order to live, to rob the soldiers. Misery soon led to demoralization—no woman nor girl could enter the camp without being violated on the plain, and led into the lupanars which were kept around the royal pavilion; finally, those who would wish to relate all the abominations with young pages nay, even of the sins against nature, would risk their salvation from the terms they would be compelled to use."

Brocardus Argentoratensis, one of the monks who had followed the army, gives a singular explanation of these disorders. "In the Holy Land," says this chronicler, "are men of all nations, and each lives according to the customs of his country, with a license which is unequalled; and to tell the truth, the Christians are the most corrupt of all—for the following reason: in France, Spain, Germany, and Italy, when a wretch has committed all kinds of crimes, and wishes to escape from the justice of the prince, he goes to Palestine, where, thanks to the indulgences, all his sins are remitted him. When he arrives there, the theatre of his crimes is changed, but not his heart; he violates, pillages, murders, as before his departure for the promised land. Cursed be through eternity the popes who invented the crusades."

Whilst St. Louis, a victim to the councils of the pontiff, was a captive among the Saracens, Innocent was pursuing Frederick with his hatred, and was subsidising assassins. He had gained over Peter de Vignes, ordinary physician to the prince, who was at the same time his counsellor and confidant. The emperor having fallen sick, in consequence of the fatigues and chagrin which he had undergone in the late wars, Peter de Vignes was assisted by a physician sent from Lyons, and presented a poisoned beverage to the monarch. Frederick had fortunately been apprised of this treason; when the assassins had placed the cup in his hands, he feigned to feel an insurmountable disgust for the drink which it contained, and gave it to the Italian physician, beseeching him to taste it himself. The latter, finding himself taken in his own snare, dared not refuse, and carried the cup to his lips; at the same time he made a false step, and threw it down on the ground. The guards immediately entered. Henry caused them to take up the liquor in a sponge, and ordered the condemned to drink it in his presence. Three of these unfortunate ones died in horrid convulsions. The emperor caused the Lyonesse physician to be strangled immediately, and condemned Peter de Vignes to have his eyes torn out, and be given up to the Pisans, his personal enemies, to be tortured. At the moment at which the punishment was commencing, the patient beat out his brains against a column to which he had been fastened.

Frederick had scarcely escaped from this peril when he received the news that Henry, king of Sardinia, one of his natural sons, had been taken prisoner by the Bolognese, and that another of his children was dead in Apulia. So many disasters overwhelmed the unfortunate prince, and as he found himself attacked by a disease called the sacred fire, he decided to offer peace to the Holy See on advantageous conditions. Innocent rejected all his proposals; he did not even wish to receive his envoys, and persisted in declaring him deprived of the empire. Frederick languished still for a year, consumed by the fever, and died on the 4th of December, 1250, leaving his kingdom to his son Conrad.

The pope, who was still in Lyons, immediately wrote to Germany and Sicily to kindle civil war in those kingdoms, and to cause them to recognise as emperor, William, count of Holland, to whom he had already given the title of king of the Romans. This prince, notwithstanding the protection of the holy father, was constrained to retire before the victorious arms of the young Conrad, and to renounce his vain title. On his desisting, the pope then offered the imperial crown to the count of Gueldres, the duke of Brabant, and the earl of Cornwall. These three princes refused it. Finally, he offered it to the king of Norway, who declared that he did not wish a dignity so easily obtained that even the popes could dispose of it.

Notwithstanding these different checks, the faction of the Guelphs obtained the supremacy in Italy, and Innocent made his dispositions to return to Rome. Before, however, quitting France, he reiterated the excommunication against the memory of Frederick, and anathematised the young Conrad, to punish him for having seized on the insignia of the empire without his authority. He then went to Genoa, from thence to Milan, and traversing Lombardy rapidly, he established his court at Perouse to gain time to assemble the forces of his party.

Conrad, on his side, had also profited by the time; with the assistance of the Venetians, who had furnished him with a fleet, he had embarked at Pescara and gained a brilliant victory over the counts of Aquina and Sora, two Guelphs, who wished to oppose his entrance into Sicily. This defeat, far from discouraging the pontiff, only rendered his hatred the more violent; and not being able to levy nor subsidise troops, he sent his missionaries into Brabant, Flanders, and France, to preach a crusade against the emperor Conrad, promising to those who would undertake it, indulgences more extensive than those granted to the crusaders of the Holy Land; since these latter only gained pardon for their sins, whilst the others would obtain for themselves, their children, and their families, the right of committing all crimes with impunity.

But the French, at length worn out by these incessant demands for men and money made, —so often against the infidels, so often against the emperor Frederick, so often against his son Conrad, drove the missionaries out of all the cities of the kingdom, and the regent was compelled to assemble the states to take the advice of her subjects. The deputies complained loudly of the pope, and accused him of being the cause of all the disasters which overwhelmed Europe; they blamed severely the policy of the Holy See, which not only urged on the English, Germans, and French into wars of extermination in Syria, but which even essayed to hurl one part of the West on Italy to aggrandise his power. Finally, they constrained Queen Blanche to make a decree which authorised the confiscation of the property of the fanatics who were willing to embark in a crusade against the emperor Conrad; the lords did the same towards the vassals who held under them, and this step caused the crusade of Italy to fall through.

Repulsed in France, the pope fell back on England, and wrote to the bishop of Lincoln, a venerable prelate, esteemed by all on account of his wisdom and the purity of his morals, to ask for succours from him. The latter refused to obey the injunctions of the court of Rome, and sent a circular to all the ecclesiastics of England to urge them to resistance. "The pontiff," he wrote to them, "is not ashamed to annul the wise constitutions of his predecessors; he desires to govern us as a despot, and to dispose at his will of our fortunes and our lives; before him, man's crimes have afflicted the church: In his crimes he surpasses them all in wickedness. He has covered Christian kingdoms with usurious monks, a thousand times harder than the Jew; he has ordained minor brothers and preaching friars called in at the last moments of the faithful to frighten them, in order to extort from them testaments in favour of the Holy See; under pretext of crusades he encourages the odious traffic in indulgences so well, that now they sell absolution to the laity, as in former times they sold animals in the temple; and his agents measure out salvation by the amount of money given them.

"He sells churches, prebends, benefices to strangers, ignorant and unlettered priests, and these intruders, on arriving in their new cures can neither preach, nor receive confessions, nor even succour the poor, because they do not understand the language of the inhabitants. He has introduced the custom of buying bishoprics, without having received orders and only to get the revenues. Finally, he has filled the world with so many scandals and abominations, that we cannot enumerate all his robberies, adulteries, assassinations—and as we cannot deliver Christendom from this prop of Satan, at least let us protect Great Britain against the encroachments of this enemy of humanity."

Notwithstanding the example set by England and France, the Italians, excited by the preaching of the monks, took up arms in favour of the Holy See; the Ghibelines once victorious, gradually lost all their conquests, and that which heightened their disasters was the death of Conrad, who was poisoned by his natural brother Mainfroy, at the instigation of the pope. Before yielding his last breath, the emperor perceived that the party of the court of Rome would be for a long time triumphant, and as he could not but fear for the life of his son, the young Conradin, who was only three years old, he wished to make a protector of his enemy, by giving to the pope the enjoyment of the revenues of the kingdom of Sicily.

Innocent accepted the tutelage which Conrad had bequeathed to him, and he declared that he would preserve for the young prince the kingdom of Jerusalem, the duchy of Suabia, and all his rights over the kingdom of Sicily, or his other states. He then received an oath of fidelity from the subjects of Conradin, permitting them always to add, "saving the rights of the young prince." As to the assassin Mainfroy, who had so well served him, he caused it to be signified to him as well as to the marquis of Honebruc, and the other lords of their party, that they must leave the Roman church sovereign mistress of the kingdom of Sicily and its dependencies, granting them time to make their submission until the nativity of the Virgin; which time passed, he threatened them with excommunication, and the privation of their dignities and fortunes, which was done as he had threatened them. After this, he sent his nephew, William of Fiesca, into Sicily in the capacity of legate, and supported him with a numerous army, to govern the kingdom. He permitted him to seize on the revenues of the vacant sees, or prebends, and gave him full power to impose collections, to coin new money, and to confiscate the property of those who had supported the party of Frederick, in the last wars, to sell the domains of the crown, and, finally, to lay hands on all the deposits of money and arms he might find in the kingdom.

Mainfroy, deceived in his ambition, at first thought of avenging himself on Innocent, and kept a part of Apulia and Calabria in revolt; but having then considered every thing he could draw from his position, resolved to make his submission to the Holy See. He accordingly proposed to the pope to place him in possession of Apulia, Calabria, and a great part of Sicily, if, in return, he would appoint him tutor to Conradin, and give him the principality of Tarentum, the countships of Gravine and Tricarique, and declare him his vicar over the unsubjugated parts of the kingdom of Sicily. Innocent, who saw himself freed at a blow from his most formidable enemy, consented to all, and delivered up the son to the assassin of the father. He then resolved to visit his new states, and came to Ceperano, where Mainfroy awaited him to sign the conditions of the treaty. From Ceperano, the pontiff went to Capua and Naples; but God had marked the term of his triumphal march; he was attacked in that city by a grievous malady, which carried him off on the 7th of December, 1254.

HISTORY OF THE POPES.

ALEXANDER THE FOURTH, THE ONE HUNDRED AND EIGHTY-SIXTH POPE.

[A. D. 1254.]

Election of Alexander the Fourth—His history before his pontificate—He protects the mendicant monks—The pope offers the crown of Sicily to the king of England—revolt against Alexander—Sect of the flagellants—The pope undertakes to form a league of Christian princes to resist the Tartars—His death.

DURING the sickness of the pope, Mainfroy finding the occasion favourable, anew declared himself hostile to the court of Rome, and had seized upon Nocera and Fogio, two important places. This sudden blow spread consternation through all minds, and the cardinals who were at Naples wished to retreat immediately towards Campania, in order to proceed to the election of a successor of Innocent. The marquis of Berthold, however, who commanded at Naples, reassured them, and determined them to form a conclave. This time, under the impression of fear, intrigues appeared and disappeared with great rapidity; for on the same day, they proclaimed Rainald Conti sovereign pontiff, by the name of Alexander the Fourth.

This cardinal was the son of Philip de Conti, the brother of Pope Gregory the Ninth, and was descended from the illustrious family of the counts of Segni. He was born in the castle of Jeme, a dependency of the abbey of Sublac, in the diocese of Anagni, where he had lived to the age of forty years as a simple member of the chapter of the canons of the cathedral, when his uncle, the pope, took a fancy to call him to Rome. He went on the call of Gregory the Ninth, and took rank among the cardinals, with the title of bishop of Ostia. The new prelate affected a great application to prayer, practised severe abstinences, and made a great show of humility, which did not, however, prevent him from having flatterers and mistresses.

Become pope, Alexander played well his part, and showed himself worthy to continue the policy of Gregory and Innocent. He was at first occupied in resisting the faction of the Ghibelins, who, under the leading of a valiant knight, named Eoclin, had seized the March of Trevisano, and threatened to invade all Sicily, in defiance of the anathemas of the Holy See. Alexander declared the chief of the rebels the enemy of God, degraded from his dignities, and deprived of his property, which he gave to Count Alberic, the brother of that lord, for the purpose of arming brother against brother. He then excommunicated the fratricide Mainfroy, and opposed to him the cardinal Octavian Ubaldin, to whom he gave the legation of the kingdom of Sicily, in place of William, who had not been able to maintain himself in Apulia since the death of Pope Innocent. Without stopping to justify his conduct, Mainfroy continued his career of conquest, and advanced to meet Octavian, who had a numerous army, composed of troops badly provisioned and equipped. The legate, instead of fighting, cowardly demanded peace. It was agreed between them, that Mainfroy should abandon the territory of Labour to the pope, and should govern all the rest of the kingdom of Sicily, in the name of his nephew Conradin.

Alexander refused to ratify this treaty, pretending that his legate had outstripped his powers, and that he had made it from necessity in order to save his army; consequently such an engagement could not be obligatory, and Mainfroy, indignant, immediately retook the field at the head of his victorious troops, threatened to punish the pontiff severely for his breach of faith; the latter, who had covered that his arms were powerless against such an enemy, sought allies abroad, and offered the crown of Sicily to the young Edmund, second son of the king of England; Jacques Bourcambio, bishop of Bologna, was entrusted with this important mission. On his arrival in Great Britain, the legate convened an assembly of the grandees of the kingdom, and solemnly invested prince Edmund with the royalty of Sicily, by a ring which he placed on his finger in the name of the holy father; he also declared the king of England relieved from his vows of pilgrimage to the Holy Land, on condition that he would authorise a new crusade against Mainfroy.

As this bull excited violent murmurs among the people, Bourcambio, to put an end to them, assembled the prelates of the kingdom, and endeavoured to induce them to recognise that a pope had the right to absolve from all crimes those who shed their blood in his service, or who succoured him with their money. The English bishops, far from approving such a doctrine, spontaneously rose to cry out anathema upon the pope; they addressed sage remonstrances to the king, beseeching him not to accomplish an enterprise so disastrous as that proposed by Alexander, observing to him that the affairs of Sicily were in a deplorable condition, and that the unworthy pontiff offered him a crown it would be impossible to conquer; and that, besides, supposing that he gained advantages over his enemies, the popes would doubtless pursue him in his turn, as they had pursued the Greek emperors, the French princes and the German sovereigns. Finally, one of them, the archbishop Seval, spoke with so much eloquence, that the prince retracted the word which he had already given to the Roman legate; Alexander furious, against the metropolitan who was the cause of this check, resolved to be revenged on him; he sent him orders to confer the best benefits of his diocese on Italians who did not live in the country, and on his refusal to obey this unjust decree, he excommunicated him, and solemnly deposed him to the sound of the bells with an infamous censure. Seval underwent this persecution with courageous firmness, and contented himself with leaving us in his works several remarkable letters against the tyranny of the Roman court.

If the pontiff was an enemy of virtuous priests, by way of contrast he declared himself to be the protector of debauchee monks, that hideous leprosy which for so many centuries still gnaws the people. He published a bull in their favour, which restored to them the privileges of which they had been deprived by his predecessor. At the beginning of this act was found this remarkable preamble: "It is not extraordinary that a pope erases the decrees of those who have preceded him in the apostolic chair, especially when their ordinances are infected with errors, have been made under the influence of selfish prepossessions or with precipitation." Some months afterwards he published a second bull, to put an end to the quarrels which had broken out between the preaching brothers and the doctors of Paris, and in which, under a pretext for the good of religion, he modified, of his own authority, the regulations of the university, prescribing to the chancellor of Paris in what manner he should grant licenses, and pointing out to him that he wished him to confer them on an unlimited number of doctors. He further intimated to him an order to reinstate the preaching brothers in the ranks of the professors of the university, and renewed the statutes in relation to the intermission of the courses in cases of insults offered to the monks by the students.

Notwithstanding the injunction of the holy father, the university refused to admit into its bosom the preaching brothers whom it had already expelled. Alexander, to intimidate the university corps, fulminated his anathemas. Nothing shook the resolution of the doctors: they replied to the popes that they had excluded the mendicant monks for ever from their ranks, because they maintained horrible maxims, and they sent to him, in support of their assertions, a monstrous work entitled "The Eternal Gospel." The pope, on examining it, found the doctrines it contained so frightful, that he caused it to be secretly burned to avoid casting reprobation on its authors. It was, on the contrary, on William of Saint Amour, the impugner of the mendicant brothers, that all the pontifical wrath fell; he solemnly excommunicated him and caused all his works to be burned.

Notwithstanding these acts of authority, Alexander was far from ruling in temporal affairs; not only had he been unable to subjugate the Sicilians, but even in Rome the people evinced impatience at the yoke of the Holy See. A violent sedition broke out on the occasion of the imprisonment of Brancalon, the first senator whom the pope disgraced in order to put one of his favourites in his place; the citizens, incited by an English baker, whom the new dignitary wished to whip with rods, hurled themselves on the guards, took their arms from them, hastened to the prison in which the senator was confined, broke open the doors, and led him in triumph to the capitol. Brancalon, become all-powerful in consequence of this popular movement, boldly resumed his functions as a magistrate, drove his enemies from Rome, and caused two of the relatives of cardinal Anibaldi, the author of his disgrace, to be strangled. The pope endeavoured to intimidate him by excommunications; but the senator informed him it was an useless effort, since he had purchased from his predecessor the privilege of being anathematised; but that if, however, he continued his juggleries, he would hang him and all his cardinals. This menace alarmed the holy father very much, and as he knew Brancalon to be a man of action, he escaped from Rome to take refuge with his partizans at Viterba.

Mainfroy, on his part, master of Sicily, the principality of Tarentum, of Apulia, and of the territory of Labour, was solemnly crowned at Palermo, while the valiant Ecclin was pushing his conquests over the domains of the church. Finally, every thing presaged for Italy a termination of its miseries through the abolition of the pontifical power, when the death of William, that phantom of an emperor who had succeeded the unfortunate Conrad in Germany, took place.

This event, by awakening ambition, turned aside the minds of men from their first aim, which was the ruin of the popes, and saved Alexander. Two parties disputed for the empire of Germany, the one chose Richard earl of Cornwall, the brother of the king of England, the other, Alphonso of Castile. This last, who had the greatest chance of success, was preparing to come to take possession of the crown which was offered him, when an attempt of the Saracens of Spain against Cordova determined him to suspend his departure. He contented himself with sending envoys into Italy, with rich presents, to bring the pope into his interests. Alexander accepted these marks of the king's munificence and replied hypocritically to the deputies: "You know, my brethren, that usage has for a long time established that the possession of the crown of Germany should be allied to that of the imperial crown; let your king then be consecrated at Aix-la-Chapelle, and we promise him our protection to cause him to be recognised as emperor. Let him, however, be careful how he quits Cordova to lose the crown of Castile and come into Germany, when it will be no longer possible for us to make his cause triumph." This reply is sufficient to show the bad faith of Alexander, since he had already conferred on Richard the title of king of the Romans, as is authentically proved by his own letters and those of several Italian lords, who had taken the oath of fidelity to that prince.

In the midst of these political disasters, Italy suddenly saw a sect of fanatics arise, who have not been equalled up to our own times. Entire populations seemed to be seized with a religious vertigo, and abandoned themselves to practices of piety of inconceivable extravagance. Perouse was the first city in which this fever of fanaticism manifested itself, which soon spread to Rome, and over the rest of Italy, Germany, Spain, and England. Old men, young men, women, and even children, under the excitement of a religious fury, traversed cities and the country naked, following each other two by two, and holding in their hands whips of loaded thongs, with which they rudely struck themselves over the shoulders and reins. These processions took place alike by day and by night, and even in the most rigorous winter; and, according to the reports of the historians of the times, there were sometimes counted ten thousand flagellants, entirely naked, performing their devotions and having at their head priests, cardinals, and bishops, bearing the cross and banners. In villages, in towns, and in the cities, the sect increased with an extraordinary rapidity. Women, even great ladies and young girls, showed themselves full of fervour for these new religious practices, and cruelly lacerated their bodies. The simple had commenced it—the wisest were drawn in by the example.

This singular superstition soon degenerated into an heresy. The flagellants confessed themselves to each other, and granted absolution, although of the laity. They maintained that their macerations were so meritorious before God, that they moderated the sufferings of those who burned in hell, and augmented the happiness of those who contemplated the face of their creator in the kingdom of heaven. According to them, no one could enter into the heavenly Jerusalem unless he had performed for a month their penance and their fasts. But the most deplorable circumstances in these great assemblies, in which young men and women could see each other naked, were the scenes of debauchery, of sodomy, and incest between brothers and sisters, mothers and sons, so that the sect of the flagellants fell into public contempt, and was soon annihilated.

Sovereign princes also, who feared lest these great assemblages of men should weaken their authority, by exhibiting their strength, hastened to make severe ordinances against the flagellants. Mainfroy, and the marquis of Pallavacin, prohibited them under the penalty of death from appearing in the March of Ancona, or in Tuscany, as well as in the cities of Milan, Cremona, and Brescia. Religion and morality had no part in these coercive measures; the people of Italy were already accustomed to these processions, through means of some of the extravagant ceremonies which then existed in the church; thus the priests condemned those who had insulted them by words, to appear in a solemn procession entirely naked, and they whipped them during the entire ceremony. Women underwent the same punishment as men, and it was only by means of money that they were permitted to perform their penance within the church.

Alexander was occupied for a time with the means of extinguishing the ardour of these strange Christians, and then gave all his attention to the Tartars, who, already masters of Hungary, Poland, and Styria, threatened all Europe. Against a danger so imminent, he desired to form a confederation among all the people of the west to guarantee the safety of the Christian world against this inundation of barbarians. He consequently designated the force which each kingdom should furnish, as well as the levies of money which were to be imposed on the nobles, clergy, and citizens; the whole to be definitely arranged in a general council, which he had convoked. But death did not permit him to achieve that which he had commenced; on the 25th of May, 1261, he gave up his last breath in the city of Viterba, which he had inhabited for four years.

"Thus," exclaims the historian of Boulay, "the muses of Paris were tranquillized, being delivered from that pope who had cruelly persecuted them during the entire continuance of his reign."

Some ecclesiastics have essayed to praise Alexander the Fourth; but their flatteries have only served to make his bad actions more conspicuous and to render him more odious.

URBAN THE FOURTH, THE ONE HUNDRED AND EIGHTY-SEVENTH POPE.

[A. D. 1261.]

Election of Urban the Fourth—His history before his pontificate—He continues the policy of his predecessors—Offers the crown of Italy to Charles of Anjou—Termination of the Latin empire at Constantinople—Urban wishes to arm the French against the Greeks—Secret treaty between the pope and the Greek emperor—Urban is driven from Viterba and takes refuge in the city of Orvietto—Crusade against Mainfroy—The pope is driven from Orvietto, and takes refuge at Perouse, where he dies.

ALEXANDER had with him at Viterba but eight cardinals, all sick or infirm, when he died; thus the embarrassment of the sacred college was very great, when it was obliged to proceed to the election of a new pontiff. As each of the eight cardinals felt himself incapable of sustaining the burthen of the tiara, in the hard circumstances under which the church was placed, they agreed to take, for this time only, a pope from without the college, and to choose as sovereign pontiff James Pantaleon, the patriarch of Jerusalem, who had come to Viterba to lay a complaint before the Holy See, against the knights hospitallers. The affair was thus brought about, and James Pantaleon was consecrated on the 4th of November, by the name of Urban the Fourth.

This pontiff, originally from Troyes, in Champagne, was the son of an itinerant shoemaker, who, to free himself from him, had sent him to Paris to beg. His youth and misery interested a doctor, who received him into his house, caused him to study at the university, and afterwards obtained for him the title of master of arts and doctor of the canon law. His taste led him particularly to the study of theology, in which he made great progress, and his talents procured for him first the archdeaconate of Liege, and then the dignity of chaplain to Innocent the Fourth.

In 1248 he obtained the legation of Poland; on his return, in 1252, he was consecrated bishop of Verdun, with the title of legate of Pomerania; the pontiff Alexander had then elevated him to the patriarchal see of Jerusalem, by declaring him his vicar in the Holy Land. They cite a remarkable reply which he made to a French lord, who reproached him for the humbleness of his birth: "Do you think a man is born noble?" said Pantaleon to him;—"no, my lord count, he becomes so by his virtues, and the people will one day do justice to these proud titles, which conceal shame and infamy." Unfortunately, he forgot these sentiments when he became pope, and so pernicious is the influence of sovereign power, that this man showed himself, in the exercise of his functions, as proud and implacable as his predecessors.

Mainfroy, the new king of Sicily, the fratricide and usurper, comprehending the necessity of strengthening his throne by powerful alliances, offered his daughter Constance in marriage to Peter, the eldest son of James, king of Arragon, with the single condition that she should obtain for him an advantageous peace with the Roman church. Urban formally refused his agreement to this matrimonial scheme; not from the very natural sentiment of repulsion for a murderer, but from a motive of base jealousy. He brought St. Louis into his way of thinking, and induced him to declare to James of Arragon, that he would renounce his alliance with him, if he consented to the marriage of his son with the princess Constance. In defiance of the opposition of the two courts of France and Viterba, Philip of France espoused Isabella of Arragon, and Peter married the young daughter of Mainfroy.

This blow exasperated the holy father. In his rage he sent the crown of Sicily to St. Louis for one of his children, summoning him to assemble immediately an army to avenge the insult offered them, and to come and take possession of that kingdom. Wiser in this matter than he had been in the crusade, the French monarch refused to obey the pope. He replied to him, that he could not accept a throne which belonged to the young Conradin, the legitimate heir, and that the invasion of Sicily was an act of disloyalty punishable in the eyes of God. In vain did the pope endeavour to reassure the timorous conscience of St. Louis, by representing to him, that he and his cardinals had examined the matter with the greatest care, and that all had declared the Holy See the supreme dispenser of the crown of Sicily. All his reasonings failed before the will of the prince. His legates then turned to the count of Anjou, brother to the king, and to Robert, count of Artois, to whom Pope Innocent had already made the same proposals, and who had been dead for some years.

Whilst the west was occupied with these court intrigues, Greece was the theatre of grave events. Alexis Strategopulus, the general of Michael Paleologus, of the house of Comneni, seized Constantinople, and destroyed, after fifty-six years of existence, the Latin empire, which the crusaders had founded under Baldwin the First, count of Flanders. On the news of the capture of Constantinople, St. Louis wrote immediately to Urban to ask him if this revolution did not threaten the orthodoxy of the church, and if it was right to arm against the Greeks to recapture the empire.

The pope replied to him:—"You are, my dear son, the only Christian prince who sincerely compassionates the misfortunes of the church, and who show yourself always ready to aid it. Our thanks are given to you. In the extreme affliction which the loss of Constantinople has caused us, we are happy to learn that in you are placed our hope and our consolation. Already has the emperor, Baldwin the Fourth, embarked for Italy, as well as the ambassadors of Duke Rainier Zeno, the delegates of Venice, and the other Latin republics, all driven in disgrace from the territory of the Greek empire. Hasten, then, to succour these proscribed, not only for the greater glory of your crown, but for the interests of the Holy Land.

"An expedition against Constantinople cannot fail of success, being strengthened by the Latin lords, who are still masters of Achaia, the Morea, and the neighbouring islands, who will join their troops to your army. The Venetians offer for their share the services of their galleys for the passage of the crusaders. On account of all these motives we hasten to reply to you, and we send you our chaplain, Andrew of Spoleto, archdeacon of Naples, on whom you can bestow your entire confidence. We beseech you, my dear son, to be active in sending the men and money whom you destine for this holy enterprise; and we solicit from the prelates of your kingdom a private subsidy for the wants of our see."

Michael Paleologus, apprised of the preparations making against him in the west at the instigation of the pope, immediately determined to take measures to gain time, and to permit him to consolidate his power at Constantinople. As the pretext of schism was the sole apparent cause of the enmity of the court of Rome, he made overtures to the pontiff, proposed to him the reunion of the two churches, and at the same time sent him magnificent presents. Urban was well informed as to the secret intentions of Michael, who, whilst making proposals of peace, was carrying on war with William, prince of Achaia, and with the other lords established in the country: but the sums which were offered him were so large, that his avarice triumphed over reasons of policy; he sacrificed for gold the interests of the Latin princes, accepted the arrangements proposed to him by the emperor, and sent four minor-brothers to Constantinople to sign the treaty in his name.

The holy father could the more applaud himself for his policy, since the kingdoms of the west, England, France, and Spain, had sharply refused to give any subsidy for the war. It was impossible for Germany to furnish the least aid to the Holy See, being stripped of men and money by the civil war, which the election of Alphonso of Castile and Richard, earl of Cornwall, had lighted in that country.

At last the metropolitan of Mayence, and some other German prelates, indignant at the conduct of the pope, determined to constrain him to obedience, and to put an end to the disasters of their country. For this purpose they convened a general diet of the electors. Urban, informed that they wished to bestow the crown on the legitimate heir, by declaring Conradin emperor of the west, immediately sent legates to them, prohibiting them, under penalty of anathema, from choosing that prince. Besides, in order to give new aliment to the fury of the parties, and to augment the disorders, he approved of the election of Alphonso of Castile and Richard of Cornwall, and declared them both to be kings of the Romans, reserving the right of pronouncing between them in regard to the imperial crown until the following year.

Whilst Germany, torn by factions, abandoned to pillage and incendiarism, was expiating in the horrors of civil war its fanaticism for popes and its stupid fidelity to emperors, Mainfroy was giving lively disquiet to Urban. He had already drawn into his party the Genoese, the Pisans, and the Tuscans; already was he approaching the March of Ancona, and with the assistance of the Ghibelines, who were all-powerful in the holy city, had seized upon much territory belonging to the Holy See, when the pope made a new appeal to fanaticism, and preached a crusade against his enemy. A crowd of ruined lords and Italian and French vagabonds, immediately hastened to Viterba, and formed an army which the holy father opposed to the troops of Mainfroy. Whilst he was directing the movements of his bands the Romans made a diversion in favour of the king of Sicily, drove Urban from Viterba, and compelled him to retire to Orvietto. In his flight his treasures were taken by his enemy, and as he had no more money left to pay his crusaders, his army disbanded.

The pope, forced to relinquish the hope of subjugating Mainfroy by the temporal sword, fell back once more on spiritual thunders; the king of Sicily was summoned to appear before the sacred college, to defend himself against a great number of accusations, under penalty of a second excommunication. The latter, tired of the war, and fearful of the dagger of assassins, determined at length to obey the pope, and sent to demand a safe conduct for himself and suite. Urban prescribed that his escort should consist of eight hundred persons, of whom only one hundred should be armed, and that the prince should not remain but eight days on the territories of the Holy See. Mainfroy, suspecting justly that the pope had hostile intentions against his person, refused to surrender at discretion, and towards the close of the year his kingdom was put under an interdict.

All hopes of an arrangement having failed, Urban sent into France, Bartholemew Pignatelli, the metropolitan of Cosenza, a man of war rather than of the church, a traitor who had abandoned the cause of Sicily and sold himself to the pontiff. The object of his embasey was to renew with the king, St. Louis, the negotiations which the great event of the capture of Constantinople had broken off, and which were to place the crown of Sicily on the head of Charles of Anjou, his brother.—Whilst the conditions of this compact were under discussion between the king and the legate, Urban was driven from Orvieto his new residence, by the citizens themselves, and although sick, was transported in a litter as far as Perouse, where he died on the 2d of October, 1264.

Shortly before his expulsion from Orvieto, the pontiff had instituted the festival of the holy sacrament of the altar, in accordance with the pretended revelations of two extatic nuns, Julianna of Mont-Cornillon, and Eva, surnamed the recluse of Liege.

CLEMENT THE FOURTH, THE ONE HUNDRED AND EIGHTY-EIGHTH POPE.

[A. D. 1264.]

The history of Guy Fucoldi before his exaltation—He is chosen pope by the name of Clement the Fourth—His sentiments in regard to his family—Grant of the kingdom of Sicily to Charles of Anjou—The fanaticism of the crusades spreads through all Christian countries—The young Conradin is excommunicated—Affairs of the Empire—Charles of Anjou causes Conradin to be decapitated at the instigation of the pope—Death of Clement.

GUY FUCOLDI, surnamed the Fat, on account of his excessive enbonpoint, was born at St. Gilles, in Languedoc. Whilst very young he lost his mother, and was even deprived of the cares of his father, who had entered a convent of Chartreuse, after the death of his wife. The young Guy at first followed the profession of arms, which he soon quitted to embrace a more honourable career—that of the bar. He made such rapid progress, that Durand, the celebrated jurist of the thirteenth century, called him the light or the torch of the law. St. Louis, on the strength of his great reputation, admitted him to his secret councils, and married him to a woman of high distinction. His happiness was further increased by the birth of several children; but as nothing is durable in this world, a violent fever carried off his wife and two young sons in nine days. His despair at this loss was so violent, that he resolved to separate himself from the society of men, and become a priest. He was first made archdeacon of Puy, in Vevay, then bishop of that city, and, finally, metropolitan of Narbonne. Urban made him cardinal bishop of Sabine, to induce him to quit his church and go to Italy. The holy father sent him to England with the title of legate, to excommunicate the barons who had revolted against the king; not being able to land in Great Britain, he had assembled some English prelates at Boulogne-sur-Mer, and fulminated an anathema against the rebel lords, the city of London, and the Cinque Ports, which had refused to receive him; after which he retook his way to Rome.

Guy was in France when he received the news of his election; he hastened to Perouse, disguised as a mendicant brother, in order to avoid falling into the power of the people of Mainfroy, who guarded all the routes; he arrived very luckily, and was consecrated on the 22d of February, 1265, by the name of Clement the Fourth.

On the day succeeding his consecration, he wrote to one of his nephews a very remarkable letter on nepotism, and which might serve for an example to the popes, his successors, who evinced so much cupidity for their families.

“Several of our relatives and friends,” said Clement in his letter, “rejoice in our promotion to the pontificate, because they hope to derive great advantages from it. We, on the contrary, deplore our elevation, because we feel the weight of so high a dignity. That you may know how to conduct yourself, now that we are sovereign pontiff, we warn you, that you should be even more humble. We are unwilling, that you or your brothers, or any of our relatives, should come to us without our order. If you do otherwise, you will force us to send you back, disgraced and humbled. Do not seek to marry your sister more advantageously than you would have done before our exaltation, for we will make no sacrifice for her; on the contrary, if you marry her to the son of a knight, we will give her, as her dowry, three hundred pounds of money; if your pretensions are more elevated, do not hope for a penny from us. We, however, wish that all this should be most secret, and that your mother alone should be informed of it.

“We are unwilling that our relatives should be inflated with pride, in consequence of our great elevation; and we desire that our well beloved daughters, Mabilla and Cecilia, should take as husbands those whom they would have chosen, if we were a mere clerk. Write to Gilia, that she does not leave Suza, and that she keeps to the modest vestments of her old position. We prohibit her from giving any recommendations; for all her requests will be refused, and will indispose us towards her. If they offer her presents, let her refuse them, to preserve our friendship. Salute your mother and brothers from us. We do not write to you and the other members of our family with the bull, but with the seal of the fisherman, which the popes use in their private business."

Clement the Fourth, in his private conduct, did not belie the sentiments which he had manifested in this letter. A canon of Liège relates, that several persons of the highest nobility having sought in marriage Cecilia, the oldest daughter of the holy father, he replied to them in raillery, "it is not Cecilia whom you would espouse, it is the pope." In fact, as he did not wish to give her a larger dower than her sister, both remained unmarried, and consecrated themselves to God. Antonin, in his chronicle, speaks of a brother of the pope, who was in orders, and whom he made the mere curate of his parish, without being willing to elevate him to a higher dignity. He had such an aversion for those who accumulated benefices, that he compelled his nephew, who possessed three prebends, to resign two. Finally, in the course of his reign, neither his relatives, nor princes, nor kings, could ever change his opinions on this subject.

Unfortunately, these beautiful traits as a private man disappeared before his political crimes. After the example of his predecessors, he showed himself to be insatiable in his love of rule, and implacable in his vengeance.

Scarcely seated on the throne, he determined to subjugate Sicily to the court of France; and, regardless of the incontestable rights of Conradin, and of the sentiments of equity which made it a duty not to despoil an heir and especially a pupil, he declared that the Roman church had full power over the kingdom of Sicily, and sold it to Charles, count of Anjou and Provence. The bull of investiture was dated on the 26th of February, 1265. It imposed the following conditions on the new king: "All the moveable or immoveable goods taken from churches or priests shall be restored to them by Charles of Anjou; the elections for the metropolitan and other churches, shall be entirely free; the ecclesiastical jurisdiction shall be reserved entire, with liberty to pursue appeals to the court of Rome; clergymen shall not be bound to appear before a secular judge, and shall not be burthened with taxes or collections; finally, the king shall not claim any right over the vacant churches, and shall leave all the benefices to the Holy See. He shall also restore to the inhabitants of the kingdom the liberties they possessed under William the Second."

Charles of Anjou, urged on by the desire of possessing a crown, acceded to all these conditions, and determined his brother, Louis the Ninth, to furnish him with money to conquer his new kingdom. The prince made his preparations for the war, without loss of time; and after the festival of Easter, he embarked from Marseilles with a thousand knights, and sailed for Ostia, where he arrived very op-portunately. From that city Charles went to Rome, where the citizens decreed to him the title of first senator, a thing which might have embroiled him with the pope, since Clement, constantly looking to the sovereignty of Rome, was unwilling to permit so great a prince to possess such an authority in that city for life. Means were happily found to reconcile every thing, by obtaining from Charles of Anjou a declaration by which he pledged himself not to accept the title of senator but for three years. He continued, however, to dwell at Rome, and even installed himself in the palace of the Lateran. The holy father still took umbrage at the choice which he had made of his residence, and wrote to him that if he did not immediately abandon the pontifical palace, he would immediately retract the crown of Sicily. Charles, who had need of the pope, obeyed this new injunction. He was, besides, magnificently recompensed for it. Clement sent four cardinals as deputies to him, who gave him the investiture of the kingdom of Sicily, by a standard.

During this year the new king fought no battle; he remained in Rome, waiting the arrival of the troops which he levied in France with the money of the faithful, as well as the bands of crusaders whom the cardinal of St. Cecilia enrolled for the crusade against Mainfroy, and against the Saracens of Nocera, his allies.

At this period of fanaticism, the fury of the crusades had seized on all minds; the holy war was preached every where; in Spain, against the Moorish kings of Murcia and Grenada; in Hungary, in Poland, in Bohemia, in Styria, in Austria, in Carinthia, and in the March of Brandenburg, against the Tartars; in England, against the rebel lords, who, in defiance of the anathemas of Rome, made war with the king; in France, crusaders were recruited for Palestine and Sicily; thus all Europe was in arms, and the popes, those vicars of a God of peace, urged on millions of men to wars of extermination.

Charles of Anjou, having finally assembled a formidable army, marched against his competitor, whom he met near Beneventum; the French, already defeated on several points, were beginning to fly, when the death of Mainfroy, who was slain in the melée, changed the face of the combat. The Italians gave way in their turn, and were soon in full rout. This victory annihilated the party of the Ghibelines; the greatest part of Italy submitted to the sovereign pontiff, at the same time that Sicily recognised Charles of Anjou as its king.

Clement, become all-powerful in Europe, sought to extend his sway over Asia; for this purpose he wrote the following letter to Michael Paleologus: "We invite you, prince, to enter into the holy league against the infidel, after the example of the king of France, who, for the second time, takes the cross with the princes his sons. Do not think by a subterfuge to disobey us; and do not say that you fear lest during your absence your empire should be attacked by the Latins, for it is easy to guarantee you against that danger, by returning with your subjects into the bosom of the Roman church: if, on the contrary, you persist in schism, and refuse your concurrence in the conquest of the Holy Land, know that nothing shall protect you from the vengeance of the crusaders."

Michael Paleologus appeared convinced by the reasoning of the holy father; and as he could not hope to struggle with advantage against the forces with which he was threatened, he sought to gain time by sending his ambassadors to Rome to ask for authority to convene a general council in a city of the Greek empire, in order to bring about a reunion of the two churches. Clement hastened to grant the required permission, and sent by the ambassadors a confession of faith, which the Greek prelates were to accept without examination, in order to put an end to the schism between the East and West.

During this same year (1267) the holy father issued a bull, which gave to the Holy See predominance over all thrones, and rendered it the sovereign disposer of churches and all ecclesiastical benefices. As he feared, however, to raise a too formidable opposition by immediately declaring himself the master of the property of the clergy, he at first reserved to himself the right to fill vacant benefices. This decree, a masterpiece of audacity and knavery, terminated thus: "Since the free disposal of the goods of the clergy belongs entirely to the pope, so that he can dispose of them as he pleases when they are vacant, and even take them from those who possess them to give them to others, ancient custom has, however, reserved to the holy father more particularly the power to dispose of them when they are vacant. It is on that account we approve of this custom, and order it to be maintained."

In giving this slight modification to his plan, Clement set at work that machiavelian policy which knows how to tighten the chains of slavery without making the people revolt. If he had included in his decree that the disposal of benefices rightly belonged to him, and that he could dispose of them at his will, all Christendom would have exclaimed against the exaggerated extension which the pontifical authority was assuming; in presenting this proposition in the form of a doubt, all received it without remarking on the consequences which might flow from it.

Clement, who had foreseen all, did not delay to avail himself of the new right which he had attributed to himself, to the prejudice of ancient privileges and holy canons. He maintained that the archdeaconate of Sens was one of the cases specified in his decree, and he prohibited Girard de Rampillon, to whom St. Louis had given that church, from taking possession of it before he had received authority from Rome, and had paid for the rights of investiture. This first step taken, he continued to walk in the same path, and ruled in reality all the clergy of the kingdom which had the imprudence to adopt his bull.

In Germany the wars had ceased, and the people commenced breathing, when Conradin attained his fifteenth year. Urged on by the counsels of the nobles, the young son of the emperor Conrad caused himself to be proclaimed king of Sicily, passed over into Italy, and placed himself at the head of the Ghibelines to contend for his rights with Charles of Anjou. The holy father, alarmed at this levy of armed men, prohibited Conradin from proceeding further, under penalty of excommunication, and addressed the same threat to the cities and lords who had ranged themselves under his banner. All these bulls not preventing Conradin from establishing his lieutenants in Tuscany and appointing governors for the cities of Sicily, the pope declared him excommunicated, deprived of the throne of Jerusalem, incapable of possessing any other, and deprived of all the fiefs which he held of the church; he relieved his vassals from the oath of fidelity, and placed his states under interdict.

Notwithstanding all the efforts of the Holy See to destroy the party of the young prince, the number of his partizans augmented in Italy; even Rome, which had before given so brilliant a reception to Charles of Anjou, declared for Conradin. The following was the cause of it; Henry of Castile, the son of Saint Ferdinand, and the brother of king Alphonso, surnamed the Astrologer, having quarrelled with this latter, left Spain and went to live with the king of Tunis. He remained among the infidel for four years, and, according to some historians, had even renounced Christianity. When he learned of the new fortunes of Charles of Anjou, his near relative, he left his place of exile, accompanied by several brave Spanish knights, and went to offer his services to Charles. The latter received him with great distinction, and on his departure for Rome, appointed him senator. As soon as Henry had the sovereign power in the holy city, like all those who are invested with too great authority, he abused it; he broke open the doors of the churches, seized the sacred vases and precious ornaments, and pillaged the rich churches of St. John of the Lateran, St. Paul, St. Sabas, St. Bazis on Mount Aventine, St. Sabinus, and a great number of others.

After these achievements against the clergy, as he feared the vengeance of the priests he wished to create assistance for himself, and declared for Conradin, drawing the Romans with him into this revolt. But the punishment was not delayed. Three days afterwards, Clement published the following bull against the holy city: "Since we have excommunicated Conradin, that sprig of an accursed race, the declared enemy of the church, one of his partizans, a child of malediction, Galvan la Larce, has dared to enter Rome, displaying the banners of the prince. And what heightens the infamy of such an action is, that the citizens received him with pomp, have admitted him to their public games, and installed him in the palace of the Lateran. After this, having assembled in the capitol, solemnly declared themselves in favour of Conradin, on the instigation of Henry of Castile their senator, of Guy de Montefeltro his lieutenant, and of several other officers. We excommunicate all these heretics, who have urged on the people to revolt against our authority."

This anathema being fulminated, the holy father, to distract the party of the young prince, resolved to rekindle the civil war in Germany by naming another emperor. He consequently caused the ambassadors of Richard of England and of Alphonso of Castile, to appear before him, both recognised kings of the Romans by Urban the Fourth, his predecessor, under the provision that they should conform to the decision which the Holy See would give after the delay of a year.

Henry, the oldest son of Richard, and Rodolph of Poggibonzi, presented themselves before Clement, the first in the name of the king of England, the other in the name of the king of Castile, to set forth their respective rights to the imperial crown. Henry bore with him insignificant titles of genealogy, by which he pretended to establish the legitimacy of the rights of his father upon Germany; but Rodolph did not even take the pains to produce any, saying, that the justice of the claim of Alphonso was too evident to need proofs. He, however, claimed the right to examine witnesses in Germany, France, Spain, and Italy, if his assertions were doubted. Clement declared that inquiry was necessary, and fixed on the cities of Paris, Frankfort, Burgos, and Bologna, as the places of meeting at which commissioners should try the truth of the titles of the pretenders. He reserved always, as a principal condition, that, above all, the two sovereigns should be crowned at Aix-la-Chapelle, as kings of the Romans, by the archbishop of Cologne.

The term for the inquiry having expired, William, the archdeacon of Rochester, presented himself before the pope, claiming, in the name of Richard of England, that the imperial crown should be definitely adjudged to him, since the delegates of King Alphonso had not attended at the places of conference. The Spanish ambassador objected, because the bishop of Silva, entrusted with the inquiry, having been killed in Tuscany by the Ghibelines, and Rodolph of Poggibonzi having fallen sick in a besieged place, it had been impossible for the king of Castile to produce the titles which established the legitimacy of his rights, and for these reasons he claimed a fresh delay. Clement, whose party had been strengthened in the interval, did not judge it prudent to hasten to confer the imperial dignity on a too powerful defender, and appeared to yield to the urgency of the Castilian ambassador, by deferring the decision of this important cause to the following year.

Discontented at this delay, the Germans, who had hoped to see the termination of their disasters, resolved to convoke a diet to choose themselves a chief capable of defending them against the Holy See. Clement was unfortunately advised of this determination, and immediately wrote to them that he prohibited them, under penalty of excommunication and interdict, to proceed to a new election.

In the midst of all these contests Conradin pursued his way, and continued his march across Lombardy and Tuscany, to reach Rome, where he was proclaimed emperor by the senator Henry of Castile and the people. He then went into Apulia, and offered battle to the troops of King Charles. The two armies met under the walls of Taglia Cozzo. The combat commenced in the morning and lasted until night, and victory still remained faithful to Charles of Anjou. Conradin, the young duke of Austria, and the senator Henry, compelled to abandon the field of battle, took refuge in the states of the church, where soon, through the efforts of the pope, their retreat was discovered. They were sold and led prisoners to Naples.

Charles having consulted the holy father as to what he should do with these unfortunate prisoners, Clement replied: "The life of Conradin is the death of Charles, and the death of Conradin is the life of Charles." This reply decided the fate of the prince.

A council was assembled as a matter of form, in order that the prisoners should be tried and condemned to death as guilty of lèse majesty. This tribunal was composed of deputies from provinces the most devoted to the Holy See; yet among these caitiff or sold magistrates there was found but one who dared to pronounce the penalty of death against the unfortunate who came to claim the heritage of his father. Scarcely had this iniquitous judge pronounced this terrible sentence, when Robert of Flanders, the son-in-law of Charles himself, stretched him dead at his feet, "for having," he said, "desired so harsh a punishment on so noble and gentle a lord." Notwithstanding this violent protest, the condemnation was supported by order of the conqueror.

Before the execution of his sentence, the young Conradin was delivered up to two monks, dragged through the park of the castle to the foot of a tomb, despoiled of his clothes, and beaten by these fanatics with loaded thongs, in expiation of the anathema he had incurred. He was then borne, all bleeding, upon the scaffold erected in the great square of Naples, and beheaded, with his cousin, who was scarcely seventeen years old. Historians say that the duke of Austria was executed first, and that Conradin seized his head and received the mortal blow whilst embracing it.

Thus perished, at Naples, in the year 1268, by the hands of the executioner, the last scion of the house of Suabia, which had struggled so long and in so fatal a way against the ambition of the popes. Lancia and Gherardesca, counsellors of the young prince, were beheaded on the same scaffold, as well as the other victims designated by the Holy See. Henry of Castile was surrendered to Charles by the abbot of Monte Cassino, from whom he had demanded an asylum, and the king reserved him to frighten the Italian lords; he shut him up in an iron cage like a wild beast, and thus led him through all the cities of Sicily.

Clement did not long survive Conradin. On the 29th of November, of the same year, death struck him in his turn. This pontiff was, it is true, distinguished by extreme regularity of morals, but his political crimes must class him among the most cruel despots.

VACANCY IN THE HOLY SEE.

[A. D. 1269.]

Division among the cardinals—St. Louis establishes the pragmatic sanction, and refuses to serve as arbitrator between the Greek and Latin clergy—Six cardinals appointed to choose a pope.

AFTER the death of Clement the Fourth, the cardinals could not choose a new pope, each of them personally intriguing for the honours of the pontificate. The result was, a great scandal for the church and a vacancy in the Holy See for three years.

During this interregnum the fanatical Louis the Ninth placed himself at the head of a new crusade, and prepared to go to combat the infidel. Before, however, embarking for the Holy Land, he was desirous of taking suitable measures to assure the tranquillity of the Gallican church during his absence. For this purpose he published the decree called the Pragmatic Sanction. "In future the metropolitan and other churches shall exercise entire freedom of election; simony shall be proscribed from the kingdom; promotions, collations, provisions, and disposals of prelatships, dignities, and other benefices or ecclesiastical offices whatsoever, shall be made and given according to the disposal of the common law, of the councils and institutions of the ancient fathers; the liberties, franchises, and privileges accorded by kings to churches and monasteries shall be maintained; finally, no impost or exaction ordered by Rome shall force the Gallic churches to give money to the Holy See, without the approval of the sovereign."

Michael Paleologus, informed of the preparations of king Louis, and fearing lest he should unite with Charles of Anjou, his brother, to drive him from Constantinople, hastened to reconcile himself with the Latin clergy, by sending large sums to the cardinals. At the same time he sent ambassadors to king Louis, beseeching him, by the blood of Jesus Christ, to become the arbiter between the Greek and Latin churches, in order to put an end to the schism. The king refused to act, and wrote to the sacred college to appoint commissioners, who should discuss the mode of re-establishing union between the east and the west.

Although turned aside from his first purpose, Louis the Ninth nevertheless embarked with his troops, and landed at Tunis, with the design of constraining the inhabitants of that city to become converts to Christianity. This extravagant enterprise completely failed; the plague broke out in the camp of the crusaders; the prince himself was attacked with it, and died miserably beneath the walls of the place.

The cardinals had assembled at Viterba for three years, without being able to choose a pontiff; they finally assembled in conclave, and gave their full powers to six of their body, who, after eight days of violent disputes, proclaimed the archdeacon Thealdus sovereign pontiff, by the name of Gregory the Tenth.

GREGORY THE TENTH, THE ONE HUNDRED AND EIGHTY-NINTH POPE.

[A. D. 1271.]

History of Gregory before his pontificate—His efforts for a crusade—Negotiations with Michael Paleologus for a reunion of the two churches—Excommunication of Guy de Montfort—The pope causes Rudolph of Hapsburg to be chosen emperor—Council of Lyons—Constitution in relation to the election of popes—Interview between Gregory and the emperor—Return of the holy father to Italy—He dies at Arezzo.

THEALDUS, or Thibald, was of Placenza, and of the powerful family of the Visconti; he had been a canon of Lyons, then archdeacon of Liege, finally a cardinal and legate of the Holy See, as the historians Ricordanus, Malespina, and Joannes Villani affirm; contraditioning in that the deed of election, which designates him by the title of archdeacon. Whatever he was, authors are agreed on this, that he was very ignorant of both profane and sacred literature.

After his election, the cardinals addressed to him, at Saint Jean d'Acre, where he was legate, the decree which conferred the tiara upon him, beseeching him to hasten his return to Italy. The new pope had no occasion to be urgently solicited to quit the Holy Land with which he was disgusted. He embarked immediately for Brindes, on the 1st of January, 1272. During his sojourn in that city he received an embassy of notables, who besought him to re-enter Rome and instal himself in the old pontifical residence, with his court, which Gregory refused to do. He went to Orvieto, where the cardinals awaited him to proceed to the formalities of the pierced chair and the ceremonies of the consecration.

The holy father then thought of the means to strengthen his authority over the churches of the east and west: and to arrive at his end he discovered there was nothing better than to preach crusades in imitation of his predecessors. For this purpose he wrote to the inhabitants of Pisa, Marseilles, and Venice, that they should furnish armed galleys for the Holy Land, and at the same time he sent legates into every kingdom to collect alms and pious legacies. He also recommenced the negotiations opened with Michael Paleologus, and sent to him the cordelier, Jerome of Arcoli, the most skilful monk of the period, who afterwards arrived in his turn at the pontificate.

Whilst the Roman legate was treating with the emperor, to urge him to approve, without any previous examination, of the profession of faith which Clement the Fourth had prescribed to him, secret agents prevented the Venetians from renewing the truce agreed upon between them and the Greeks, and induced them to send the ambassadors of Michael away from Venice. This sudden blow alarmed the emperor. To allay the storm, he submitted to the pope, and persecuted the Greek prelates so vigorously that he forced them to abjure the schism, in a general council which the pope had convened.

During the following year, Italy was excited by a horrible assassination committed by Guy de Montfort on the person of Henry of Germany. Edward, king of England, was obliged to return from the Holy Land, and go to Orvieto, where the pope resided with his court, to demand justice against the murderer, whom he had dared to take under his protection. Gregory, fearing the wrath of so powerful a prince, determined to fulminate this sentence of anathema against the assassin. "We curse Guy de Montfort, and we permit every one to seize him, but not to kill or mutilate him. We order the governors of provinces to arrest him, and we place under interdict all places which shall afford him an asylum. We prohibit all Christians from lending him any aid, or from having any communication with him; and, finally, we absolve or dispense his vassals or subjects from the oath of fidelity they may have taken to him."

Guy de Montfort, finding no more safety in his domains, waited for the departure of the king of England, and came immediately to make his submission to the pope, without any clothes on but his shirt, and having a cord around his neck; in this condition he cast himself at his feet, and besought the holy father with tears to take off the sentence of anathema pronounced against him. Gregory, to avoid appearing as his accomplice in this farce, surrendered him to the king of Sicily to retain him as a prisoner during the rest of his life; he, however, some time afterwards, permitted the patriarch of Aquileia to absolve Montfort from the ecclesiastical sentences, and reinstated him in his dignities.

During the following year, Gregory quitted Orvieto and went to Florence, into which he made his entry on the 8th of June, 1273. He was accompanied by Charles of Anjou and Baldwin, the titular emperor of Constantinople. His residence at Florence was so agreeable to him, that he determined to pass the summer there, and chose for his residence the palace of a rich merchant of the family of the Mozzi. Any other than a priest would have shown himself grateful for the generous hospitality which he received; but Gregory only thought of laying the imprudent city which had opened its gates to him under contribution. He availed himself of the divisions of the Guelphs and Ghibelines, to lay an imposition of forty thousand marks sterling, which each party was to pay yearly to the Holy See in remembrance of the peace, of which the pope pretended he was the mediator. Unhappily, some turbulent spirit destroyed the intentions of the holy father, and openly accused him of avarice. Nothing more was necessary to break off the negotiations, and Gregory was compelled to quit the city, mortified and humbled at seeing his hypocrisy unmasked. He avenged himself of this affront by lanching an interdict upon Florence. He then went to Placenza, from whence he wrote to the German princes that they must fill the imperial throne without delay, if they did not wish him to appoint a king himself. The electors immediately assembled at Frankfort, and proclaimed Rudolph, of Hapsburg, king of Germany.

After this appointment the holy father was engaged in convening a general council, to remedy the abuses which had crept into the church, and which were such that Gregory wrote to the bishop of Liege: "We are informed, lord bishop, that you have taken an abbess of the order of St. Benedict as a concubine; and that, in a debauch, you boasted of having had, in fourteen months, twenty-two children by fourteen different mistresses. We know that in one of your episcopal residences you keep a seraglio of nuns; and that, alone with these daughters of Satan, you abandon yourself to debaucheries, such as nothing in pagan history can give us an idea of. We have been informed, that after the death of an abbeſs, you have broken the canonical election of the nun designated to ſucceed her, in order to give the abbey to one of your daughters, who was at the ſame time one of your miſtreſſes. Finally, not content with deſpoiling churches and convents, you dare to ſell the eccleſiaſtical orders and places; you protect robbers and aſſaſſins; and you never appear at the altar."

Lyons having been designated as the place at which the aſſembly was to be held, Gregory went thither at the appointed time, and opened the ſessions on the 7th of March, 1274, in the cathedral of St. John. Tartar envoys, embaſſadors from all the courts of Europe, as well as the elite of the clergy of France, Germany, England, and Spain aſſiſted at the council. Even a king, the ſovereign of Arragon, came to be crowned by the pope.

In the firſt ſitting, Gregory explained the reaſons for the convocation of ſo great a number of prelates; he dwelt particularly on the neceſſity of publiſhing a new crusade, and of bringing about promptly the reunion of the Latin and Greek churches, and of reforming the morals of the clergy of the Weſt. In the ſecond ſitting he ſummoned each metropolitan, and claimed from them a tenth of their revenues, which no one dared reſuſe. In the third ſitting, the king of Arragon beſought the pope to conſecrate him, without exacting from him the tribute which his father had promiſed Innocent the Third. Upon the reſuſal of the holy father to agree to his requeſt, he left the aſſembly and returned to his kingdom.

They were then engaged with the affairs of the Eaſt. The embaſſadors of Michael Paleologus and the Greek patriarch were placed on the right of the pontifical throne. They addreſſed a long diſcourſe to the aſſembly, in which they treated of the queſtion of the ſchiſm, and pledged themſelves to accept the faith of the Roman church and be ſubmiſſive to the Holy See. Gregory then cauſed the letter of Michael to be publicly read, in which he was called ſovereign pontiff, œcumenical pope, and father of all Chriſtians. Finally, the grand logothetes, George Acropolitus, took, in the name of the emperor, his oath of abjuration.

On the following day Gregory decreed a conſtitution in relation to the election of pontiffs. The following was the tenor of this remarkable bull. "After the death of the popes, we order the cardinals who are preſent in the city in which the apoſtolical court is held, to wait for the aſſent for ten days only, before aſſembling in conclave. This time of delay having expired, they muſt aſſemble in the pontifical palace, keeping with them but a ſingle ſervant. We enjoin on them all to lodge in the ſame room, without any interior ſeparation of walls or curtains to conceal them, even when ſatisfying the laws of nature. This room ſhall be cloſed on all ſides from the exterior, ſo that it ſhall be impoſſible for any one to come in or go out; there ſhall only be left a ſingle window, fifteen feet from the floor, through which to paſs their food. We prohibit every one from ſpeaking to the cardinals, or addreſſing meſſages to them in writing, during the duration of a conclave.

"If, after three days of deliberation, the pope ſhall not have been choſen, there ſhall only be ſerved up to the conclaviſts a ſingle diſh for dinner, and but one for ſupper. Five days afterwards, if the election has not yet terminated, they ſhall only receive bread, wine, and water until the ſovereign pontiff ſhall be finally proclaimed.

"During the duration of the elections all entertainments of the cardinals ſhall be ſuppreſſed, as well as the other revenues which they receive from the church or the apoſtolical chamber.

"Thoſe who ſhall leave the conclave without the apparent cauſe of ſickneſs, ſhall not be permitted to return to it: thoſe who ſhall preſent themſelves after the opening of the deliberations, ſhall alſo be excluded.

"When a pope ſhall die away from the city of his reſidence, the cardinals ſhall aſſemble in the episcopal city of the territory in which he ſhall have deſeased, and the conclave ſhall be held in the houſe of the biſhop, or a ſuitable dwelling. The lord or the magiſtracy of the city ſhall cauſe that which has been preſcribed to be ſcrupuloſly obſerved, without adding any more ſeverity, under penalty of excommunication, interdict, and all the cenſures of the church.

"Finally, they ſhall make no agreement, nor pledge, nor engagement among themſelves, under penalty of nullity; and they ſhall proceed in good faith, without prejudice or paſſions, to the election of the pontiff."

This electoral conſtitution excited great oppoſition on the part of the cardinals, but all their intrigues for its ſuppreſſion failed before the reſolute firmneſs of Gregory.

In the laſt ſitting of the council, the pope declared the aſſembly diſſolved, and occupied himſelf excluſively with preparations for the ſucceſs of the new crusade, and with levelling the obſtacles which retarded the execution of his plans. He firſt wrote to the king of Caſtile, that he definitely recognised Rudolph of Hapsburg as king of the Romans, and ordered him to abandon his pretenſions to the imperial crown. He then wrote to Rudolph to prepare for the crusade, in order to render himſelf worthy of receiving the inveſtiture at his hands.

Alphonſo of Caſtile reſuſed to obey, and immediately went to the pope at Lyons, to reproach him with his perfidy. Threats, like promiſes, could not change the determination of Gregory, and the prince was obliged to return, as he came, into his kingdom. All diſviſions were not, however, extinguished in Germany, ſo that the king of Caſtile did not the leſs continue his intercourse with his partizans, and he even uſed the formularies and ſeal, in accordance with the uſages of the emperors, in his correſpondence with the lords and prelates of Germany.

Gregory, to put an end to the scandal of this revolt against his authority, wrote to the metropolitan of Seville, to summon the king, in the presence of witnesses, to desist from his pretensions, under penalty of ecclesiastical censures. This threat had the result which the holy father anticipated. Alphonso renounced the empire; and to recompense him, the pope permitted him to levy on his subjects a dime in silver, to defray the expenses of the war declared against the Moors.

Thus were terminated the divisions which had desolated Germany for so many years.

The pope then went to Lausanne, where Rudolph of Hapsburg, with his wife and children, waited for him; he took the oath between the hands of Gregory, and pledged himself to preserve all the property and all the rights of the Roman church; to furnish it with assistance to recover the domains which had been wrested from it, and particularly the crown of Sicily, which the holy father wished to retake from Charles of Anjou. He promised to publish an edict, by which he should leave the chapters of the churches of his kingdoms at full and entire liberty in the election of prelates; prohibiting his officers from seizing, in his name, on the property of deceased ecclesiastics, or of vacant prebends and bishoprics. He recognised the right of appeals to the Holy See, and promised to receive from the Romans no office nor dignity which should give him the least power in the holy city, nor over the vassals of the Roman church. Finally, he took the cross, and swore he would depart for the Holy Land at the first bidding of the pope.

It is remarkable, that the chiefs of the church, since the close of the eleventh century, have always adopted the same policy, which was to show great zeal to reconquer the Holy Land, in order to strengthen more surely their temporal authority.

The conference of Lausanne being terminated, Gregory returned into Italy, and arrived at Milan on the 12th of November, 1275. From thence he continued his route by the way of Florence, but without wishing to enter that city, under the pretext that it was under interdict. As the Arno, however, was swollen by rains, and could not be crossed at a ford, he was compelled to retrace his steps to cross the river over a bridge; he then took off the censures pronounced against the city, and gave his blessing to all those whom he found on his way. But as soon as he thought himself out of danger, he changed his attitude and language, turned himself fiercely on his horse, and stretching out his arms in the direction of Florence, sent this anathema to it—"Cursed city, I devote thee to eternal damnation, for it is of thee that the psalmist wrote."

Gregory pursued his journey as far as Arezzo; but he was there attacked with a violent fever, which carried him off, on the 12th of January, 1276. He was buried in the church of St. Donatus.

INNOCENT THE FIFTH, THE ONE HUNDRED AND NINETIETH POPE.

[A. D. 1276.]

History of Innocent before his pontificate—His election—He re-establishes peace in Italy—His toleration—He removes the censures pronounced by his predecessors—His death.

INNOCENT the Fifth, before his election, was called Peter of Tarentaise, from the place of his birth, a small village of Burgundy, situated on the borders of Iseria. Having entered, when very young, into the order of preaching friars, he soon became one of the most skilful doctors of his order; his talents caused him to be raised to the archiepiscopal see of Lyons, and then to that of Ostia. Onuphus Panvini says that he even held the place of grand penitentiary during the last pontificate.

Ten days after the death of Gregory, the cardinals assembled in conclave, in conformity with the regulations published at the council of Lyons, and chose as his successor Peter of Tarentaise.

The new pope went immediately to Rome, and was crowned in the church of St. Peter, after which he turned his attention to the quarrels which agitated Italy, in order to put an end to them. He first sent two legates into Tuscany, with the ambassadors of Charles of Anjou, to reconcile the inhabitants of Lucca and Pisa. He then took off from the Florentines the censures pronounced against them by his predecessor. Finally, his tolerant spirit led him to send nuncios to Michael Paleologus, to obtain the confirmation of the deed of reunion of the Greek and Latin churches.

The cardinals were not long in discovering that they had committed a great error in choosing a simple and tolerant pope, who only desired the good of the people. Thus they hastened to repair it, and according to the expression of Bernard Guido, "this beautiful flower suddenly withered away."

Innocent the Fifth died of poison, and was interred on the 17th of June, 1276, in the church of St. John the Lateran. Charles of Sicily assisted at his funeral ceremonies.

It is truly strange in the history of the church, that among the small number of really virtuous popes who have occupied the throne of the apostle, there is not counted a single one who did not die after a short apparition on the Holy See; and the assassins have almost always been cardinals and monks.

ADRIAN THE FIFTH, THE ONE HUNDRED AND NINETY-FIRST POPE.

[A. D. 1276.]

Intrigues in the conclave—The cardinal Ottobon de Fiesca falls sick—He is chosen pontiff—He revokes the constitution of the conclave established by Gregory the Tenth—He dies before his consecration.

AFTER the death of Innocent, the cardinals assembled in conclave, and remained shut up for seventeen days without being able to agree upon the election of a new pontiff. In accordance with the constitution of Gregory, from the fifth night they gave them only bread. Notwithstanding the severity of this regimen, they would doubtless have still longer prolonged the conclave, if Ottobon of Fiesca, a cardinal deacon, had not fallen grievously sick. They united all voices on the dying man, and proclaimed him sovereign pontiff, on the express condition that he would revoke the constitution of Gregory. The sick man consented to all that was demanded of him, and was immediately installed in the pontifical chair by the name of Adrian the Fifth.

On the next day the new pope revoked the constitution of Gregory the Tenth concerning the conclave,—not to fulfil the promise he had made, since by the very terms of the constitution itself he would have been freed from it, but from a motive more grave than the religion of an oath. Rainaldus maintains, that the holy father had obtained proof that the cardinals had poisoned him before voting for him, to put an end to their forced fast, and that his reign should not be of long duration.

Adrian, a victim to the sacerdotal ambition, restrained by the constitution of Gregory, wished to prevent, for the future, the renewal of like assassinations, and broke the rules of the conclave. The unfortunate pontiff knew his murderers so well, that he said to his relatives, who had come together to compliment him on his election, "You had better have come before my election: the cardinal was in good health; whilst now, the conclavists have made a pope a dying man."

Adrian was not consecrated a bishop, nor even ordained priest. He had time, however, to write some letters to the faithful in the Holy Land, to raise their courage, by announcing that the crusaders were ready to depart for Palestine.

As his sickness became more and more severe, he wished to change the air, and gave orders to be transported from Rome to Viterba; but, at the moment his litter was passing the gates of that last city, he expired. He was buried in the church of the Minor Brothers, on the 18th of August, 1276. His tomb exists to our days.

JOHN THE TWENTY-FIRST, THE ONE HUNDRED AND NINETY-SECOND POPE.

[A. D. 1276.]

Divisions among the cardinals—The inhabitants of Viterba constrain them to enforce the constitution of Gregory the Tenth—The election of Pierre Julien by the name of John the Twenty-first—Commencement of his pontificate—Charles of Anjou does homage to the holy father for his estates in Sicily—John intrudes himself as an arbiter between the kings of France and Castile—He is crushed to death by the fall of a part of a wall.

AFTER the death of Adrian, the Holy See remained vacant for twenty-eight days. At length the cardinals assembled in the palace of Viterba, not in conclave, but as a mere assembly, to proceed to the revocation of the constitution of Gregory the Tenth. Despairing of putting an end to the ambitious views of their colleagues, the wisest among them declared their determination to retire to their bishoprics, without making a pontiff. This resolve was soon known in the city; and, as the inhabitants of Viterba feared the consequences of a schism, they immediately assembled before the episcopal palace, with threats of death to the cardinals.

This manifestation was brought about by the procurers and other patricians of the court of Rome, who had come to Viterba to supervise the election of the pope; and who, aware of the ambition of the cardinals, knew that they would constantly raise obstacles to the elevation of a pontiff, as soon as they should be at liberty. They then went to the cathedral, in which these prelates announced that they would solemnly read the revocation of the constitution of Gregory the Tenth; and when the metropolitan and his assistants appeared to publish it, they threw themselves upon them, tore the document from the hands of the patriarch, and drove him away with blows. After this scene of violence, the crowd went to the episcopal palace and broke open the doors. They then seized on the cardinals and shut them up in the conclave, forcing them to proceed to the election of a pope. Under the inspiration of fear, Pierre Julien, cardinal bishop of Tusculum, was chosen on the first ballot, and received the name of John the Twenty-first.

This pontiff is counted by some chronologists as the twentieth of that name; the last pontiff John the Nineteenth having died in 1033, and the anti-pope John the Twentieth not occupying a place in the order of the chiefs of the church. According to other historians, all of them blind partizans of the Roman church, he is counted as the twenty-first of the name of John—they reinstating the popess Joan in her chronological place, by the name of John the Eighth. x v ?

The new pope was originally from Lisbon, where he had taken the four degrees, which caused him, in the style of that age, to be called the universal clerk; he had, however, applied himself especially to the study of medicine, and a very bad work on therapeutics called "The Treasure of the Poor," which is still in the Vatican, is attributed to him.

As soon as he was consecrated, John revoked the constitution of the conclave, by publishing a bull which is cited by Rainaldus; at the same time he gave orders to arrest the persons who had committed violence on the cardinals before his election, and caused them to appear before a commission especially appointed to try them, declaring all who should protest against the competency of the tribunal anathematised. He then wrote to Charles of Anjou, that if he wished to preserve his relations of amity with the Holy See, he must do homage for his kingdom on the conditions dictated by Clement, especially in regard to the order of the succession. The king of Sicily, whose authority was not well affirmed, went speedily to the holy father; and took the oath of liege homage to him. In the following year John was desirous of reviving the plan of the crusades, interrupted by the death of the last popes; and as the disputes between Philip the Hardy, king of France, and Alphonso, king of Castile, might degenerate into a terrible war and retard the consequent execution of his designs, he sent legates to re-establish concord between the two princes.—In case the two sovereigns should persist in their disputes, the delegates were instructed to represent to them that the council of Lyons had ordered a general peace among all the people of Christendom, under penalty of excommunication and interdict, and to launch an anathema against their persons and kingdoms, if they did not immediately accept the pope as the arbiter of their quarrels. This menace produced its effect; Philip and Alphonso were reconciled.

John also sent ambassadors to the court of Rudolph, to claim the realization of the promises which he had made concerning the holy war. From thence his legates proceeded as far as the residence of the Khan of the Tartars, to achieve the conversion of that people. Other mandatories from the court of Rome went to Hungary to put an end to the civil wars which were depopulating that kingdom and depriving the Holy See of the succour of their armies: and, finally, an embassy sent to Constantinople was instructed to summon the Greek emperor to confirm the reunion of the two churches by a solemn act of approval.

He who had displayed this prodigious activity, and in the course of a single year, executed so many schemes, was not the pontiff, but the cardinal John Gaëtan, who directed all the business of the Holy See: Martin Polonais, Henry Stero, Ptolomæus, Lucensis, Bernard Guy, Platinus, Nancier, and many other historians, agree in representing John the Twenty-first as the most of a nullity of any pope who had ever been seated in the apostolical chair. If nature had done nothing for his mind, it had, by way of compensation, prodigiously developed his body; thus trusting to the strength of his constitution, which promised him secular longevity, he flattered himself that he would possess the pontifical chair long enough to see two generations of men live and die. But it happened otherwise. One day, whilst visiting a new palace that he was constructing at Viterba, a piece of wall fell upon him and crushed him. This event took place on the 16th of May, 1277. His remains were deposited in the church of St. Lawrence, at Viterba.

NICHOLAS THE THIRD, THE ONE HUNDRED AND NINETY-THIRD POPE.

[A. D. 1277.]

Election of Nicholas the Third — Embassy from the Greeks — Rudolph yields to the popes the right of rule over Italy — Treaty between Nicholas and Charles of Anjou — Causes of the hatred of the pope for the king of Sicily — He prohibits tournaments — Quarrel between the pope and the king of Hungary — Nicholas secretly prepares the Sicilian vespers — His death.

THE constitution of the conclave having been a second time revoked by John the Twenty-first, the cardinals could give the reins to their ambition, and six months after the death of the last pope, the apostolic chair was still vacant. At last John Gaëtan, a cardinal deacon, succeeded, and was chosen sovereign pontiff on the 25th of November, 1277, by the name of Nicholas the Third.

He was a Roman by birth, and of the Ursini family. Ancient chronicles relate, that he was presented in his childhood to St. François d'Assise, who predicted that the child would be the prop of the Franciscans and the master of the world. He was well formed in his person, and so modest and discreet, that he was surnamed the "Composer." He took his first ecclesiastical degrees in England and France, in the churches of York, Soissons, and Laon. Innocent the Fourth afterwards elevated him to the dignity of cardinal, and appointed him the protector of the Minor Brothers. At length, according to fathers Pagi and Desponde, he filled the office of inquisitor-general of the faith.

Nicholas went to Rome after his election, and was solemnly consecrated in the church of St. Peter. He received, in that city, the ambassadors of Michael Paleologus, who came to bring, on the part of the patriarch of Constantinople and the other oriental prelates, a profession of faith similar to that of the council of Lyons, and the promise of submission by the Greek church to the Holy See. Christians from Georgia also arrived at the same time, and for the first time, at Rome, who announced themselves as the ambassadors of Abaka, khan of Persia, and who came to offer the assistance of an army against the Saracens of Syria. The pope received them with distinction, and in a solemn audience gave them letters for their master. He then dismissed them, and sent with them five Minor brothers, commissioned to catechise the khan, and ask from him authority to teach the gospel to his people. This fact of the embassy of the Persians is contested by some esteemed authors, who maintain that this comedy was got up by the ambitious Nicholas to make an impression on the dull minds of the kings of the west, and to increase the prestige of his spiritual and temporal sway.

Rudolph of Hapsburg also sent an embassy to Nicholas to beseech him to proceed to his coronation, a ceremony which, from the disturbed state of the times, had not yet been performed. The pope replied, that he was ready to grant him solemnly the imperial crown, provided he would surrender to the church all his rights over Italy. The prince, who, happily, had not the ambition of his predecessors, immediately gave full powers to Conrad of Lubinge, provincial of the Minor Brothers, in upper Germany, to ratify the treaties concluded with Gregory the Tenth, and to renew his renunciation in favour of the Roman church, of the property which had been conferred on it by the donations of kings and princes, without even excepting the cities of Bologna, Imola, Faenza, Forli, Cessene, Ravenna, Rimini, and Urbino, which had been for very many years subject to the emperors of Germany. The same ambassador was instructed to conclude a treaty between Rudolph and the king of Sicily, concerning the boundary of certain domains. As the pope had great influence over Conrad, he availed himself of it to be revenged on Charles of Anjou, who had refused to give one of his nieces in marriage to one of his nephews, replying insolently to his delegate: "Though Nicholas wears the red stockings, does he on that account think his family worthy of being allied to ours? Does he not know that his greatness will perish with him?" This ill-considered reply was the first cause of the disasters of Charles of Anjou. From that moment the holy father pursued him with his hatred. At first he ordered him to renounce the vicariate of the empire in Tuscany, and the dignity of senator of Rome; he compelled him never to undertake any thing against Germany without the authority of the Holy See; and finally, he forced him to sign a constitution, which declared the popes sole and legitimate masters of Rome, by virtue of a donation from Constantine. By this act, the king of Sicily and the emperor of Germany recognised, that, in future, neither emperor, nor king, nor prince, nor titled lord, could be placed in possession of the government of the holy city, under title of Senator, captain, patrician, or any other denomination.

During the following year, Charles, prince of Salerno, the eldest son of the king of Sicily, made a journey into France to see his cousin german, Philip the Hardy. His arrival gave birth to rejoicings and tourneys, to which all the nobility of France and Germany were invited. Nicholas, informed of the magnificent reception given to the young prince, hastened to write the following letter to his legate, the cardinal of St. Cecilia: "It is affirmed that tournaments are an useful exercise, and that the nobles learn in these meetings to exercise themselves in the management of arms for the defence of religion and the Holy Land: the popes, our predecessors, have, however, had another opinion, since they have refused ecclesiastical burial to those who die in these condemnable strifes. It is our will, then, that you publicly excommunicate the counts, barons, knights, and other lords, who have taken part in the late tourneys celebrated at the court of France, until they shall have confessed their fault, and implored the mercy of the church. It is not for secular men to judge whether exercises are useful or condemnable: they should be submitted to the decision of the pope, and he should be obeyed as God."

At this time brother Bonne Grâce, the new general of the Minor Brothers, went to Surien, the residence of the pontiff, to ask him to give them a protector, as their rule required, beseeching him to accept this post himself, as Alexander the Fourth had done. The holy father replied to the monk: "There is nothing I would do more willingly, if the cares of government would permit me to give the necessary attention to the good of your order." The shaven general then turned to the nephew of the pontiff, Mathew Rosso d'Ursini, a cardina

"and you, my lord," said he, "will you consent to become the protector of our brotherhood?" The cardinal having signified his acceptance, the pope drew a ring from his finger, and gave it to his nephew as a sign of his new office. "This order," added he, "does not need your government; it has wise and enlightened superiors, capable of directing its affairs; you will have only to protect it against its adversaries, who are powerful and numerous."

Nicholas always showed great attachment to the order of the Minor Brothers, and even worked for several months with two cardinals, Jerome of Ascoli, bishop of Palestrina, and Benivena, the prelate of Albano, in forming the declaration of the institution of the society which was published on the 4th of August, 1279.

During this year (1279), a revolt of the lords against the priests took place in Hungary; the latter had pushed their desire for sway so far, that the nobles, weary of their tyranny, took up arms to drive them away; a terrible struggle was the consequence, at the close of which the country was found to be devastated, cities ruined, churches burned, and convents sacked. To check the consequences of so serious a revolution, Nicholas despatched the bishop Philip into Hungary, giving him at the same time the legation of Poland, Dalmatia, Croatia, Servia, Comania, and the adjacent countries. This ambassador obtained an edict against the Hungarian lords from King Ladislaus the Third, in which he admitted, that the Roman church having brought the light of evangelical faith into his kingdom, he owed it full and entire obedience, and that, consequently, all his subjects should execute the orders of the court of Rome as he himself did. He convened, at the same time, a council at Buda, to take some steps on the subject.

Some lords having, in the interval, shown to Ladislaus that the pretensions of the priests were as injurious to the state as they were insulting to the royal dignity, he yielded to their representations, and gave orders to the magistrates and citizens of Buda to drive the legate away from their city and refuse provisions to the priests.

Nicholas being apprised of the unsuccessful issue of this legation, used all his efforts to induce the king of Hungary to return to more favourable sentiments; he even employed the intervention of Charles of Anjou, whose daughter Ladislaus had married, and of Rudolph of Hapsburg. With the same end, he addressed pathetic letters to the queen, bishops, and lords of Hungary; he induced his envoy Philip to remain in the environs of Buda, and to employ all his energy to subjugate this rebellious king. At length, as nothing could change the hostile sentiments of Ladislaus, he employed strong measures, and threatened him to release his subjects from the oath of fidelity to him, to place his states under interdict, to excommunicate him and nominate another sovereign in his place. The king, who dreaded the consequences of a civil war, was forced to submit to the Holy See. He begged pardon, re-established matters on their former footing, permitted the clergy to return to Buda, and, as a mark of his repentance, founded an hospital in that city, to which he assigned an annual revenue of a hundred marks of silver, charged upon the treasury. He however exacted that the legate Philip should leave his kingdom, and the envoy was exiled into Poland.

Nicholas, endowed with a strong physical organization, counting upon a long reign, had formed an infernal plan; the execution of which he pursued with rare perseverance, and which was to bring back the whole of Italy beneath the sway of the Holy See, by the extermination of the French in Sicily. But God did not permit him to see this horrible massacre, which took place at a later date, and which history has handed down to us by the name of the Sicilian Vespers. He was struck by a fit of apoplexy on the 22d of August, 1280, and died in the city of Surien near Viterba. His body was taken to Rome, and buried in the chapel of St. Nicholas, in the church of St. Peter.

The life of the pontiff presents another proof of the truth, that supreme power almost always perverts the best natural gifts. Whilst he was a cardinal, Nicholas had shown perfect disinterestedness; as soon as he was made pope, he became avaricious; he pillaged churches and monasteries, and begged for money in every court in order to enrich his family, so that, in the few years during which he governed the church, his relatives, from being poor, became the richest lords of Italy. When death surprised him, he was preparing to create a kingdom in Tuscany, and another in Lombardy for his nephew. Happily, God, who is more powerful than pontiffs and kings, struck down this guilty head and prevented the execution of his wicked plans.

During this year (1280) died the celebrated Albert the Great, of the order of Preaching Friars, less known as a monk than a magician. The prodigious diversity of his learning, and the taste which he had for experiments in alchemy, which he himself called magical operations, caused a superhuman power to be attributed to him. Thus, in addition to the automaton which St. Thomas de Aquinas his disciple broke with a club, and which was his work, it is affirmed that Albert entertained William, count of Holland, at a miraculous banquet in the garden of his cloister; and that, though it was in the depth of winter, the trees appeared as in spring, covered with flowers and leaves, which vanished, as if by enchantment, after the repast. The number of his writings assures to him the title of the most fruitful of the ancient polygraphists. His works form twenty-one folio volumes; the first contains his commentary on the logic of Aristotle; the second, fifth, and sixth, notes upon physics; the third and fourth, dissertation on metaphysics, morals and politics; five volumes contain commentaries upon the scriptures—one his sermons, and the others a commentary on the pretended miracles of St. Dennis.

MARTIN THE FOURTH, THE ONE HUNDRED AND NINETY-FOURTH POPE.

[A. D. 1280.]

Divisions among the cardinals in regard to the election of a pope—Revolt at Viterba—Exaltation of Simon de Brie—Viterba is placed under interdict—Martin the Fourth is made senator of Rome—Michael Paleologus is excommunicated—The Sicilian Vespers—The pope deposes the king of Arragon—Martin bestows the crown of Arragon on the Count de Valois—check on the holy father—Sicilian affairs—Death of the pope.

THE same thing happened after the death of Nicholas, as had occurred after the preceding reign. The cardinals assembled at Viterba to choose a new chief for the church. Not being able to agree, the Holy See remained vacant for six months. Charles of Anjou availed himself of this conflict of ambition, to assure himself of a protector in the new pope, by contributing to his election; for this purpose he went to Viterba, and took a part in all the intrigues. The cardinals were then divided into two factions. The one—that of the Ursini, had at its head the cardinals Mathew Rosso and Jourdain, relatives of the deceased pope. The other was sustained by the king of Sicily, and managed by Richard Annibaldi, whose family was one of the most powerful in Rome.

During the vacancy of the Holy See, Annibaldi endeavoured to take the government of Viterba from Orso of the Ursini, which so exasperated the cardinals of that family that they thwarted all the elections for the purpose of tiring out their colleagues, and causing them to restore the government of the city to Orso. Charles, finally, seeing that it was impossible to arrive at a conclusion whilst his enemies were at large, caused the tocsin of alarm to be sounded, assembled the citizens, and besieged the palace in which the conclave was held. The two cardinals of the Ursini were taken out of their chairs and confined in an apartment of which the doors and windows were walled up, so that there was only left a small opening through which to pass to them bread and water. This step succeeded perfectly; for three days afterwards the other cardinals of the same faction asked for a new conclave, and chose Simon de Brie, a cardinal priest, for pontiff.

The new pope was born at Mount Pincé, in Brie. As he had dwelt for a long time at Tours with the rank of a canon and treasurer of the cathedral of St. Martin, some Italian authors have supposed him to have been a native of that city. Urban the Fourth, one of his predecessors, a Frenchman also, had raised him to the cardinalate, in 1261, and had entrusted him with several legations in his own country. It is affirmed that he was not only not desirous of the pontificate, but that he even refused to put on the insignia of his new dignity. He however gave way at length by yielding to the urgency of the faction of King Charles, and was enthroned by the name of Martin the Fourth.

On the day succeeding his election, Viterba was placed under interdict, and its inhabitants excommunicated, for having committed violence to the two cardinals, Mathew and Jourdain des Ursini. He set these prelates at liberty, after which he retired to Orvietto, not being able to enter Rome, which was still divided between the factions of the Annibaldi and Ursini. To put an end to these disputes, and especially to facilitate his return to the holy city, Martin instructed two cardinals—Hatin, bishop of Ostia, and Godfrey, a deacon of the order of St. George of the Veil of Gold—to threaten the two factions with ecclesiastical thunders, and to order the citizens to confer on him the government of Rome, with the title of senator. This was done, as the following act attests:—"On Monday, the 10th of March, in the year 1281, the Roman people having assembled as usual, at the ringing of the bells, the noble lords, Peter de Conte and Gentil des Ursini, senators and electors appointed by the people, considering the virtues of our holy father, pope Martin the Fourth, and his affection for the city of Rome, hoping that by his wisdom he will be enabled to re-establish order and peace among us, we have granted to him the government of the senate and the city, as well as the territories of Rome. We also grant him full authority to exercise this government in person or by deputies; to institute one or more senators, and for such time and with such salary as he shall please. He shall also dispose of the revenues of the city or the community of the Roman people. He shall be permitted to restrain rebels and factious persons, by all the means which he shall judge suitable. The present act, however, shall neither diminish nor augment the rights of the people, nor of the Roman church, in regard to the election of senators after the death of pope Martin."

This decree is an irrefutable proof that the pontiffs did not regard themselves, at that period, as the sovereigns of Rome; since Martin solicited from the citizens a regular election, in order to have the right to govern them.

As soon as the holy father had taken possession of the palace of the Lateran, he was occupied in fulfilling the engagements he had entered into with Charles of Anjou in regard to Sicily and Greece. The ambassador of Michael Paleologus having come to Rome to renew the oath of obedience to the Holy See, and to compliment Martin on his election, he refused to receive them, and sent to them this sentence of excommunication, which he fulminated against their masters:—"We declare Michael Paleologus, who is called emperor of the Greeks, anathematised; and we prohibit kings, princes, lords, and other men of any condition, from associating or confederating with him, and from giving him aid and counsel, under penalty of being also excommunicated and placed under interdict."

Michael, indignant at the conduct of the pope, and comprehending that the intentions of the Holy See were to take the empire of the East from him, and confer it on Philip, the son-in-law of Charles of Anjou, immediately took steps to ward off the blow which threatened him. Through his means, emissaries traversed Sicily, organised conspiracies, renewed the old intrigues with the partizans of Nicholas so well, that from one extremity of the kingdom to the other all the cities and villages became active juntas, which only waited the signal to move. The soul of the conspiracy was Procida, a noble citizen of Salerno, proscribed since the time of Manfred. At length arrived the terrible day,—a day ever memorable,—the day of the Sicilian Vespers.

Let Mezerai describe this bloody catastrophe:—"John, the lord of the isle of Procida, had been despoiled of his property by Charles, and been banished from Sicily; which excited in him such resentment, that he formed the design of introducing the king of Arragon, as the heir of the house of Suabia, into Sicily. He found himself seconded in his plans by Nicholas the Third, who never pardoned Charles for refusing one of his daughters to one of his nephews. These two implacable enemies of the French introduced Michael Paleologus and Peter of Arragon into this league; and, in order to succeed the more easily in overthrowing the power of Charles of Anjou, they organised an infernal conspiracy in every city of Sicily. The gold which was scattered lavishly by the Holy See bought up all consciences, and they only waited this signal to commence the massacre, when Nicholas died.

"Martin the Fourth, his successor, mounted the Holy See with very different sentiments, and declared himself to be the protector of Charles; but the plans of the conspirators were not on that account abandoned,—their execution was only suspended. John of Procida, disguised as a monk, went to Constantinople, informed Michael that he was about to be excommunicated, and determined him to send his emissaries into Sicily. The prince gave him three hundred thousand ounces of gold for Peter of Arragon, with authority to levy troops in his kingdom, in order to hasten the execution of their plans. The indefatigable Procida immediately started, traversed the Mediterranean, and rejoined Peter at Barcelona, where he was with his fleet, ready to set sail, under the pretext of making war on the Saracens, without exciting the suspicions of Charles of Anjou. Peter had even the address, the better to dissimulate his plans, to borrow twenty thousand crowns of gold from Charles, and a like sum from the king of France. His numerous galleys in fact sailed towards Tunis, to favour the concerted enterprise, whilst John of Procida disembarked at Palermo with a troop of bold adventurers.

"As for Charles, fascinated by a kind of fatality, he neglected the secret information which was given him in regard to this conspiracy, and dreamed of nothing but the conquest of Constantinople. His preparations being made, he wished himself to command his fleet, and besiege Michael Paleologus in his capital. Unfortunately, his army was defeated by the Greeks, and he was constrained to return to Naples.

"This news soon reached Sicily, and increased the boldness of the conspirators. On Easter day, the 30th of March, 1282, at the hour of vespers, at the first sound of the bells, the Sicilians rushed upon the French, massacred them in the streets, the houses, and even at the foot of the altar. Women also played their part in this butchery. Fathers were even seen to disembowel their daughters—to tear from them the fruits of their adulteries with the French. In fine, in less than two hours, eight thousand victims were massacred." Such were the frightful consequences of the pride of a prince, and the vindictiveness of a pope.

Charles of Anjou having escaped the general massacre, went at once to Rome to demand justice against Michael Paleologus and Peter of Arragon, of whose arrival at Palermo he had been apprised; and especially against the revolted Sicilians. Martin renewed the sentence of excommunication against the Greek emperor, and sent Gerard Branchi, of Parma, with the rank of legate, to threaten the Sicilian cities with the thunders of the church, if they persisted in their rebellion. That done, Charles came with the remains of his fleet to besiege Messina. That city offered to capitulate, in order to shun the horrors of a siege; and its example would without doubt have drawn in the other cities, if the implacable tyrant had been willing to receive the inhabitants to mercy; but he followed the counsels of his mortified pride, and replied to the envoys—that he had sworn to take a brilliant vengeance on Messina, and to inflict on all Sicily such a punishment that none of its cities would ever afterwards dare to revolt.

As the Sicilians knew what was the vengeance of a king, they thought no longer of any thing but defence. Despair doubled their strength, and they held the troops of Charles in check for a whole month. On his side, Peter of Arragon was occupied with assembling his partizans in the middle of the island; but discovering that it would be impossible for him to maintain a war against the French, who were every day receiving by sea fresh troops sent by Philip the Hardy, he hit upon this singular ruse to disband the hostile forces. He sent heralds to Charles, to offer him to terminate their quarrel by a duel, in which they should each be assisted by an hundred chosen champions. Charles, imprudent and presumptuous, accepted the challenge, in opposition to the reiterated counsel and prohibitions of the pontiff. The day of meeting was fixed for the 1st of July, 1283, and the city of Bordeaux, which belonged to the king of England, Edward the First, was chosen as the field of battle. The French immediately raised the siege of Messina, and Charles granted a truce to the Sicilians until after the issue of his combat with Peter.

Pope Martin, more clear sighted than the prince, had divined the policy of the king of Arragon; he, therefore, employed all his efforts to ruin his party. He not only excommunicated him, but even degraded him from the princely dignity, and gave all his estates to one of the sons of the king of France by a bull thus conceived: "Philip the Hardy shall designate one of his sons, on whom our legate shall confer the kingdom of Arragon, to take possession of it, and enjoy it fully, to him and his descendants for ever, on condition, however, that they shall recognise themselves as vassals of the pope, and shall pay us yearly five hundred small tournois of gold as quit rent."

Peter of Arragon treated the ecclesiastical censures with open contempt; the lords, magistrates, bishops, clergy, and even the monks of his kingdom imitated his example. At last the day fixed for the combat arrived. Charles went to the plain of Bordeaux, followed by a hundred chosen knights of his nobility. He entered the field, and remained there from the rising to the setting of the sun. "The Arragonese," says Mezerai, "did not care to appear, but at dusk he presented himself, when the field was clear. He went to the residence of the seneschal of Bordeaux, caused this magistrate to give a writing stating his presence in the enclosed field, and left his arms with him as a testimony thereof; he then retired in great haste, alleging that he feared some surprise by King Philip of France."

Charles of Anjou, mortified at having been tricked by his enemy in the face of Europe, immediately wrote to Martin to second him in his plans of vengeance. The holy father, who had already exhausted all his spiritual censures against Peter of Arragon, declared uncompromising war, and then preached a crusade against him. His emissaries traversed Italy, France, and Germany, and promised plenary indulgences to all who should take up the cross against the king of Arragon.

Philip the Hardy, who had accepted the donation which the holy father had made him of the kingdom of Arragon, and of Valencia, as well as of the countship of Barcelona, for Charles of Valois, his second son, took the cross with several lords, and made great preparations for war. But, in the interval, Peter had improved his affairs prodigiously. Lauria, his admiral, having laid siege to Naples, had drawn into an ambuscade the son of the king of Sicily, Charles the Second, surnamed the Hobbler, and having cut the French to pieces, had seized upon the prince, whom he had carried a prisoner to Palermo, to be judged there. Constance of Arragon, fortunately, arrived in time to prevent the Sicilians from putting him to death; she carried him off from Messina during the night, and sent him, well guarded, to her husband.

Charles of Anjou, ignorant of these events, arrived with a numerous and well armed fleet, determined to accomplish his plans of vengeance. When he was informed of the defeat of his troops, and the captivity of his son, his anger was so violent that he fell, as if struck down by a thunderbolt. The care bestowed on him recalled him to life, but succeeding attacks of epilepsy carried him to the tomb in a few months. Such were, for this prince, the deplorable results of his usurpation of the crown of Sicily, and of the hatred of Nicholas the Third.

This melancholy end of the king of Sicily sensibly affected the holy father, who saw himself deprived of a powerful protector; he sought, however, by new intrigues, to preserve the crown for Charles the Second. He thus wrote to the legate Gerard:—"We received from the deceased king, letters patent to govern his states, until his son shall be able to take possession of them. We; therefore, order you to take all steps which you may approve, to exterminate the rebels and re-establish order in the provinces which have rebelled against their legitimate sovereign." Martin had not time to put his plans in execution; on Easter day, the 25th of March, 1285, after having celebrated mass and taken his first repast, with his chaplains, he fainted. The physicians pronounced his sickness trifling; but notwithstanding this decision of the men of art, he died at the end of three days. He was interred in the church of St. Lawrence, of Perouse.

HONORIUS THE FOURTH, THE ONE HUNDRED AND NINETY-FIFTH POPE.

[A. D. 1285.]

Election of Honorius—He continues the policy of his predecessor—Shameful conduct of the croises in Catalonia—Absolution of the inhabitants of Viterba—Constitution granted by the pope to the states of Sicily—He protects the Count of Valois, declared king of Arragon by Martin the Fourth—Excommunication of the republic of Venice—Treaty of Charles the Lame disapproved of by the pontiff—His death.

SOME days after the death of Martin, the cardinals chose a cardinal deacon, named James Savelli, to replace him, who was enthroned by the name of Honorius the Fourth. The new pope, descended from a noble family of Rome, had studied in the university of Paris, and had then been received as a canon at Chalons-sur-Marne, and had, finally, been made a cardinal by Urban the Fourth. He was, as a consequence of his debaucheries, subject to the gout in his feet and hands, and this malady had attacked him so severely that he could only celebrate mass by the aid of instruments most ingeniously made. After his election he went to Rome, and was consecrated and crowned on the following Sunday. On the next day he received the ambassadors of Rudolph of Hapsburg, who came to complain that pope Martin had ordered his legates to levy a dime on the dioceses of Treves, Verdun and Basle, which were dependencies of the empire, to defray the expense of a crusade against the kingdom of Arragon. They claimed that this demand should be revoked, as the cause was one to which they were entirely indifferent. Honorius was unwilling to admit their reasoning, pretending that as this war was made by the Holy See against an enemy of the church, all the allies of Rome should bear the expense of it. The dime continued to be levied, and in the following spring the French army commenced its operations in Catalonia.

Wherever they went, the crusaders committed frightful ravages. The country was devastated, cities were abandoned to pillage, the citizens massacred even in the sanctuaries where they had taken refuge, and virgins violated even on the steps of the altar. All the convents of Catalonia, for males or females, were burned. The sacred vessels, the crosses, the holy pyxes—profaned in scenes of luxury—even the very bells of the churches were broken up and the pieces divided among the soldiery. These madmen were called the avengers of God! And the priests, to exalt their fanaticism, collected stones, and casting them at their victims, exclaimed to the soldiers: "In the name of the pope slay these infamous Arragonese, if you wish to gain heaven."

Exasperated by so many evils, the Spaniards in turn flew to arms, fell upon the French, and made a general massacre of them. The crusade found itself naturally terminated from want of combatants, and Philip was obliged to renounce the hope of giving the throne of Arragon to his son. Honorius also gave himself no anxiety about it. He was otherwise employed—in selling to the city of Viterba absolution from the anathemas which it had incurred during the reign of his predecessor. He made, as the first condition, that the inhabitants should throw down their walls; that they should pay a thousand marks of gold, and build, at their own expense, an hospital dependent on that of the Holy Spirit at Rome. He also deprived them of all jurisdiction, and reserved the right of proceeding as he judged proper, against the citizens who were accused of sedition. The holy father also published a constitution for Sicily, and suppressed several abuses which had been introduced into the exercise of government under Charles of Anjou. He lanced, at the same time, a bull against the partizans of the king of Arragon, who refused to submit to Charles the Lame. A few days after these events, Peter of Arragon died, leaving the crown of Sicily to James, his second son, who was immediately crowned king, at Palermo.

This young prince had been, with his mother, Queen Constance, already excommunicated by Honorius. When the holy father was apprised of his consecration, he excommunicated him a second time, and placed all the cities which acknowledged his authority under interdict. Then, availing himself of the division which existed in the family of Peter of Arragon, on account of his will, which conferred his states of Spain on his eldest son, and those of Sicily on James, he endeavoured to excite a war between the two brothers, and demanded the freedom of Charles the Lame.

Alphonso of Arragon dared not openly resist the pope, from fear of a new crusade; he temporised, and sent ambassadors to him, who promised, in his name, to do justice to the claims of the church, as soon as he had reduced his kingdom to order. Honorius, too skilful not to see the end of these steps of his enemies, imperiously demanded the freedom of Charles the Second, and a solemn engagement that Alphonso would take up arms against James, under penalty of incurring the same censures as his brother. This declaration broke off the negotiations. The ambassadors at once quitted Rome, and the pope wrote to his legate, the cardinal John Cholet to suspend from their functions all ecclesiastics who favoured Alphonso of Arragon, or who refused to excommunicate him in their dioceses.

Whilst the pope was struggling energetically for Charles, the latter was soliciting Edward of England to negotiate a peace between him and Alphonso, offering to abandon all Sicily, and the archbishopric of Reggio, as the price of his liberty. He engaged, besides, to have the treaty approved by the pope, and to obtain from the court of Rome a revocation of the censures pronounced against the deceased king, the queen Constance, and the two princes Alphonso and James. The outline of this treaty was immediately sent to the pontiff, who rejected it as derogatory to the rights of the Roman church. He even prohibited Charles from entering into any engagement with his enemies, under penalty of being included in their excommunication.

Honorius then employed himself in raising the censure of interdiction pronounced against the city of Venice during the pontificate of Martin, by the legate Bernard, bishop of Porto, on account of its refusal to arm a fleet against the revolted Sicilians. The envoy of the holy father maintained, that the fact alone of the repugnance of the Venetians to succour Charles of Anjou, was enough to render them partakers in the anathemas incurred by the rebels. He had in consequence excommunicated them, and placed their city under interdiction, which had lasted until the death of Martin. They then decided to send ambassadors to the new pope, to represent to him that they had never been wanting in submission to the Holy See, and that their refusal having been dictated by simple considerations of equity, they besought him no longer to maintain the anathema fulminated against them. Honorius listened to their request, and permitted the bishop of Venice to raise the interdiction, on the condition that the inhabitants should not hereafter take any part in the affairs of Sicily to the detriment of the Roman church or the heirs of King Charles.

This order was no sooner given than the pope revoked it, on receipt of the news that the doge had proceeded with rigour against the citizens who had enrolled themselves to succour the French, without the permission of the council of ten. He immediately wrote a new letter to the bishop, and prohibited him from raising the interdiction, until the chief of the republic had abandoned the prosecutions against those who had obeyed his legate. The doge and the ten did as the pope ordered, and sent as deputies to him two Preaching Friars and two Minor Brothers, to testify their submission to the Roman church; and at length the interdiction which hung over Venice was raised by the bishop.

This was Honorius's last act of authority. He died on the 3d of April, 1287, from a frightful malady brought on by his debauchery. His remains were exposed in the palace which he had built near the church of St. Sabine at Rome. He was interred in St. Peter's.

The Jews were at this period the object of execration among the people of Germany and France, without any one being able to explain the cause of this universal hatred. They were accused of murdering children during the holy week, for the purpose of using their blood in magical operations. Different chroniclers have repeated to us these atrocious accusations, and have transmitted to us the history of young girls or boys hung or crucified. The most remarkable of these legends is that of young Verner, killed at Vesel in 1287.

The Bollandists give the following version of it:—"Verner was a lad of fourteen years of age, who was born in the village, and accustomed to labour with his hands for his support. He lived at Vesel, and was labouring for a Jew. When the holy week arrived, his hostess said to him, 'Take care of the Jews, Verner, on holy Friday: they will eat thee.' He replied, 'I trust in God, and have no fear.' On Thursday, however, of the holy week, he confessed and communed before commencing his work; but he had scarcely commenced his work, when the Jews cast themselves upon him, gagged him to stifle his cries, and then suspended him to a post, head downwards, to make him disgorge the host which he had eaten—after which, they murdered him with their poignards, opened all the veins in his body, and pressed them, to extract from them every drop of blood."

NICHOLAS THE FOURTH, THE ONE HUNDRED AND NINETY-SIXTH POPE.

[A. D. 1288.]

Death of seven cardinals—Election of Pope Nicholas—His history before his pontificate—He continues the policy of his predecessor—Conversion of the Tartars—Charles the Lame is set at liberty—He is crowned king of Sicily—The infidels conquer the Holy Land—Nicholas claims the kingdom of Hungary for his see—Death of the holy father—Vices of the ecclesiastics of the thirteenth century.

AFTER the death of Honorius, that pope whom Probus, the bishop of Toul, called the trap of anti-christ, the cardinals assembled in a new palace which he had built. But, as the walls of this building were still damp, the heat of the summer produced from them a pestilential miasma which carried off seven members of the sacred college. The other prelates quitted Rome with precipitation, leaving the cardinal Jerome d'Ascoli alone in this palace, during the nine months that the vacancy in the Holy See lasted. At the end of the following winter, the cardinals assembled a second time in conclave; and, on the first ballot, chose for pope that same Jerome, who was bishop of Palestrina. He was submitted to the ordinary ceremonies, and crowned on the 23d of February, 1288, by the name of Nicholas the Fourth. According to Ciacconius, the new pontiff was originally from Ascoli, a city of the March of Ancona, and his parents were honest and laborious artizans.

Having entered the order of Minor Brothers when very young, Jerome distinguished himself by his application to study, and reached the grade of doctor of theology. St. Bonaventure, then the general of the order, made him provincial of Dalmatia, from whence he was sent as nuncio to Constantinople, by Gregory the Tenth. In the interval, the post of general of his order having become vacant, he was promoted to this high dignity in a chapter held at Lyons, in 1274; he was afterwards sent as legate to France. Pope Nicholas the Third, in gratitude for his services, made him a cardinal, and in his favour augmented the honours which the prelates of France paid the legates of the Holy See. In this matter Jerome evinced great disinterestedness; he refused an increase of his subsidy, and as the pope, in the act of promotion, called him the ci-devant minister-general of the order of the Minor Brothers, he believed himself discharged from the generalship, and refused to retake the functions until after a new order from the court of Rome. At length the pontiff Martin, his predecessor, had conferred on him the bishopric of Palestrina.

Nicholas the Fourth was the first pope of the order of the Minor Brothers. Scarcely was he seated on the throne when his character and habits changed, as if by enchantment. From being generous he became avaricious—from tolerant, fanatical. Before his elevation he had exhibited great attachment to the church—after it he sacrificed even the interests of the Holy See to the aggrandisement of his family; and, what no other priest had ever done before him, he became the protector of the party of the Ghibelines, the avowed enemies of Rome—all this, it is true, secretly, and always showing himself favourably disposed towards the Guelphs and Charles the Lame.

A month after his elevation, the pope created six cardinals, among whom were Peter Colonna, one of his relatives, who was already married. This appointment was the beginning of the greatness of the Colonna family, who we shall see ruled over Italy in the following reigns. Nicholas received this year an embassy from the Khan Argoun, the sovereign of Iran, which announced to him the news, that several Tartar chiefs had embraced Christianity; the prince added in his letter, that it was his most ardent desire to be baptised at Jerusalem, as soon as he had wrenched that city from the infidels. The holy father, justly fearing that this great devotion of the khan for Palestine only covered ambitious views beneath the veil of religion, wrote to him that it was not necessary to defer his conversion until that period, and that he would permit him to receive the remunerating water, before undertaking the conquest of the Holy Land, if his conscience was pure. Argoun did not reply to the pope, and Jerusalem remained in the power of the Musselmens.

Charles the Lame, unable any longer to support the weariness of captivity, resolved to put an end to it at any price and to purchase his freedom. Through Edward of England, he offered to Alphonso, a second time, to surrender to him all his claim on Sicily and the archbishopric of Reggio, and to procure for him a peace with Philip the Handsome and Charles of Valois. He moreover agreed to give three of his sons as hostages, and to return as prisoner to the king of Arragon, if he did not fulfil his engagements in three years.

Alphonso acceded to these proposals, set the prince at liberty, and sent ambassadors to Rome, to justify his past conduct to the pope. A consistory having been assembled to hear them, they argued, at length, that it was not equitable to render their sovereign responsible for the actions of his father; that long before the death of King Peter he had been placed in possession of the kingdom of Arragon; and that it was unjust to wish to despoil him of it; they finished their harangue, by offering to put the states of Alphonso beneath the protection of the pope.

Nicholas replied to them, "We would, my lords, find your master innocent. Unfortunately, however, he himself proves himself to be guilty by persevering in his sin. Do not his troops traverse Sicily? Has he not invaded the territory of the king of Majorca, an ally of the Holy See? Does he not retain in prison Charles the Lame; and does he not continue to govern the kingdom of Arragon in contempt of the excommunication of Pope Martin? And yet, notwithstanding all this, we are ready to pardon your master if he comes and casts himself at our feet to implore our mercy."

When Nicholas was evincing such favourable dispositions towards Alphonso, he still believed Charles the Lame in the prisons of Barcelona: but he had scarcely learned that his protégé had obtained his liberty, when, without even taking cognizance of the treaty which was presented to him, he fell into a frightful rage, and declared that he erased all that had been agreed upon without his authority.

Some months after, the hypocritical Nicholas solemnly crowned Charles the Second king of Sicily, and, in return for his oath of homage, granted him authority to levy tenths upon his estates for three years, to pay the expenses of a war against Alphonso. He annulled all the engagements entered into by that prince, by Charles of Valois, and by Edward of England, as having been exacted against the laws of Christian morality. Finally, he declared Alphonso and James excommunicated and unworthy to wear the crown.

As one disaster is always followed by another, the holy father learned from the bishop of Tripoli of the capture of that city by the infidels, and of the siege of St. Jean d'Acre by an army of Saracens. The prelate had come himself to Rome, so pressing was the danger, to ask for twenty galleys well armed, and furnished with all the munitions necessary to remain at sea for a year on the coast of Syria; a service for which he offered to pay very generously. Nicholas hastened to comply with his demand, and in less than thirty days he had obtained the galleys from Venice. Before, however, placing them at the disposal of the prelate, he exacted from him a large sum of money, and an engagement to divide the command of the fleet with the patriarch of Jerusalem, from whom he counted to extract a new tribute.

As a compensation for this sacrifice, the pope promised to publish a crusade for the purpose of exciting the people of the west to go over into Palestine, which he did faithfully. But the rage for crusaders was beginning to fade away in the west, and notwithstanding the efforts of Nicholas and his legates, no prince would agree to take the cross, and the unfortunate city of St. John d'Acre fell into the power of the Mussulmen. The capture of this city drew in its train the loss of all Palestine to the Christians.

Ladislaus the Third, the cruel king of Hungary, had at length received the punishment of his crimes, and had been assassinated by a brave Pomeranian, in the midst of his courtiers. As he had no heirs, three competitors for his crown appeared. Rudolph of Hapsburg, the most redoubtable of the three, took possession of it as a fief of the empire, and gave it to his son Albert. The pope, furious that Rudolph had seized upon it without his authority, claimed it in his turn for the Roman church, as the heir of all empires, and threatened the prince with ecclesiastical thunders, if he did not immediately restore it to him. A power more redoubtable than his own, death, terrible death, that cruel enemy of the great ones of the earth, did not permit him to put his threats in execution; he died of old age, on the 4th of April, 1292, and was buried in St. Maria Majora.

Nicholas possessed vast information. He loved science and letters, and protected the learned, and even took a very active part in the foundation of the celebrated university of Montpellier. Unfortunately, he had imbibed, in the order of Minor Brothers, that spirit of intolerance which would impose its belief on all the world, and which does not recoil from any mode of conversion.

His memory should be handed down to the execration of men, because he first regularly constituted tribunals of inquisitors, in the cities of Venice and Avignon, to exterminate heretics. He augmented and confirmed the privileges of the Dominicans, who were in possession of these frightful functions; he gave them power to interpret ecclesiastical laws to their fancy; he authorised them to pursue heretics by sword and fire—to take from them their property, and to deprive them of their employments, their honours, and their benefices: and not only them, but even their children, their dependents, their adherents, and those who held employments, honours, or benefices from lords who were excommunicated, or who had obtained them through their influence. He also permitted them to destroy houses which had been used by heretics, as also the adjacent ones; and made a bull by which he enjoined on the lords and magistrates of cities which the inquisitors traversed, to aid them with force; to obey them in all things; to proceed against all regular ecclesiastics, whosoever they might be, notwithstanding their privileges, even though abbots, bishops, and archbishops, were pointed out to them; thus placing their jurisdiction above that of all the authorities, and making them only dependent on the see of Rome.

Following the example of one of his predecessors, Nicholas profaned the tombs of his enemies; he disinterred the dead bodies of John de Beziere, a Cordelier, and of Peter Cassiodore, his disciple, and commanded the executioner to burn them on a scaffold, and cast their ashes to the wind, because these holy monks had preached against him during their life time.

As a close to the history of his reign, we will cite a proclamation which Menard, count of Tyrol, addressed to his subjects when the holy father sought to push them into rebellion. "Give to the bishops your robe, and they will want your mantle," said the prince. "Who can be so stupid, or so cowardly, as to endure, without complaining, the pride, avarice, perfidy, debaucheries, in a word, all the crimes of these wretches? The occupations of the priests are to get bastards, preside over orgies, and invent new modes of extorting money from the people. What! is it not enough for the shepherd to shear his flock—must he also murder it? We have been long enough under the prestige of religious ceremonies. We have been long enough trampled under the feet of the priests. Let us rise and exclaim, 'Death and extermination to these enemies of humanity.'"

VACANCY IN THE HOLY SEE.

[A. D. 1293.]

Divisions among the cardinals—Sedition at Rome—The conclave reassembles at Perouse—Singular election of Peter de Mouron.

AFTER the death of Nicholas, two factions were formed in the sacred college for the election of a pope. That of the Guelphs had at its head the cardinal Mathew Rosso des Ursini, that of the Ghibelines, James Colonna, the avowed enemy of Charles, the king of Sicily. Notwithstanding their mutual hatred, the conclave assembled in the palace of St. Maria Majora. The bishop of Ostia, Latin des Ursini, opened the session in a discourse full of wisdom; but he was not listened to, and ten days afterwards the conclavists separated without having made a pope. During the following month, they reassembled in the palace of St. Sabine on Mount Aventine, to separate a second time: and, finally, after several useless attempts at an arrangement, they retired to their estates.

During their absence, the election of the senators of Rome took place, when a violent sedition broke out. They fought in the streets, pillaged houses, set fire to the palaces of the Guelphs, and some cardinals who were in the holy city, having shown themselves in their sacerdotal robes with a view to put a stop to the disorders, were pelted with stones and driven away in disgrace. After several months of combat and strife, the senators were chosen and quiet was restored; three cardinals returned at once to instal themselves in the palace of the Lateran to choose a pontiff. But as they feared lest their colleagues, who had taken refuge at Viterba, should make a second choice, they wrote to them in these terms: "We can proceed to the election of a pope without your assistance, since you absent yourselves from Rome; we prefer, however, to wait some days in order to form a more regular conclave. Hasten, then, your departure; and reflect that there is urgent need to put an end to the vacancy in the Holy See."

This declaration gave rise to the dread of a schism. For if, on the one hand, the three cardinals who were at Rome had the right to choose a pope on account of the privilege of the place, on the other hand the others might pretend to the same right on account of their numbers. The most skilful lawyers were consulted on the subject, and the result of their deliberations was, that the cardinals all assembled at Perouse, to put an end to the deplorable divisions which had deprived Christendom of a supreme chief for twenty-seven months.

In this new conclave, intrigues recommenced with the same ardour as in the preceding meetings, and threatened to prolong the vacancy in the Holy See—when, fortunately, an incident entirely foreign to the elections suspended the disputes. The brother of the cardinal Napoleon of St. Mark, having been killed by a fall from his horse, that prelate demanded permission to leave the conclave to perform the last duties to his brother. John Bouccamace, bishop of Tusculum, availed himself of this circumstance to recall to the recollection of the members of the sacred college, that death might in its turn strike them down; and that Jesus Christ had appeared to a holy man, named Peter de Mouron, to whom he had revealed, that they would all die in less than four months, if they did not hurry to put an end to the conclave. Under the inspiration of this singular prophecy, one of them proposed Peter de Mouron himself as the pope. This opinion prevailed with the rest, and the pious anchorite was immediately proclaimed chief of the church, by the name of Celestin the Fifth.

CELESTIN THE FIFTH, THE ONE HUNDRED AND NINETY-SEVENTH POPE.

[A. D. 1294.]

History of Peter de Mouron before his pontificate—The cardinals wish to retain him by force in Perouse—Consecration of Celestin—New promotion of cardinals—Arts and tricks of the cardinal Gaëtan to reach the pontificate—Imbecility of Celestin—He abdicates.

PETER DE MOURON was born in 1213, in the diocese of Isernia in the province of Apulia. His father's name was Angelier, his mother's, Mary; they were poor agriculturists and had twelve sons, of whom Peter, who was the eleventh, was the only one who devoted himself to the service of God. From his earliest youth he manifested so decided a love for prayer and meditation, that his mother determined to teach him to read and even to give him some knowledge of the holy scriptures. Having arrived at the age of manhood, Peter retired to an hermitage situated on the side of a mountain near to the chateau of Sangre. Afterwards, not finding this asylum sufficiently solitary, he climbed the summit of the rocks which formed the crest of the mountain, and dug himself out a cell, which was a real burrow; for it was so small that he could scarcely stand upright in it, or stretch himself out to sleep.

He remained three years in this cave, living on the alms of the peasants who came to solicit the aid of his prayers. As very many pious persons interested themselves in having him ordained a priest, he went to Rome, where, notwithstanding his ignorance, he received orders. He was then obliged to abandon his residence, because the cultivators cut down the trees which covered the sides of the mountains. He then retired to another cave, called the cave of Magella, which had a very spacious grotto. He reared an altar in this retreat and inhabited it with several anchorites, his disciples.

Peter de Mouron passed whole weeks in fasting and maceration, which produced ecstatic fevers and reveries of madness, during which he was deprived of the senses of sight and hearing. The brethren around him regarded these ecstasies as revelations, and respected as prophecies the incoherent words which he uttered during these strange hallucinations. Ignorance aiding superstition, the anchorite obtained a great reputation for sanctity throughout all Italy, and numerous pilgrims came to offer up their devotions at the mount of Magella, and to ask a blessing from Peter. The concourse of the visitors became so great, that the brethren decided to employ the presents which were offered them, and solicited from pope Urban the Fourth authority, to found a monastery, and to live as a community under the rule of St. Benedict, which was allowed them.

Peter, far from softening his mode of living, reboulded his austerities, walled up his cell, and only left a wicket which he opened once a day to receive bread and water in small quantities. On Sundays and great festival days the only recreation he allowed himself was to open his wicket a second time to celebrate mass, that the brother who served might say the responses of the service. He slept on the bare ground without straw or hay, and with a stone for his pillow; he wore a girdle of iron chains, and a coat of mail for a shirt. The legend adds, that at length there exhaled from his cell and his body an odour so infected, that no one could approach him without being suffocated. Such was the man whom the cardinals elevated to the papacy.

The election having been regularly made, the cardinals deputed five of their number to go to the convent of Peter de Mouron. Having arrived at Salmona, the ambassadors traversed the mountain by a very rough road, and presented themselves at the cell of the recluse, who opened his wicket to hear them. There they saw, at the bottom of this living tomb, by the light of a smoking lamp, an old man of about seventy-two years—ghastly, attenuated by fasting, with a bristled beard, and eyes inflamed and full of tears. They uncovered themselves before him, and prostrated themselves with their faces to the ground.—After a short prayer they rose, and the archbishop of Lyons, speaking in the name of all, announced to Peter that he had been chosen sovereign pontiff by the will of God, to put an end to the troubles which desolated the church.

At this news, as extraordinary as unexpected, the poor fanatic shed abundant tears, and demanded permission to counsel with himself before replying. He took the decree which conferred on him the papacy, and closed the wicket of his cell. Three hours afterwards he was heard to cry out, "I accept the pontificate." They immediately demolished his prison, and the cardinals kissed his feet. This strange appointment excited general curiosity, and a crowd hastened from all sides to see the new pope. Cardinals, bishops, nobles, princes, and kings, all went to Mont de Mouron. Charles the Lame, and his son, even wished to hold the bridle of the ass on which Peter was mounted, when he went to the city of Aquila.

The new pope, though very ignorant, had a simple and good soul; he, however, evinced an extreme distrust of the cardinals and secular clergy, and only bestowed his confidence on King Charles and some lawyers, for whom he had conceived great affection. He even chose a layman for his secretary, to the great scandal of the priests, who strongly opposed this innovation, and he appointed the monks of Abruzzo to a great number of ecclesiastical offices, in preference to the Roman priests. He then sent to the cardinals an order to come to the city of Aquila, where he was about to take up his provisional residence, not being able to make the journey to Perouse, during the heat of summer, on account of his infirmities. They, discontented at the step, replied to him, that it was impossible to remove the court without considerable expense; besides, that such a step established a bad precedent: since, if they should even choose a pope in a strange country, this example might be quoted to remove the residence of the pontiff from Rome. They cited to him the example of Pope Martin the Fourth, who preferred captivity to the shame of retiring into Apulia.—"As for your excuse as to the difficulty of the journey in the month of August, with your infirmities, could you not," they added, "be carried twenty leagues in a litter?"

Peter de Mouron did not allow himself to be influenced by their reasoning, and at the instigation of King Charles, he declared to the cardinals, that he had resolved to inhabit the city of Aquila, and to be consecrated there. In fact, he informed Hugh Séguin that he was about to elevate him to the see of Ostia, vacant by the death of cardinal Latin des Ursini, in order to dispose every thing for the ceremony. On the day fixed for the ceremony, he clothed himself in his pontifical ornaments, and caused himself to be crowned with a mitre adorned with gold and precious stones, by cardinal Napoleon; he then seated himself on the pierced chair, and kings, bishops, cardinals, and clergy, took the oath of obedience to him, by kissing his feet. On the next day he celebrated mass, and took the name of Celestin the Fifth. After the ceremony he mounted a platform erected on the steps of the church and gave his blessing to the people.

Celestin was full of sense and modesty. He spoke but little and always in Italian, not understanding Latin. He never advised with his cardinals, whom he called the enemies of the faith and the sores of Christians. A single passage of a synodical letter which he wrote on the day of his installation, is sufficient to apprise us of the humility of his mind, and the charity of his soul.

"For half a century," he wrote to the bishops, "we had renounced all care of the affairs of this world to devote ourselves entirely to God. Hence, on the news of our elevation to the pontificate, we were alarmed at the greatness of this dignity. We bent our forehead in the dust, as weighed down by the charge which Christ had imposed upon us, beseeching that Divine Master to bestow on our intellect the light which he caused to descend upon the apostles, in order to strengthen our heart against the danger of power and honours. After a fervent prayer, we rose up with the resolve to re-establish the practice of evangelical morality in the church by confiding the administration of its temporal affairs to seculars capable of administering them, and the safety of the faithful to prelates truly worthy of being the ministers of a God of peace and charity. We will consecrate all our watchings to accomplish this holy mission; but if our efforts are powerless to destroy the vices of the court of Rome; if, notwithstanding our perseverance and our firmness, we see the impossibility of driving without the sanctuary ambition, avarice, debauchery, and crime, we will cast the mundane crown of the popes beneath our feet and return to our solitude to weep over the misfortunes of the people."

He, in fact, informed himself most scrupulously as to the priests whom the Italian people recognised as truly worthy of veneration. He only found twelve, of whom seven were French and five Italian. He immediately made them cardinals, to the great scandal of the old prelates who composed the court of Nicholas. He renewed the decrees of the conclave published by Gregory the Tenth, and ordered that they should be executed in all their rigour when the Holy See should be vacant from the death of a pope or a renunciation of the pontificate. This prudent step indisposed the members of the sacred college towards Celestin, and their hatred became the more violent when the holy father declared he was about to establish his residence at Naples, the capital of the dominions of Charles the Lame. A conspiracy was formed to hurl him from the throne, and the ambitious cardinal, Benedict Gaëtan, placed himself at the head of the conspirators.

They used the following trick to determine Celestin to abandon the pontificate. Having been informed by a chamberlain that the pope was frequently in the habit of shutting himself up in a secret chapel, to give himself up to fasting and prayer, as he did in his cell at Mont de Mouron, the cardinal caused the wall to be pierced behind the place occupied by the crucifix, and introduced into the opening a speaking trumpet, which communicated with a chamber of the upper story: then, during the silence of the night, when the pontiff had retired to his chapel to pray, he called out to him in a terrible voice: "Celestin! Celestin! cast aside the burden of the papacy—it is a charge beyond thy strength."

As the holy father saw that, notwithstanding his efforts, the disorders of the clergy increased, his imagination, already much weakened, received this warning as an order from heaven, and he promised God to return to his hermitage. He still, however, hesitated; fearful, lest he had been under the prestige of the devil, and not knowing whether it were possible for him canonically to renounce his dignity, and not daring to consult any one on the subject. Several weeks passed in this perplexity of mind. At length one night the voice was heard, more threatening than on the first occasion. Celestin exclaimed in tears: "They maintain, my God, that I have all power in this world over souls; why then cannot I assure the safety of my own, and free myself from the weight of dignity, to gain repose? Do you not know, Lord; that which you demand from me, is impossible; and have you elevated me so high, but to precipitate me into an abyss? In accordance with the maxims of the popes, I can do all, and I am infallible; how is it, that from all sides complaints arise against me? Am I not obliged, myself, to admit the impossibility of preventing the misconduct, debauchery, exactions and divisions of my ecclesiastics? Would it not be better for me to trample the tiara under foot, and avoid this impure Babylon which is called the church—to devote myself as before, entirely to thee, Lord, in an inaccessible solitude? Have you, then, condemned me to bear this cross until my last hour?" Gaëtan replied through his speaking trumpet: "Abdicate the papacy, Celestin: abdicate the papacy."

Five days afterwards, Peter de Mouron sent for some cardinals to his palace; he related to them how he had passed his life in repose, and poverty; how he had been borne from this contemplative life, which had obtained for him the protection of the Lord; and he added, shedding many tears, "My great age, my rustic manners, the simplicity of my language and morals, the ignorance of my mind, and my small experience in ecclesiastical intrigues make me fear lest I shall fall into an abyss. I believe that it is impossible to shun eternal damnation if I remain pope, and I come to ask from you authority to yield this dignity to one more worthy of it than I am." The cardinals feigned a great repugnance to reply, and counselled the pontiff to order public prayers and processions, to obtain from God a manifesto of his will, for the greater good of the church.

The Celestine monks, however, were none the less advised of the design of their founder to abdicate the tiara, of which they spread abroad the news; and placing themselves at the head of the Neapolitans, hastened in crowds to the pontifical palace, and penetrating even to the cell of the holy father, knelt before him, and besought him to preserve the tiara—glorifying him as the only priest who had shown himself worthy to be called the Father of the Faithful since the apostle Peter. The king of Sicily, the bishops, cardinals, lords, monks, and all the clergy came in procession to beseech him not to abdicate.

Celestin felt his resolution waver before so general a demonstration; he kept silence and replied only by his tears to this testimony of the love of his people. He then advanced towards a window, and bestowed his blessing on the crowd which pressed into the courtyard of the palace. Every one hoped that the holy father had abandoned his thought of abdicating; but the mysterious voice of the chapel recommenced its lugubrious warnings, and the holy father determined to obey it. On the day of the festival of St. Luke, he appeared in the consistory of the cardinals, his tiara on his head, and clothed in the scarlet cape. When all the members of the sacred college had taken their places, he rose, and unrolling a paper which he held in his hand, read from it, "I, Celestin, Fifth of the name, declare that it is impossible for me to insure my salvation on the throne of St. Peter. Desiring, then, to lead a better life, and find again the repose and consolation of my past existence, I renounce the sovereign dignity of the church, of which my predecessors have made a trade. I recognise myself as incapable of exercising the pontifical functions: and I now give to the sacred college full and entire power to choose a chief to govern them." One of the cardinals, Mathew Rosso, then represented to the holy father that his abdication would not be regular, unless he gave, beforehand, a constitution expressly providing that the pontiffs might renounce their dignity, and that the cardinals had the right to accept their renunciation. Celestin complied at once with this form, and ordered that this constitution should be inserted in the decretals; he then quitted the session, that he might not influence their deliberations.

Benedict Gaëtan caused the renunciation of the pope to be approved at once. An hour afterwards, the assembly sent to inform Celestin that he was free. The holy father, then again become Peter de Mouron, quitted the pontifical garments, and retook his coat of mail, his iron chain, and his hermit's frock; he made a last prayer before the miraculous crucifix of his chapel, and then went with naked feet towards his retreat on Mont de Mouron. Thus terminated the reign of this pious anchorite.

BONIFACE THE EIGHTH, THE ONE HUNDRED AND NINETY-EIGHTH POPE.

[A. D. 1294.]

The cardinal Gaëtan causes himself to be chosen pope—His history before his pontificate—He establishes his court at Rome—His severity towards the unfortunate Celestin—He causes him to be confined in a horrid dungeon, and starves him to death—Boniface excites universal hatred against himself—He proposes himself as the arbiter of the destinies of kingdoms—Affairs of France—The pope makes terrible threats against Philip the Handsome—Quarrels of the pontiff with the Colonna—He preaches a crusade against his enemies—Philip avenges himself on Boniface—Institution of the Jubilee—Bull of the pope against Philip—The king causes the bull to be burned—The pope claims the kingdom of Poland—He pursues heretics—He excommunicates Philip the Handsome—He recognises Albert, king of the Romans, names Frederick king of Sicily, and declares Charobert king of Hungary—Pursuit of the pope by the king of France—The pope escapes from Rome—He is surprised by the French in the city of Anagni, and struck violently by Sciarra Colonna—The inhabitants of Anagni deliver him—He returns to Rome—His death—His impieties.

AFTER the retirement of Celestin, the cardinals waited ten entire days, before reassembling, so that Benedict Gaëtan had time to finish his measures, and to assure himself of a majority in the sacred college. The conclave having at last formed in the palace of King Charles, the cardinal Gaëtan was chosen sovereign pontiff, by the name of Boniface the Eighth.

Benedict Gaëtan was originally from the city of Anagini, and his father was descended from the illustrious family of the Gaëtan. From his youth, Benedict, destined for the ecclesiastical state, had applied himself to the study of the canon law. When he had obtained the grade of doctor, his parents sent him to Paris, where he was made a canon of the cathedral. He then returned to Rome, where his eloquence, as well as his flexibility of mind, caused him to be distinguished by the pope, who raised him to the grade of consistorial advocate, and pontifical notary. Martin the Fourth made him a cardinal, and Nicholas the Fourth entrusted several important legations to him. Ciaconius thus expresses himself, when speaking of him: "This cardinal had a great depth of iniquity, knavery, audacity, and cruelty, as well as a measureless ambition, and an insatiable avarice." From this portrait we may foresee what will be the misfortunes of his reign.

As soon as Boniface had been proclaimed sovereign pontiff, he left Naples and started for Rome, passing through Anagni, where the inhabitants gave him a magnificent reception, and where he found a deputation of the Roman nobility, who had come to meet him to confer on him the title of senator. Two days afterwards the holy father continued his journey, and entered the holy city amidst an immense concourse of the people. All the streets and public places were strewed with flowers, and it appeared as if all had been seized with a vertigo, on hearing the shouts of joy, and seeing the frenzied dances with which they celebrated the return of the tyrant to Rome. Boniface first went to the church of the Lateran to be seated on the pierced chair—from whence he went to St. Peter's, where he was solemnly consecrated, on the 16th of January, 1295. After the ceremony he mounted a white horse richly caparisoned; Charles, king of Sicily, held one of the reins, and the king of Hungary, his son, the other; they conducted him in this manner to the palace of St. John of the Lateran; then they assisted him to dismount from his horse, and accompanied him to his apartment, and served him at his table as mere waiting men.

On the day succeeding his consecration, he caused the act of abdication by Celestin to be confirmed by the sacred college, and in contempt of all the ecclesiastical rules, which formally prohibit the abdication of pontiffs, he caused all ecclesiastical renunciations made under oath to be valid. These precautions did not appear to him to be sufficient—he even had the cruelty to arrest his unfortunate predecessor.

The Bollandists thus relate this proceeding in the acts of the saints: "Peter de Mouron was torn from his cell by the guards of the pope, and conducted to his enemy. On his way the people ran to him in crowds to receive his blessing; some kissed his feet, others cut off pieces of his robe and plucked the hairs of the ass he rode, to preserve them as precious relics. On his arrival at Rome, he was received by the hypocritical Boniface with great demonstrations of friendship, but on the same evening they confined the unfortunate old man in the castle of Fulmona, giving him orders to confess, that he might prepare to die. Whilst the holy hermit was unveiling the secrets of his soul, the pope was concealed behind a tapestry, and when he had finished his confession, he suddenly appeared before him, reproached him for the impious regrets he had expressed for his abdication, and caused him to be carried immediately to a horrible dungeon. Six knights and thirty soldiers were placed at the outer gate of the castle, to prevent any attempt to rescue him. Not being yet satisfied with this excessive rigour, and fearful of a rising of the people in favour of his victim, Boniface decided to starve him to death. It was announced, some days afterwards, that the holy anchorite, enfeebled by age, had expired whilst in the act of blessing the holy father; but the crime was soon discovered, and it rendered the assassin odious to all Christendom."

We will not narrate the numerous miracles which the legendaries attribute to Peter de Mouron to establish his sanctity; we will only say that Celestin was a good man, and had justly attracted the veneration of the people, by renouncing the trade of pope, as he quaintly called it.

Boniface, being now freed from his competitor, dreamed only of realising the plan which he had long formed of establishing the temporal and spiritual authority of the Holy See over all Christian kingdoms. At first he claimed new donations from the king of Sicily and other princes who were sustained by the court of Rome; he invested James, by his own authority, of the kingdoms of Arragon and Valencia, as if he had been the sole dispenser of thrones; he even disposed, in favour of his partizans, of the islands of Sardinia and Corsica; he ordered the kings of France and England to put an end to their disputes—and, upon their refusal to obey him, he sent a bull containing conditions of a treaty, which he commanded them to observe, under penalty of excommunication. He even essayed to chase out of Sicily Frederick the Second, the sovereign of that country. But his efforts failed before the obstinacy of the Sicilians, who treated his threats with contempt, and defeated his soldiers. He then made use of great means; he lanced his excommunications against the prince, called him a sacrilegious usurper, declared his election null, freed his people from their oath of fidelity, and prohibited Frederick from taking the name of sovereign and interfering with the government. The prince, without being disturbed by the anathemas of the pope, continued to keep the field, and finally gained the decisive victory of Falconara, which assured to him the throne of Sicily, and the conquest of a great part of Calabria.

In the midst of this struggle very important events took place, which, if they did not turn aside entirely the attention of the pontiff, at least suspended his plans on Sicily, and compelled him to combat with Philip the Handsome, to unite all his forces to the confederated troops of the king of England, the count of Flanders, the dukes of Austria and Brabant, and the new sovereign of Germany, Adolphus of Nassau, who had succeeded Rudolph of Hapsburg. The cause, or rather the pretext for this war, was the arbitrary detention of the young daughter of the count of Flanders, whom the king of France had traitorously seized, and whom he refused to restore to her father. Boniface greedily seized on the opportunity of performing an act of political authority in France. He sent a bishop to Philip to summon him to render justice to the count of Flanders, in regard to the liberty of his daughter, and to appear before the sacred college at Rome to be judged there, under penalty of excommunication and deposition.

Philip, surprised and offended, replied to the legate: "Do you not know, lord bishop, that we have to render an account to God alone for the government of our kingdom and subjects? We think it very strange that the pope speaks so loudly in temporal matters. We have no need of the canonical light of the sacred college to judge our vassals; for, thanks be to God, our court is composed of very skilful magistrates. Thank Boniface for his officious care: tell him not to interfere in our kingdom beyond his ecclesiastical jurisdiction, and to be careful how he unites with our enemies."

Without regarding this considerate address, the pope, by a bull addressed to the clergy of France, prohibited them from granting subsidies to laymen, declaring those who paid and those who imposed this tax alike excommunicated. Philip in his turn published two edicts, by which he expressly prohibited all persons, of what quality or nation soever they might be, from transporting gold or silver out of his kingdom in ingots, vessels, jewels, or money; he also prohibited the exportation of provisions, arms, horses, or munitions of war without especial authority.

Boniface immediately wrote to the king that he must retract his ordinances, if he did not wish to incur his anathemas and be deposed from his throne: and as the prince dared not yet come to an open rupture with the pope, he consented to suspend his edicts for some time. Besides, the wary Philip saw that the court of Rome would soon need his aid against the family of the Colonna, who were levying troops to make war on the holy father.

This family was the more powerful that it was numerous, being composed of seven rich and powerful men—the two cardinals James and Peter Colonna, and five brothers of the latter, Otho, Agapet, Stephen, John of St. Vit, and James, called Sciarra Colonna. The holy father well knew the resources of the Ghibelin party, since he had been one himself until the day of his election, when he had changed his banner and his fortune together. Amelot de la Houssaye relates on this subject, that a month after his exaltation, the pope said to an archbishop, during the ceremony of Ash Wednesday: "Recollect, man, that thou art a Ghibelin, and will descend with them into the flames of hell;" and that in place of sprinkling the ashes on his forehead he cast them into his eyes; thus showing how little importance he attached to religious mummeries.

His hatred to the Ghibelins, and principally to the Colonna, arose from the repugnance with which this party had sworn to recognise him as pope. Thus, on a vague suspicion that his enemies thought of deposing him, he hastened to send one of his chamberlains to the cardinal James and his nephew Peter, to summon them to appear immediately before the sacred college to renew their oaths of obedience. The two cardinals, who knew the perfidy of Boniface, judged it prudent not to appear before this assembly, and decided to quit Rome, in order to place their liberty and life beyond the reach of the holy father. He, furious at seeing them beyond his power, immediately accused them of rebellion; and, in a full consistory, fulminated against them a bull of excommunication, declaring them incapable of holding any public charge, ecclesiastical or secular; he placed all their domains under interdict, and ordered the inquisitors to pursue them as heretics. The Colonna having retired to their castle of Longuezza, protested against these proceedings of Boniface, and appealed from his censures to a general council; where they engaged to prove that their enemy had poisoned Celestin the Fifth. Unfortunately, the troops, whom they had levied in foreign countries, could not pass the frontiers; and they were obliged to struggle with their partizans alone, against the multitude of fanatics whom the holy father had assembled.

As, however, the want of money to pay his troops began to be felt, Boniface sought a reconciliation with the court of France. To this end he canonised St. Louis and offered the crown of Germany, which he engaged to take from Adolphus of Nassau, to Philip, for his brother the Count de Valois. Duped by this perfidy, the king of France permitted the agents of the Holy See to carry all the money which they could amass in his kingdom, into Italy. But scarcely was the gold of the French in the treasury of St. Peter, when the pope, changing his language and conduct, favoured the party of Albert of Austria, and crowned him emperor, in contempt of his engagements.

His hatred towards Philip did not stop with this first treason; he incited Edward of England and the count of Flanders to invade France by virtue of the truce which he had granted them: and when the prince, informed of the preparations which the English and Flemings were making for war, complained of them, beseeching the pope to be the arbiter between him and his enemies, Boniface had the boldness to reply to him, that the only counsel he could give him, was to offer his sister Margaret in marriage to Edward, and his daughter Elizabeth to the son of that prince; to place all that he had taken from England at the disposal of the Holy See; to restore to the count of Flanders his young daughter, who had now been a prisoner for two years; and lastly, to embark with all his nobility and a numerous army, to conquer the Holy Land.

This letter was carried to France by the bishop of Durham, the ambassador of King Edward, who read it in full council; the Count d'Artois, who was present, rose indignantly, snatched it from the hands of the English prelate, tore it in pieces, and cast it in the fire. Philip protested against the orders of the pope, and declared, that instead of taking up arms to invade Palestine, he would march on Rome. He, in fact, commenced hostility, by permitting Stephen Colonna, and other members of his family who were flying from the fury of the pope, to enter his kingdom. Then, under pretence that the interdict with which the bull struck the churches of France put an end to all ecclesiastical functions, he seized on the revenues of the clergy, and used them to recruit fresh troops, with which the Count de Valois took the field, and gained a brilliant victory over the Flemings.

Philip, soon after, gained a powerful ally by marrying his sister Blanche to the emperor of Germany. Boniface, as soon as he heard of this alliance, immediately abandoned the party of Albert, and declared to the ambassadors of that prince, at a solemn audience, that the election of their master was null, that he devoted him to the hatred of the people as a homicide, and that he did not recognise him as either king of the Romans or emperor. Then, putting on a gilded cuirass and covering himself with a casque, he poised a sword above his head, exclaiming:—"There is no other Cæsar, nor king nor emperor, than I, the sovereign pontiff and successor of the apostles." He, after this, appeared in the great ceremonials, sometimes in the costume of the pope, sometimes in the imperial ornaments.

This year, the last of the thirteenth century, offered a very favourable opportunity to Boniface to extort money from the people, and to avail himself of the general superstition, which, since the commencement of civilization, attributed a remunerating virtue to the secular year. He instituted the jubilee, a kind of pilgrimage which was to take place at the close of the century, and for which he granted plenary indulgences to the fanatics who came to visit the tomb of the apostle and make offerings on it.

John Villani, the Florentine historian, relates, that during the year 1300, more than two hundred thousand pilgrims to Rome were counted. "I can bear witness to it," adds he, "since I dwelt in that city. By day and by night, there were two clerks at the altar of St. Paul, with rakes in their hands, to rake up the gold which the faithful unceasingly threw down there. Boniface amassed an immense treasure from these donations, and the Romans were enriched by selling their wares, at excessive prices, to the simple people who came to obtain indulgences and empty their purses." This institution was but a transformation of the secular games of the pagans. Moses, in his law, had established an analagous ceremony, which was renewed every fifty years. During this ceremony debts were remitted, each one regained the heritage of his fathers, and slaves were set at liberty. Thus the popes have not even the merit of inventing this festival, which is of early origin; they only denaturalised it, to transform it into an ignoble speculation.

Philip the Handsome, who was, like his father, under the sway of the French clergy, determined to undertake an expedition to the Holy Land; but he wished to put an end to every cause of misunderstanding, previous to his departure, between the pope and himself, and sent William of Nogaret, as his ambassador to the pope, to treat of the conditions of peace. Boniface received the diplomatist very badly, and permitted insulting remarks towards the king to be made in his presence. Nogaret replied to him with the firmness becoming the representative of a great nation, and exposed to him the dangers to which he was exposing the Roman church by declaring himself the enemy of France. The pope, finally, discovered that the system of intimidation and violence which had succeeded with the Colonna, would be attended with very serious results, if attempted with the king of France. Making use of dissimulation, he pretended that the eloquence of Nogaret had led him to pacific sentiments, and persuaded the ambassador to write to Philip that there was nothing now to retard his departure for the Holy Land, as he accepted his proposals. He besought him, at the same time, to send the Count de Valois into Italy, at the head of his army, under the pretence of pacifying the troubles of that country—but, in reality, that France should be entirely freed from troops, and unable to oppose the guilty manœuvres of his policy.

When he supposed the moment favourable, Boniface sent to the court of Philip as his legate, Bernard Saisetti, bishop of Parma, a violent and proud man. This worthy ambassador of the pope spoke so insolently to the king that he drove him from his presence, and prohibited him from reappearing at court under penalty of being treated as guilty of lèse majesty. Bernard, forced to obey, immediately advised the holy father of the affront which had been offered him, and started for Languedoc, for the purpose of exciting, on his journey, the populace of the south against the royal authority, by preaching against Philip and promising indulgences and recompense to whoever would assassinate him.

This demoniac was arrested by the metropolitan of Narbonne and sent to the king, who immediately sent Peter Flotte to Rome, to inform the pope of the conduct of his legate, and to demand the papal authority to punish him. But instead of complying with this just demand, Boniface became enraged. He replied to the ambassador, that the legate having only obeyed his orders, merited only eulogies for his firmness; and that if a single hair of his head fell, he would take a terrible vengeance. Three days after, the holy father dropped the mask, and published a bull, in which he declared himself to be the absolute sovereign of the kingdom of France, and claimed for himself the power of disposing of dignity, and of secular and ecclesiastical benefices. At the same time he cited all the chiefs of the French clergy to Rome, to justify their conduct. Philip then judged that it was useless to put off matters any longer, and on the 10th of April, 1302, he convened at Paris the nobility, clergy, and third estate in high parliament, before whom he laid his complaints against the pope.

All the members of the assembly declared that they were ready to sacrifice their property and their persons to oppose the criminal enterprises of the head of the church. The ecclesiastics themselves blamed his ambition, and condemned the scandal of his pride. Philip declared, in the presence of the grandees of the court, the peers of the kingdom, and the principal magistrates, "That he disowned his eldest son as the heir of his crown, and all his descendents, if they ever submitted to the Roman pontiffs;" and he addressed the following letter to Boniface: "Know, insolent priest, that we are subject to no one in our temporal affairs, and that your great fatuity must humble itself before us."

Boniface relaxed none of his proud pretensions, in the hope that Charles of Valois, who was still in Italy, would defend him against his brother Philip. But all his efforts to gain over that prince were useless. In vain did he appoint him generalissimo of the armies of the church, with power to make war and peace. In vain did he make him count of Romagna and grand pacificator of Florence. Charles remained faithful to the interests of France, and refused to take up arms against his brother. He even went to Florence, which was then rent by the factions of the Bianchi and Neri, to put an end to those deplorable quarrels. His good intentions were, however, illy understood by the Florentines. The faction of the Neri, believing themselves favoured by him, pursued the Bianchi to extremities. They burned their houses, devastated their domains, murdered their women and children, and committed every where excessive cruelties. The celebrated poet Dante, one of the chiefs of Florence, and a member of the council of ten, who had been sent as a deputy to Rome to negotiate a peace, had his palace demolished, his estate laid waste, and was condemned to perpetual banishment in the city of Ravenna, where he died.

Boniface, finding it impossible to push on Charles of Valois to revolt against his brother, wished, at least, to detain him in Italy, in order to deprive France of the aid of his sword; and he amused him into apparent preparations for war against the king of Sicily, whilst he was intriguing in England, Spain, and Germany, to obtain large sums for the Flemings, who had risen against Philip. The holy father finally assembled a consistory, at which a large number of prelates assisted, who had been convened at Rome to deliberate on the conduct of France towards the Holy See. The bishop of Auxerre was the representative of Philip, and the prelates of Noyon, Constance, and Beziers, appeared in the name of the French clergy.

In his opening discourse Boniface declared, that the dynasty of the Capets was a race of thieves and murderers—that their great power was derived from the Holy See, which had unceasingly augmented their estates at the expense of other lords, by successively legitimatising all their usurpations and by authorising them to levy imposts and dimes upon their subjects. He remarked, that during the reign of Philip Augustus the kings of France had a revenue of but eighteen thousand livres, whilst, under his pontificate the reigning king received forty thousand, by means of the favours and dispensations which had been granted to him. He accused the king of ingratitude, in refusing to submit to his spiritual father; and finally, becoming gradually more animated, he concluded with these words:—"Yes, if the king does not become wiser, I shall chastise him as a scholar, and take his crown from him." He hoped that his prophecy would be realised, as he knew the Flemings were on the eve of a revolt. In fact, they soon heard the news, that the inhabitants of Bruges and Ghent, exasperated against the French, had assembled to the number of twenty thousand, and cut to pieces an army of more than forty thousand men, commanded by the Count d'Artois and the best captains of Philip. This rencounter took place under the walls of Courtray. Twelve thousand gentlemen remained upon the field of battle; and amongst them were the Count d'Artois, Peter Flotte, and a number of distinguished lords. The pope ordered solemn masses to be celebrated in the churches of Rome as a token of his joy, and then renewed to Charles of Valois the offer to place him on the throne of France. The prince indignantly rejected his overtures, and hastened to the court of his brother to repair the disasters of the last campaign.

The king being apprised of the intrigues of the Holy See, resolved to be avenged, and held an assembly in the palace of the Louvre, on the 12th of March, 1303, to hear the complaint which William of Nogaret had to present against the pope. The ambassador thus expressed himself;—"I demand, illustrious lords, that the cardinal Benedict Gaetan, who calls himself pontiff, should be placed on trial as an atheist, a simoniac, an enemy of God and men, incestuous, a robber, a sodomite, and a destroyer of religion. I beseech the king to assemble the estates, to publish an ordinance convening a general council to judge Boniface. I also demand that they proceed without delay to the appointment of a vicar to govern the Roman church; and that the anti-pope be immediately arrested, that he may not oppose the reforms which shall be undertaken for the good of Christendom. Do not forget, great prince," he added, addressing Philip, "that you are compelled by the example of the kings, your predecessors, and by the oath which you have taken to protect the churches of your kingdom, to pursue the cardinal Gaëtan until he shall be made powerless for injury."

The pope, having been informed of the proceedings against him in the conference of the Louvre, immediately wrote to the cardinal Lemoine, his legate, to excommunicate, individually, the king of France, and to depose the ecclesiastics who should be bold enough to administer the sacraments or to celebrate divine service after his prohibition. He sent an order to father Nicholas, a Jacobite, the confessor of Philip, to appear at Rome in three months, to answer before the consistory for the resistance which the king had made to the will of the holy father; he cited, also, all the French bishops to appear before his tribunal for the same cause.

The king, informed of these senseless attempts, caused the archdeacon of Constance, and Nicholas of Benevento, the bearers of the pope's bull, to be arrested; at the same time he published an edict confiscating the property of the ecclesiastics who should go to Rome.

Boniface, who thus found himself at war with the most powerful princes of Europe, discovered but too late the danger to which he had exposed himself by pursuing Philip too far. He, however, endeavoured to contest the matter with him, and, as a preamble, put in use this political axiom: "When you have three enemies, make peace with two, in order to combat the third; then exterminate the two others in succession." He commenced by reconciling himself with Albert of Austria, recognising him as emperor; he no longer called him a rebellious subject and an assassin; he proclaimed him, on the contrary, sole and legitimate emperor of Germany, thus supplying, by all his ecclesiastical power, the irregularity of his first election. Before issuing this bull he exacted the following declaration from Albert:—"I recognise the empire to have been transferred, by the Holy See, from the Greeks to the Germans, in the person of Charlemagne; that the right of choosing the king of the Romans has been delegated by the pope to certain ecclesiastical or secular princes; and, finally, that the sovereigns receive from the chiefs of the church the power of the material sword."

Boniface had demanded a like declaration from Frederick, king of Sicily, and upon his refusal, had excommunicated him and placed his kingdom under interdict. But as Robert, duke of Calabria, the eldest son of Charles the Lame, and Frederick, had been reconciled by signing a treaty which assured to the latter the sovereignty of that island during his life, on condition that he would marry Eleonora, the daughter of Charles of Valois, the pope was obliged to absolve him from the excommunication, and to grant him a dispensation to marry Eleonora. Frederick, however, consented, in order to obtain the investiture, to do liege homage for his kingdom to the holy father, and engaged to pay him an annual tribute of three thousand ounces of gold, and to furnish an hundred armed knights for three months, whenever they should be required; and, finally, declared that he regarded the enemies of the Roman church as his own, and that he would combat them to the death at the first order from the court of Rome.

Boniface also thought of creating for himself alliances in Hungary, and availed himself of the lords of the kingdom having bestowed the crown on Venceslas, the son of the king of Bohemia, without being authorised to do so by him, to declare the election irregular, and to claim the free disposal of the throne. He cited the different pretenders to the royalty of Hungary to Rome, and declared that he would decide in favour of him who offered the greatest advantages to the Holy See. Neither Venceslas nor his son appeared; they merely sent three ambassadors, who declared in the name of these two princes, that they simply came to assist at a synod, and not to plead the cause of the king, who had been chosen by the free will of the Hungarians.

The pope replied insolently to them, that the throne of Hungary was transmitted by order of succession, and not by the voice of election, and that he consequently adjudged it to Queen Mary and her grandson Charobert. Orders were immediately expedited to Nicholas of Treviso, the legate of that kingdom, to put the city of Buda under interdict, and to return to Italy; but the Hungarian priests, regardless of ecclesiastical censures, continued to celebrate divine service and administer the sacraments; nay, further, they even excommunicated the legate and Boniface himself. But the blow was struck and a civil war broke out, which lasted until 1310, when Charobert was universally acknowledged as king of Hungary.

Having thus assured himself of powerful allies, the pope recommenced his strife with Philip; he declared him deprived of the throne, and gave his kingdom to whoever would deliver him up, dead or alive, to the Holy See. The king, on his side, held an assembly of the states-general, in the gardens of the Louvre, to depose the holy father. William of Plessis, Louis, count of St. Paul, and John, count of Dreux, presented themselves before the nobility, clergy, and commons as the accusers of the pope. "They accused him of denying the immortality of the soul, and holding that it perished like the body, and that there was consequently no other life; they affirmed, that he denied the presence of Jesus Christ in the eucharist, and called the host a piece of bad bread to which he paid no respect. They maintained that he preached publicly that the pope, being infallible, could commit incest, robberies, and murders without being criminal, and that it was heresy even to accuse him of having sinned; also, that he openly proclaimed fornication to be one of the most beautiful laws of nature, and that it alone revealed to him the existence of God. This execrable pope, they added, observes neither fasts nor abstinences; he eats flesh at all times and without lawful cause and orders his domestics to do the same; he orders priests to reveal to him the secrets of the confessional, under the pretence that they should unveil to him the crimes of his enemies; he persecutes the Minor and Preaching Brothers, and deprives them of their goods, under the pretext that these monks are hypocritical knaves, who levy extortions on the people,—and thus deserves to be called the robber of robbers. Finally, they produced witnesses, who affirmed, that the pope lived in concubinage with his two nieces, and had several children by both of them."

After, having formally produced these different accusations, Du Plessis formally demanded an appeal to a future council; the king declared himself the appellant; the bishops, abbots, the university of Paris, and all orders in the kingdom, followed this example and demanded the convocation of a general synod. Finally, at Rome itself, ten cardinals approved of the proceedings of France, and adhered to the appeal. Philip then sent deputies to all the courts of Europe, to announce that the council was to be held. Nogaret, his ambassador at Rome, received orders to inform the pope of the decision of the states-general, and to publish it in the cities of Italy. He acquitted himself very happily in his mission, and drew over to the party of his master a great number of lords, magistrates, citizens, and ecclesiastics, who were tired of the tyranny of Boniface. The latter then resolved to quit the holy city, where his enemies were all-powerful: he secretly abandoned the Vatican, and went to dwell at Anagni.

A few days after his arrival there he assembled the cardinals who had followed him, and fulminated a terrible bull against Philip, whom he devoted, with his family and his posterity, to Satan and the execration of men; declaring his kingdom under interdict, freeing his subjects from the oath of fidelity, and giving his estates to the emperor Albert of Austria. In this bull he summoned the Germans, English, and Flemings to take up arms against France, and granted to them plenary indulgences for this war. Without losing time, Nogaret, on his side, acted with activity and remarkable address. Seconded by Sciarra Colonna and John Mouschet, two implacable enemies of the pope, he detached most of the cities adjoining the patrimony of St. Peter from the party of Boniface, and secretly assembled a troop of determined men, with whom he suddenly invested Anagni. His soldiers forced the gates of the city at the break of day on the 7th of September, 1303, and spread themselves through the streets, exclaiming, "Life to the king of France, death to Boniface." They then attacked the palace of Peter de Gaëtan, the nephew of the pope, which they carried at the first assault, and then laid siege to the fortress which the holy father and his cardinals inhabited.

In this extremity, Boniface demanded a truce of some hours, under pretext of determining on what he would do, but in reality to excite a rising of the people in his favour.

They, however, restrained by fear, dared not make the least movement. The holy father then finding the delay which he had asked for about to expire, besought Sciarra Colonna to give him, in writing, the conditions which they demanded as the price of peace. Sciarra replied to his envoy, that if Boniface wished to save his life, he must, above all things, immediately reinstate the family of the Colonna in all their wealth and dignities, and renounce the papacy. These conditions having been reported to Boniface, he exclaimed, "No: I would rather die than cease to be pope."

In consequence, at three hours after noon, the truce having expired, a fresh assault was made by the soldiers, who scaled the walls and rushed into the apartments of the palace, which they pillaged. They found in the treasury so great a quantity of silver, gold, precious stones, and valuable articles, that if we may believe Walsingham, it exceeded the united wealth of all the kings of that period.

Boniface, seeing that he had no means of escape from his enemies, clothed himself in his pontifical ornaments, placed the crown of Constantine on his head, and holding the apostolic keys in one hand and the cross in the other, placed himself on his throne, awaiting with firmness the arrival of his enemies. Nogaret, without being stopped by the majesty of this spectacle, approached him without any respect, and informed him of the proceedings of the states of France, summoning him to appear before a general council to justify his conduct. The pope not having even replied to this first address, Sciarra Colonna advanced in his turn, and demanded of him, if he were willing to renounce the papacy. "No," replied Boniface, "I would rather lose my life; slay me if you dare—I will at least die pope." This would probably have happened but for the interference of Nogaret, for the soldiers had already seized the holy father. He stopped them by a gesture: "No, we will not put to death this infamous priest," he said: "we will drive him in disgrace from this apostolic chair, to which he is more attached than to existence; and it will be the most terrible of chastisements for this proud man to spare his days, that he may pass them in opprobrium and humiliation. Then prepare thyself, dog," said he, turning towards Boniface, "for the general council which is to assemble at Lyons to condemn thee."

This new insult exasperated the holy father; he forgot the part of impassability, which he had played until then, and fell into so violent a fit of rage that they thought him mad. He blasphemed the name of God, abjured Christ, cursed the king of France to his fourth generation, and called Sciarra Colonna the son of a prostitute. The latter could not restrain his indignation; he fell on Boniface, struck him on the face with his iron gauntlet until the blood flew, and would have broken his head if Nogaret had not wrested him from the hands of his enemies. Boniface was carried off wounded, and confided to the custody of Renaud de Suppino, a Florentine captain, who confined him in one of the halls of the palace. His captivity lasted for three days, during which he refused to take any nourishment, fearful lest his enemies should poison him. He only ate four eggs, which were given to him by an old woman.

At length, on the fourth night, the inhabitants of Anagni, excited by the priests, attacked the French so furiously, that they forced them to abandon the pontifical palace, and Nogaret and Colonna barely escaped with some soldiers, leaving the banner of France, which they had planted on the tower of the city, in the hands of their enemies. The pope being freed from the hands of his foes, was carried to the public Place, where, fearful of a return of ill fortune, he declared in the presence of the people, that he pardoned those who had taken up arms against him; that he reinstated the Colonna family in all their possessions and dignities; and that he even pardoned William de Nogaret, the author of all his misfortunes. This hypocritical language gained for him some partizans.

But as soon as he was at Rome, and out of the reach of danger, he dreamed of nothing but vengeance, and passed his days and nights in preparing it. Concealed in the depths of his palace, for the purpose of maturing his machiavelian plans, he passed whole weeks in reflection, without being willing to speak even with the officers of his court. He was heard frequently to exclaim aloud, "Malediction—anathema." This continual irritation at last brought on a violent fever, and the holy father became very ill. In his fits of delirium he accused himself of a prodigious number of crimes, and uttered frightful yells, as if Satan had seized on him. They then remembered this prophecy of Pope Celestin: "Curses on thee, Benedict Gaëtan. Thou hast mounted the throne like a fox, thou wilt reign like a lion, and die like a dog." Boniface, in a paroxysm of madness, gnawed his arms, and died on the 11th of October, 1303. He was buried at St. Peter's, in a chapel which he had built at the entrance of that church.

Dante has placed the soul of this pontiff in the depths of hell, in the hole which Pope Nicholas the Third had occupied before him; and there were, in his time, designs at Rome representing Peter de Mouron, with a dove on his head, figuring the Holy Spirit; behind him came Boniface with a speaking trumpet in his hand, having a fox in his arms, whose claws were fixed in the back of Celestin the Fifth, while he lifted off his tiara with his nose. In the background of the picture, the artist had represented Boniface a second time with the pontifical ornaments, and dragged along by armed men, who struck him in the face with their gauntlets.

The result of all the testimony we can gather is, that this pope was reputed as damned, even by the clergy. John Villani calls him a cruel, ambitious, corrupt, proud, and avaricious priest. He says he possessed great skill in the management of temporal affairs; that he was profoundly versed in the Holy Scriptures, and in the canon and civil law, and reports at length different propositions or axioms of Boniface, which had been transcribed on authentic documents. The following are some of them: "God made me only for good in this world."—"I care no more for another life than for a bean."—"Men have souls like those of beasts; the one are as much immortal as the other."—"The gospel teaches more falsehoods than truths: the delivery of the Virgin is absurd: the incarnation of the Son of God is ridiculous: the dogma of the transubstantiation is a folly."—"The sums of money which the fable of Christ has produced the priests, are incalculable."—"Religions are created by the ambitious to deceive men."—"Ecclesiastics must speak like the people, but they have not the same belief."—"It is no greater sin to abandon one's self to pleasure with a young girl or boy, than to rub one's hands together."—"We must sell in the church all that the simple wish to buy."

As a finishing stroke to this portrait of Boniface, and to show that he put his maxims into practice, we will recount the burlesque adventures of the chapel of our Lady of Loretto, as narrated by the historian Desmarests: "The cardinal, Benedict Gaëtan," he says, "had so skilfully used a speaking trumpet to determine Peter Mouron to abdicate, that when he was chosen pope, he made use of another piece of trickery, to extort money from the faithful. He publicly announced that the angels being at his orders, he would cause them to carry off from Nazareth in Galilee, from the hands of the Mussulmen, the house in which the Virgin Mary had been born, in which she had been married to Joseph, and in which she had conceived through the operation of the Holy Spirit. But eight days had elapsed after this promise, when the holy father ordered the people to go to Dalmatia to see the house which the angels had transported in their arms, and which they had placed on a desert hill called Tersatto—it remained there for three years and seven months.

"As the length of the journey prevented many Christians from carrying their offerings there, the angels, always obedient to Boniface, transported it a second time into the midst of an immense forest, in the territory of Racanati, a dependency on the March of Ancona. After this second prodigy, the priests published the miracles of the holy house; they related that all nature thrilled with joy around the residence of the Virgin; that the winds murmured celestial melodies; that the oaks bent their heads in homage to the mother of God, and that a brilliant light illuminated the forest by night. The people soon hastened from all parts of Italy to see these marvels, and to offer presents to the holy Madonna. Unfortunately, the robbers, who are always so numerous in lower Italy, wished to divide with the Virgin the gifts of the pilgrims; and as the pope did not find his account in this, he ordered his angels to transport the house out of the forest. They deposited it in a field belonging to two brothers who had lost their father the evening before; it became a cause of dispute between them, each of them claiming possession of the lot on which it stood. To produce harmony, the angels carried off this miraculous house a fourth time, and deposited it in the midst of a field, belonging to a holy woman named Loretta. The Virgin Mary was doubtless much pleased with this choice, for from the thirteenth century down to our own times, it has not changed its place—or, what is more probable, the pope did not cause it to perform a fifth journey, because he had brought it near enough to Rome, not to fear the brigands who had the sacrilegious audacity to share, with the Madonna, the offerings of the faithful."

THE FOURTEENTH CENTURY.

BENEDICT THE ELEVENTH, THE ONE HUNDRED AND NINETY-NINTH POPE.

[A. D. 1303.]

Reflections on the history of the church in the fourteenth century—Election of Benedict the Eleventh—The states-general of France beseech Philip to declare the memory of Boniface infamous—Re-establishment of the Colonna—The pope wishes to reform the morals of the clergy—He is poisoned by the cardinals.

ROBERT GALLUS, in his apocalyptic style, says, in speaking of the church in the fourteenth century, "I was in prayer, with my looks towards heaven, when I suddenly perceived in the air a monster clothed in the pontifical cape; it had feet in the form of a sword, and immense hands which it plunged into the east and west, to draw them out full of gold and precious stones. Having approached me, I heard an infernal voice, which exclaimed, 'it is the Roman church!'"

The spirit of humility and charity had, indeed, entirely abandoned the chiefs of the Roman clergy. From the time of Saint Gregory to Gregory the Seventh, they had combatted against the bishops of the East and West, to usurp the supreme power in the church. They had then commenced the same strife against kings, down to the time of Boniface the Eighth, for the purpose of establishing their temporal sway. At length, when they had elevated the chair of St. Peter above all sees and all thrones, when they had united in their grasp the spiritual and temporal swords, they desired to exercise this power to draw to themselves the riches of the whole world. The Inquisition, established by Innocent the Third, had already done marvels in Europe, where its tribunals condemned to the scaffold the faithful, whose wealth excited the covetousness of the court of Rome. But as this mode of extortion, independently of some danger attending it, was not sufficiently expeditious, the popes fell back on the relics, and, following the maxim of Boniface the Eighth, made money out of every thing they could sell. After having exhausted Italy, they settled down on France, where, thanks to the progress of information, the enfranchisement of the Communes, and the emancipation of the serfs, they were assured of finding resources for a long time. Besides, during the whole age in which they held their court at Avignon, it appeared as if virtue had been driven from the kingdom by their presence; so many shameful actions were committed.

After the terrible end of Boniface, the cardinals assembled in conclave, and proclaimed as chief of the church, Nicholas of Treviso, cardinal archbishop of Ostia. The new pontiff was consecrated on the 27th of October, 1303, by the name of Benedict the Eleventh. He was the son of a notary named Boccasio Boccasini; he had studied at Venice, where he had afterwards performed the duties of a teacher. He then entered the order of preaching friars, in which, from his zeal, he had merited to be promoted to the post of sub-prior, prior, provincial, and general of the order. Boniface had elevated him to the cardinalate, and bishopric of Ostia, giving to him the singular recommendation to be less virtuous, if he wished to be loved by the clergy of his diocese.

As soon as his elevation was known in France, Philip sent the lord of Mercœur, Peter de Belle-Perche, a canon of Chartres, and William du Plessis, who united with Nogaret in congratulating the new pope upon his exaltation, and in submitting to him the following request, which the states-general had presented to the king of France:—"To you, most noble prince Philip, our sire, the people of your kingdom beseech you to preserve the franchises and sovereignty of your estates—that is, that you recognise, on earth, no other master of your temporal goods than yourself. They also beseech you to declare in the face of nations, that pope Boniface the Eighth has merited eternal damnation, in proclaiming, by his bulls, that your kingdom belonged to him, and that he could dispose of it at his pleasure."

Benedict, guided by a sentiment of probity and justice, openly blamed the conduct of his predecessor; he freed Philip from all the ecclesiastical censures pronounced against him, and published several bulls against the pope. The pope, however, did not consent to any of these measures, and the cardinals, whose irregularities he wished to repress, became his most ardent enemies, and determined to free themselves from an inconvenient censor. On the day of a grand festival, when the holy father was dining with several of them, a young clergyman presented himself in the dress of a nun of the monastery of Saint Peterville, and offered to Benedict, in the name of the abbess, who was one of his penitents, a silver plate, having on it some freshly culled figs. The pope took two of them, and offered the others to the guests, who refused them, not to deprive his holiness of them. On the same night he was attacked with severe pain in his bowels and with vomiting; his physician perceived that he was poisoned. But it was too late to arrest the evil, and the virtuous Benedict expired on the 6th of July, 1304.

This good pope devoted all his attention to

THE funeral of Benedict the Eleventh being over, the cardinals shut themselves up in conclave at Perouse, to give him a successor. From the first day they were divided into two equally powerful parties. The one was led by Mathew Rosso des Ursini and Francis Gaëtan; the other by Napoleon des Ursini and the cardinal de Prato. The first sought to place on the pontifical throne an Italian cardinal who was favourable to the friends of Boniface; the others opposed their enemies with a French cardinal, who was favourable to Philip and the Ghibelines. In all their divisions they agreed in one matter, which was, not to choose a virtuous priest. "We do not want another beggar," said they, thus designating the unfortunate Benedict. Both parties having decided to make no concessions, they broke up the conclave, and returned to their palaces to resume their habits of debauchery, with their mistresses and minions, without disturbing themselves about the misfortunes of the church, which remained abandoned to the most deplorable anarchy. At last the cardinal de Prato, who had sold himself to the king of France, undertook to reassemble the conclave, and proclaim a pope of the party of Philip. To effect this he proposed an accommodation between the two parties, which was to leave to the Guelphs the right of naming three ultramontane candidates, and to the Ghibelines that of choosing which of them they pleased, as the sovereign pontiff. No one saw the snare; the party of the cardinal Mathew consented readily to name the pretenders to the papacy, and nominated three ultramontanes who were the avowed enemies of the king of France.

Among these three candidates, the one most hostile to Philip was Got, archbishop of Bordeaux. He was the one whom the cardinal Prato determined to bring over to his party and make pope. He sent the king a copy of the agreement among the cardinals, informed him of his plan, and advised him to give a secret rendezvous to the ambitious prelate to propose to him the conditions of the compact. Philip wrote to Bertrand de Got, and designated an abbey situated in the forest of St. Jean d'Angely, as a place of interview. The archbishop went to meet him, very curious to know why the prince wished a conference with him. When the king had presented him the letters in which the cardinal de Prato announced to him that the party of the Ghibelines only awaited his orders to make Got the sovereign pontiff, the latter cast himself at his feet, exclaiming, "Sire, I see now why you wished to render me good for evil, and I submit entirely to you. Command and I am ready to obey. From this moment I forget the past, I renounce my friends, and am ready to sacrifice all my existence for you."

Philip raised him, and having embraced him, said, "Thus, then, it depends on me to make you pope; but I will only do it on the express condition that you reconcile me with the church, that you commune with me and those who have followed my party; that you grant me all the titles of my kingdom for five years, and that you condemn the proceedings and the memory of Boniface; that you entirely reinstate the Colonna in their wealth and dignities; and finally, that you will make cardinals of the ecclesiastics whom I will designate to you. I also reserve an important condition which you must accept without knowing what it is."

The archbishop swore upon the host to comply with all the wishes of the king, and gave him as hostages for the security of his promise, one of his brothers and two of his nephews. A courier was at once sent to the cardinal de Prato, at Perouse, and on the next day, the latter presented himself at the conclave, to proclaim Got sovereign pontiff. The Guelphs immediately thundered forth a Te Deum, in celebration of the victory they had gained, believing that they had elevated to the throne of the apostle the most bitter foe of the king of France.

Bertrand de Got was born at Villandrean, in the diocese of Bordeaux, of an old family. His father was a knight, and his uncle a bishop of Agen. Destined from his earliest infancy to the church, he had studied the canon law, and acquired a profound knowledge of the texts of the sacred writings. Boniface the Eighth, who preferred knaves and immoral men to virtuous priests, having regarded him as worthy of his protection, he had been elevated first to the see of Cominges, and then to the archbishopric of Bordeaux. As soon as he received the decree of his election to the papacy, he left his diocese, traversed in triumph through the cities of the south of France, and went to Montpellier, to receive the oath of liege homage from James of Arragon, who placed his kingdom of Sardinia and Corsica under the protection of the Holy See. He then went to Lyons to be consecrated, and sent orders to the cardinals to cross the mountains to assist at his coronation. He also wrote to the kings of France and England, and several other princes, inviting their presence to add to the splendour of this imposing ceremonial. Mathew Rosse des Ursini, dean of the sacred college, on receiving the imperious orders of the new pontiff, said to the cardinal de Prato, "Your ruse has delivered us into the hands of a Gascon, and you will be the cause of our abandoning for a long time our magnificent palaces."

In conformity, however, with the instructions of the pope, the cardinals went to Lyons, and proceeded to the consecration; the ceremonies took place in the church of St. Just, on the 14th of November, 1305, in the presence of an immense concourse of bishops, archbishops, kings, princes, and lords. Mathew Rosse then placed the imperial crown on his head, and he took the name of Clement the Fifth.

After mass, he returned to his palace, followed by cardinals, nobles, and monks, and an immense escort of people; the kings of France and Arragon led by the bridle a white horse, on which the pope, clothed in his pontifical ornaments and wearing his tiara, was mounted. The procession having arrived at the foot of the hill on which the church of Saint Just is built, the kings yielded their place, by the side of Clement, to Charles of Valois and Louis d'Evreux, the two brothers of Philip. Scarcely had this change been made, when a horrible crash was heard; an old wall, on which a scaffolding had been erected, fell on the train and drew down in its fall all who were on it. The Count de Valois and the king of France were badly wounded; the pontiff himself was thrown from his horse, and in the tumult a large diamond of considerable value was stolen from his tiara. His brother Gaillard de Got was instantly killed, with the duke of Brittany and a large number of lords and priests.

Several cardinals, already discontented with Clement, took occasion of this accident to proclaim openly their intention of returning to Italy; but the pope promptly informed them, that he knew how to constrain them to obey his will, and to inhabit the city in which he pleased to dwell.

Some days afterwards, Clement celebrated his first pontifical mass, and gave a grand entertainment to all his court. As we might suppose, the most delicious meats and wines of France were lavished at it, so that towards the end of the banquet, their heads being exhilarated, they laid aside reserve. An imprudent word brought on a quarrel between the cardinals and the holy father; from words they came to blows, daggers leaped from their sheaths, and one of the brothers of the pope was slain before his eyes. Clement, who had so unfortunately lost two of his brothers, perceived the necessity of reinforcing his party, and created ten French cardinals. He then took off the bulls lanced by Boniface the Eighth against the Colonna, and restored the cardinalate to James and Peter, with power to reach all the dignities of the church, even that of sovereign pontiff.

During his sojourn at Lyons, the pontiff, though much grieved by the death of his brothers, did not forget the interests of his see. He extorted enormous sums from the bishops and abbots of France who came to his court, and when he perceived that a fear of being mulcted prevented the clergy from visiting him, he determined to make a tour through the dioceses; he passed through a great number of cities, and every where carried off treasures from the churches and monasteries; it is related that it took five whole days to carry away from the rich abbey of Cluny, the gold and silver that he found in the cellars of the monks. He compelled Giles, the archbishop of Bourges, to pay so large a fine for not having visited him, that the unfortunate prelate was compelled ever after to live on alms. Not content with his own extortions, on his return to Bordeaux, he sent three legates, Gentil de Montésiore, Nicholas de Fréauville, and Thomas de Jorz, to squeeze the lower clergy of the Gallic church. They imposed such onerous contributions on the priests, and exacted the payment so rigorously, that the latter, in their despair, complained to the monarch.

Philip instructed Milon de Noyers, the marshal of France, to complain to the holy father against his extortioners, and to obtain their recall. But this embassy, instead of arresting the evil, increased it. The pope, fearing lest energetic measures would be taken to shackle his financiering expedition, urged the receipt of the money, and ordered his legates to increase their severity and set all ecclesiastic dignities up at auction. He also resolved to use the tribunals of the inquisition, with which Blanche of Castile and St. Louis had endowed France, so as to avail himself of the decrees of the fourth council of the Lateran, which provided that the property of heretics and their accomplices belonged to the Holy See, without the children or relatives of the condemned being able to claim the least part. As Philip alone could offer any serious opposition, he determined to associate him with him in its benefits, and offered to divide with him the immense wealth of the templars and hospitallers, whom he proposed to attack as heretics.

This infernal project, sprung from the brain of a pope, was worthy of a king. Clement the Fifth and Philip the Fourth soon agreed upon the execution of it. The holy father addressed a letter to the prince on the subject, and gave him a rendezvous at Poitiers, where he remained almost a year, confined to his bed by a grievous malady, produced by his debaucheries with his minions, and the beautiful Countess de Foix, his mistress. This time of inaction was not, however, entirely lost to the pope, for after his interview with the king he was enabled to meditate at his leisure upon the most ready method of exterminating the templars and hospitallers.

Clement adopted the following ruse:—he first caused a new crusade to be preached in Europe and even in Syria; he then sent the following letter to Palestine, to the grand masters of the templars and hospitallers:—"We inform you, my brethren, that we have been urgently solicited by the kings of Arragon and Cyprus for aid for the Holy Land. We order you to come to France as secretly as possible, to deliberate with us. You will also be careful to bring with you large sums to equip a numerous army."

Jacques de Molay, grand master of the templars, obeyed the injunctions of the holy father; but Foulques de Villaret, the grand master of the hospitallers, occupied with the siege of Rhodes, could not quit his army, and thus postponed the ruin of his order. The unfortunate Molay sailed for France, and delivered himself up to his enemies. The pope and Philip had agreed that the knights of the temple should be arrested at the same time, in the different Christian kingdoms, and that they should be handed over to the inquisitors as suspected of heresy; that their property should be seized in the name of the church, and that they should be put to death upon the scaffold, after having been put to the torture to make them avow imaginary crimes.

The execution of this frightful plot was not deferred; the pope informed the kings of Arragon, Castile, and Portugal, of his determination to annihilate the templars, and, on the appointed day, they were all arrested and plunged into the dungeons of the inquisition. The iniquity of the judges was such, that they pardoned a murderer named Squin de Florian, who had been confined with a knight, because he deposed that his companion had revealed to him the crimes and impurities which were committed at the reception of templars. Squin de Florian, the robber and assassin, was received at a public audience by the king and pope, laden with presents, and glorified for his religious zeal. After such an encouragement to informers, thousands of them arose on all sides, and the duty of the inquisitors became easier. They were also sufficiently encouraged by Philip and Clement, who presided over an auto de fe. In Italy, Germany, Spain, and especially France, a prodigious number of scaffolds were erected, which consumed the unfortunate victims of the cupidity of a pope and a king.

These bloody executions having terminated, the two execrable tyrants divided between themselves the riches of the templars. Philip kept the land, and Clement took all the ornaments of gold and silver, and the coined money, which enabled him to reward the infamous panderings of his nephew and the Countess de Foix.

The king of France, though well satisfied with the holy father, had not forgotten the oath which the cardinal Got had taken to him at St. Jean de Angely, to grant him a decree of infamy against the deceased pope, Boniface the Eighth, and demanded the execution of his promise. This resolution of the prince, which threatened the whole pontifical edifice, filled the court of Avignon with alarm; but the cardinal de Prato, whom we have seen so fertile in expedients, promised the pope, if he would give him a thousand ounces of gold, to free him from his embarrassment; the offer was accepted, and he gave the following counsel. "Write to the king, most holy father, that the majority of the sacred college is opposed to the condemnation of Boniface, and that to obtain it you will be obliged to convene a general council. As the prince wishes to give great publicity to this act, he will consent, and you shall fix the place of meeting at Vienne in Dauphiny, a neutral country, and one suitable for the prelates of France, Germany, England, Italy, and Languedoc. The king will agree, and you will thus be out of his kingdom, when it will be easy for you to make such a decision, as shall be most favourable to the interests of the Holy See."

Clement followed his advice, and convened a council at Vienna, under pretext of passing the most readily on the demand of Philip. The latter, a dupe of the trick, and believing the pope in his interests, loaded himself with presents, and came in person to visit him at the city of Avignon, his residence, bringing with him his brother, Charles of Valois, the principal lords of his court, and his most skilful counsellors to consult with Clement on the clause, which he had reserved to inform him of at a suitable time; this clause was no other than the elevation of his brother to the throne of Germany, become vacant by the death of Albert the First. The pontiff, surprised at this demand, at once sent a courier with speed to the German electors, to apprise them of the plans of the court of France, urging them to proclaim, immediately, Henry of Luxemburg as emperor of Germany, which was done to the great disappointment of the king. This precipitate election gave Philip some suspicions, but the pope swore on the host that he knew nothing of it until it had happened, and the prince was imposed on by his hypocrisy.

Since the emperors had been constrained to abandon Italy to the Holy See, the provinces of that magnificent country had been plunged into the most frightful disorders; the greater part of the cities, crushed by petty tyrants, were the theatres of bloody divisions, in which the two parties, Guelphs and Ghibelines, disputed by turns for the supreme power; thus, every where were seen the banished and discontented, awaiting the hour of vengeance; a powerful hand was alone capable of affording a remedy for so many evils. This mission should have belonged to the pope, and Clement the Fifth was strong enough, and rich enough, to levy armies and re-establish order in the provinces of Italy; but he preferred to the good of the people the effeminate life which he led among his concubines and minions, in his splendid palace at Avignon. Being thus unwilling to interrupt the course of his festivals and orgies, he contented himself with lanching some powerless bulls against the tyrants and the factions.

Philip, who had not abandoned his plan of reducing beneath his sway the countries beyond the Alps, evinced great irritation with the pontifical court, for the indifference it affected for the fate of Italy, and for the deception put upon him, in regard to the crown of Germany. As he did not, however, suspect the pope of having participated in this last treason, his wrath was turned against those cardinals who had been the intimate friends of Boniface the Eighth. He sent a formal order to the holy father, to render at once a sentence which should declare Boniface and all his partizans infamous. Clement, urged strongly by the ambassadors of the king, pledged himself to obey, and even commenced the process, by causing to be burned publicly in Avignon the false acts which had been fabricated by some of the friends of the dead pope in his defence. But these preliminaries of condemnation were soon stopped by the cardinals, who introduced soldiers into the city, and threatened Clement to carry him off by force and conduct him to Rome, if he persisted in pursuing the memory of his predecessor. This manifestation of hostility by the clergy, which was a new trick of the holy father's, was represented to the French ambassadors as a very grave event, which might determine the translation of the Holy See to Italy, if the king persisted in his resolution of causing the memory of Boniface to be condemned.

This affair was so skilfully conducted, that Philip desisted from his pursuit, remitting to Clement the charge of finishing the judgment of his predecessor as he found suitable. The holy father then published a bull, in which he revoked the suspensions of the privileges, the censures, excommunications, interdicts, depositions, and, generally, all that had been done, or ordered, by Boniface the Eighth against France, King Philip, the princes, his sons and brothers, against the barons, prelates, and other lords of the kingdom, on account of their denunciations, appeals, demands for a general council, outrages, blasphemies, invasions, robberies, or pillage of the treasures of the church, and, finally, for all that concerned the quarrels of Boniface with the king and his adherents. He abolished all taint of calumny, all note of infamy against the name or reputation of those who had sustained the party of the king in this affair, and he caused the originals of the sentences pronounced by the court of Rome against Philip to be torn from the register of the church and publicly burned.

The bishops, however, were still preparing to come to the general council of Vienna, which the pope feigned to desire most ardently, in order to make some reforms among the clergy, of which the church stood in great need; for bishop William Durandi, in speaking of the court of Avignon, called it the retreat of dragons, the place of resort of satyrs, and the kingdom of demons.

It was soon discovered, that Clement was incapable of forming so good a plan, and that the true and sole end of his holiness in assembling the synod was to extort money from the bishops and other ecclesiastics. When they had assembled, his first employment was to impose an annual rent of a quarter of their revenues; he then proposed to them to examine the conduct of Boniface the Eighth; but when he saw that the fathers of the council, with the exception of the cardinals, were disposed to condemn the memory of that pope, he immediately suspended their deliberations, and presented a decree which declared Boniface to have been a good Catholic and lawful pastor. This strange decision surprised the prelates; no one, however, dared to express an opinion contrary to that of the pontiff and Benedict Gaëtan. The assassin of the virtuous Celestin came forth victorious from this test, and his memory was glorified by this assembly of cowardly and pusillanimous priests. The decision of the council, though covering the perfidy of Clement, did not, however, entirely assure him against the wrath of the king of France, and he hastened to send to him four doctors to justify his conduct, and to represent to him that the Roman church could not condemn one of its chiefs without dishonouring itself.

This demonstrated to the prince with so much skill how impolitic it was to force one pope to proclaim the infamy of another, and to publish to the nations, that the priests who governed them were impure, greedy, despotic, and cruel men, who played on the credulity or weakness of the people to live at their expense in luxury, sloth, and debauchery, that Philip suffered himself to be persuaded, and approved of the conduct of the pontiff; he only demanded, that in order to stop the applications of the states-general, some expedient should be hit on, to justify the innocence of Boniface. This was easy: on the next day the holy father sent to the court of the king two Catalan knights, who demanded a combat with any two of the most valiant of the French nobility who declared themselves the enemies of the deceased pope. At this period of barbarity, such a proceeding was sufficient to convince the people of the innocence of the accused; no one appeared to take up the gauntlet of the champions, and the thing was at an end.

Clement was then occupied with the Begards and Beguins, admirers and followers of Pierre Jean de Olive, as well as with the Dulcinists and Fratricelli, who refused to recognise the authority of the Holy See; he confiscated their property to his own profit, and handed over the unfortunate to the terrible justice of the inquisition. Such were the results of the council of Vienna.

The reforms among the clergy which the pope announced he intended to bring about, one contained in this insignificant decree:—"The clergy are prohibited from pursuing the occupations of butchers or tavern keepers; from appearing in public with striped garments or party coloured ones; from wearing short cloaks, and hose, slashed with red or green."

In the final session it was solemnly announced, that Henry the Seventh, the king of the Romans, Philip the Handsome and his oldest son, and also Edward of England, had promised to go to the Holy Land; he consequently asked, and obtained permission from the fathers, to decree a new crusade, "and without loss of time," says Pasquier, "pope Clement caused it to be preached in France, by a cardinal, who was profoundly versed in the art of deceiving men; and under the appearance of charity, knew how to extort their uttermost farthing from the faithful poor.—For a penny, he granted indulgences for a year; for a double or triple sum the indulgences were increased in a like proportion, and those who gave money enough to equip a man at arms, plenary indulgences, and the power of delivering any souls they chose from purgatory!! Other emissaries traversed different kingdoms of Europe, and levied enormous sums upon the people, which were employed in paying for the compliances of the minions and mistresses of the pope."

Shortly after the termination of the council, Henry the Seventh promised the pope to invade Italy, to reduce it beneath the yoke of the Holy See. When his preparations were completed, he renewed on the Bible, and the consecrated host, his oath to defend the Catholic faith, exterminate heretics, and combat for the rights of the Roman church. He confirmed the old privileges and donations which it had received from Constantine, Charlemagne, Henry, Otho, Frederick, and other emperors of Germany. The pope, on his side, promised solemnly to crown him when he should be the master of the holy city.

Although the prince was thus assisted by the protection of the pope, he was none the less compelled to combat the Genoese, Florentines, Milanese, and other people of Italy, and to fight several battles to make a road to Rome. This invasion of the German troops in the name of the holy father, instead of appeasing the troubles, exasperated their minds; and Clement the Fifth fearing the effect of the hatred he had excited, was afraid to enter Italy; he commissioned five cardinals to proceed in his place to the coronation of the emperor, and sent a bull in which all the pontifical audacity was exhibited to the light of day. "Know, prince, he wrote, that Jesus Christ, the King of kings, having given to his church all the kingdoms upon earth; emperors and kings should serve, on their knees, us, who are the representatives and vicars of God!"

Henry the Seventh, master of Rome, had daily engagements with the troops, which Robert, king of Naples had sent to the aid of the city; and notwithstanding his desire to be crowned in the church of St. Peter, he was compelled to abandon the hope of driving the Neopolitans, who had fortified it, out of it.—The consecration took place in St. John's of the Lateran; the cardinals in accordance with their instructions, demanded an oath of obedience and fidelity from the prince, which was refused. Henry then discovering that he, if he wished to strengthen his authority, he must abandon the party of the pope, which was unpopular in Italy, left Rome and went to Tuscany, to fight the Guelphs.

This impudent manifestation was fatal to the emperor. The implacable Clement, disappointed in his hope of reconquering the Peninsula by his aid, resolved to be avenged; and two months afterwards he died at the monastery of Bonconvento, near Florence, poisoned by a Dominican monk, named Bernard de Moutpulcien, one of the familiars of the inquisition, who had mixed poison with the blood of the Lord, when presenting the communion to him. A general cry of indignation arose against the monks of the order of Saint Dominick, and the people every where demanded the expulsion of these hideous bravos of the court of Avignon. The pope, to arrest this explosion of hatred, apologised publicly for the Dominicans, affirmed on the consecrated host that the prince had died a natural death, and handed over to the inquisition the physicians who maintained that they found traces of poison in his bowels. No one dared now to speak, and it was well and duly proved that Henry the Seventh died by the order of God, who punished him for having refused to take an oath of fidelity to the Holy See.

In the beginning of the following year, Clement anathematised the inhabitants of Modena, Bologna, and Mantua, for having attacked Raymond, marquis of Ancona, and his nephew, and pillaged the treasures of the church, which these two lords were carrying into France. This loss of money annoyed the holy father very much, who, to divert his chagrin, retired to Montil, with the Countess de Foix and all his minions. These passed scenes of debauchery so horribly depraved, that it is impossible to recite them; we will only say, that Clement, already old and worn out, was attacked by a singular malady, which his physicians declared it would be impossible to cure, unless he breathed his native air.—But God had at last marked the term of this criminal existence. Whilst the pontiff was being transported to Bordeaux, the malady increased; they were obliged to stop his litter at Roquemaure, on the Rhone, in the diocese of Nismes, where Clement died on the 20th of April, 1314.

VACANCY IN THE HOLY SEE.

[A. D. 1314.]

Division of the treasures of the church between the mistresses and minions of Clement the Fifth—The cardinals assemble in conclave—The city of Carpentras pillaged and burned by the priests of the court of Clement—The cardinals separate without naming a pope—Interregnum of two years—Origin of the sect of the Lollards—Singular expedient employed by Philip, count of Poitiers, to oblige the cardinals to form a new conclave—After a forced abstinence of forty days they proclaim the bishop of Porto sovereign pontiff.

As soon as Clement the Fifth had closed his eyes, his treasures were pillaged. The cardinals seized on enormous sums of coined money. Bernard, count de Lomagne, nephew and minion of the dead pope, carried off chalices and ornaments worth more than a hundred thousand florins. The Countess de Foix stole, as her share, all the jewels of the holy father. And there were no minions nor mistresses of the cardinals who were not enriched by the spoils of the sovereign pontiff. Jean Villani says, that in the midst of this disorder, in which every one was so desirous of pillage, they only left an old travelling mantle to cover the dead body of Clement, and that was in part consumed by a candle falling on the bed where it lay.

When there was nothing more left in the treasury of the church, the cardinals, twenty-three in number, went to Carpentras, and shut themselves up in the episcopal palace, to proceed to the election of a new pope. Scarcely had they done so, when a dreadful tumult broke out in the city; the priests of the court of Clement, and the domestics of the cardinals who had not formed a part of the cortège of the pope, and who consequently had not had part of the plunder, arrived at Carpentras, furious at having been deprived of such rich booty. As they knew the impossibility of their masters opposing their designs, they traversed the streets with lighted torches, and set fire to the houses that they might more easily rob the inhabitants in the general alarm. Fortunately, these soon gained the ascendancy, and laid strong hands on the stranger priests. In consequence of this outbreak, a panic seized the cardinals; they left Carpentras furtively, to escape the popular vengeance, and retired to their magnificent palaces at Avignon, or to their country houses, without caring otherwise for Christianity than to spend with their mistresses the money which the faithful had given to Clement the Fifth, and which they had divided among themselves.

Two whole years passed in this way, and the Christian world was surrendered to the most deplorable anarchy. The priests robbed the people with impunity, and the inquisitors decimated the population or embittered themselves against the poor heretics, called Lollards, whose principal seat was the small city of Crems in Bohemia. The Lollards chiefly professed the opinions of the Fratricelli; they maintained that Lucifer and the rebellious angels had been driven from heaven because they had demanded liberty and equality in the celestial kingdom, but that the time would come in which the archangel Saint Michael and his cohort, who had combatted against them, in support of tyranny, would be eternally condemned, as well as those men who imitated their cowardice in obeying kings.

They turned the ceremonies of the church into derision. If baptism is a sacrament, said they, every time one bathes he receives a new baptism, and the bathers are transformed into priests. The ordination of ecclesiastics appeared to them to be useless, the dedication of temples ridiculous, and the blessing of cemeteries a sacrilegious mummary. Finally, from paradox to paradox, they came to the conclusion that the consecrated host was a morsel of dry bread, and the sacrifice of the mass a divine farce. They, further, observed neither fasting nor abstinence; ate of the same food on holy Thursday as on other days, and laboured on Easter day. At this time, all these great crimes would scarcely draw a slight punishment on the seminarist who was guilty of them; but they excited in the highest degree the holy wrath of the inquisitors of that period, and more than eight thousand of these unfortunates were pitilessly tortured and burned in the name of a God of mercy.

Whilst the scaffolds were consuming these unfortunate victims of the avarice or fanaticism of the priests, the sacred college still remained divided. Philip the Handsome, as well as his son, Louis the Headstrong, had died during the vacancy of the Holy See; this last king had, however, instructed his brother Philip to reassemble the conclave, and put an end to the interregnum. For this purpose, that prince went to the city of Lyons, from whence he wrote to the cardinals to come to him secretly, promising the tiara to each of them. On the appointed day they all arrived, mysteriously, in the city, and went to the monastery of Preaching Brothers, where Philip was. As soon as they appeared at the convent, they were arrested and confined in a large hall. Philip then informed them that he should keep them prisoners until they had named a pontiff, declaring that he would execute the constitution of Gregory with the greatest vigour. The cardinals submitted courageously to the frugal diet of bread and water, hoping that the death of the king would effect a favourable change in their position; Philip being obliged to go to Paris as curator of the queen, who was then enceinte. But they were deceived in their hopes; as the severity towards them was increased, by diminishing daily their rations of bread and water. At last, after a forced fast of forty days, they determined to commission the cardinal, James d'Ossa, to choose the worthiest among them as sovereign pontiff. The proud prelate placed the tiara on his own head and proclaimed himself pope, by the name of John the Twenty-second.

JOHN THE TWENTY-SECOND, THE TWO HUNDRED AND FIRST POPE.

[A. D. 1310.]

JAMES of Ossa was seventy years old when he mounted the Holy See, or rather when he soiled the chair of St. Peter. His father, who is said to have been a poor travelling hosier of Cahors, had disembarassed himself of him, by placing him as a scullion in the household of the metropolitan of Arles, the chancellor of Charles the Lame, king of Naples and count of Provence. His sallies of wit advanced the little James from the kitchen to the anti-chamber, and the archbishop having had the curiosity one day to interrogate him, was astonished at the intelligence of his young valet, and determined to give him skilful masters, under whom he made rapid progress in all the sciences, and especially in the canon law. His protector made him take orders at the close of his studies, and obtained for him the bishopric of Frejus. After the death of the archbishop of Arles, King Robert conferred on him the appointment of chancellor, and admitted him to his counsels. James discharged his functions about the prince with propriety, who, in return for his zeal, caused him to be elevated to the cardinalate by Clement the Fifth.

His character changed at once on his reaching the pontificate, as if contact with the tiara was enough to transform a holy cardinal into a tiger with a human face. He became prouder, more deceitful, and greedier than his predecessors; he was not content with the ordinary revenues of the church, and with the enormous sums the inquisitors paid him as his share of the confiscations, but he increased them by speculating in human corruption, and publicly sold absolution for parricide, murder, robbery, incest, adultery, sodomy, and bestiality; he himself reduced to writing this tax of the apostolic chancery, that Pactolus which flowed over all the vices of humanity—changed into livres tournois or handsome golden pennies—and which rolled into the pontifical treasury, the true ocean in which the wealth of nations was engulfed. It was he also who first added a third crown to the tiara, as a symbol of the triple power of the popes over heaven, earth, and hell, and which they have made the emblem of their pride, their avarice, and their lubricity.

As soon as the nomination of John the Twenty-second was known at the court of France, the regent sent several lords to him to request him to defer the ceremony of his consecration until his arrival; but the pope, impatient of exercising the sovereign authority, refused to yield to this desire, and was crowned at Lyons on the 21st of September, 1316, without waiting until the sacred college had promulgated the decree of his election. In order to accelerate the preparations for his enthronement, he had even promised the cardinal Napoleon des Ursini to establish the residence of the pontifical court at Rome, and had sworn, upon the sacred host, to mount neither horse nor mule until he had fulfilled his promise.

As the holy father had no intention of leaving France, and particularly Avignon, that city of pleasure in which the popes proudly exhibited the splendours of their sovereign court, and as he was unwilling to break openly the oath which he had taken with so much solemnity, he made the journey from Lyons to Avignon, on a boat covered with magnificent tapestry, and on disembarking used an ass, on which to make his entrance into the palace of the pontiffs. It is true he had not perjured himself, since he had mounted neither horse nor mule, but the subterfuge was not approved of by all the cardinals and the Italians; and among others, Napoleon des Ursini immediately left the pontifical court, and refused to commune with the holy father. John revenged himself for their contempt, by making a promotion of eight French cardinals, and by creating new bishoprics, of which not one was given to ultramontane prelates. The full complement of his court being thus made out, he was engaged in devising the means of maintaining its pomp, and he wrote to the sovereigns of Europe, claiming from them Peter's pence. His first letters were humble and submissive; they produced little effect; he wrote others proud and menacing, which caused the wealth of the people to flow into his coffers.

Whilst John was thus occupied in repairing the losses which the Holy See had sustained by the pillage of the treasures of Clement the Fifth, the queen of France gave birth to a son, who was called John, and who died eight days after his birth. Was a child ever an obstacle to the ambition of a regent? His death, which happened so fortunately for the uncle of the young king, placed the crown on the head of Philip, count of Poitiers.

The new sovereign having neglected to send presents to the court of Avignon, the pope wrote to him to ask for them; he addressed, at the same time, other reproaches on different matters to him. "We are informed, prince," he said, "that during divine service, you entertain yourself with the lords around you, and that you frequently discourse on affairs of state or pleasures, which divert the attention of the faithful, who ought to listen to the prayers which the priests address to God for your safety and that of your people; we hope that you will correct this impious habit. You should avoid impassioned and rude gestures, which render your long person so ungraceful, and renounce wearing the royal mantle of your ancestors, which is much too short for you. We desire you also to put an end to divers abuses which are practised in your capital, for instance, of cutting the beard and hair on Sunday—a capital sin which the church prohibits, and for which we give absolution only on the payment of a large fine. We also prohibit your university of Paris from occupying itself with philosophical questions, and especially must it avoid dissertations on the errors of the monk Roger Bacon, of Albert the Great, of Raymond Lulle, and of all the alchymists or physicians. We are unwilling, also, that they should discuss the doctrines of John Scot, of Dante Alighieri, of Arnold of Villeneuve, and other teachers who have endeavoured to destroy the sacred edifice of the Roman theocracy."

John was then employed in confiscating, under pretext of heresies, the wealth of citizens, and even of monasteries or prelates, whose riches excited his avidity; unfortunately, these lucrative operations were interrupted by a schism which broke out among the Minor Brothers. One party had taken the denomination of Spiritual, and had chosen a superior for themselves; the other called themselves brothers of Common Observance, and obeyed Michael de Cesene, the seventeenth general of the order. The latter informed the pontiff of the conduct of the Spiritual, and besought him to admonish them to return to their obedience. John, who understood well that it was important for the Holy See to maintain unity among these monks, from which the inquisitors were recruited, ordered the Spirituals to return under the authority of their superiors, and on their refusal to do so, he caused them to be arrested and sent to the scaffold as heretics.

He pursued, with an equal fury, the sect of the Fratricellists, or Poor Brothers, who had spread themselves through Italy, Sicily, Provence, Narbonne, Toulouse, and several other provinces. These monks wore a particular dress, held conventicles, chose themselves as ministers or custodians, built temples, founded communities, and begged, along with the Minor and Preaching Brothers, but without paying, like these last, rents to the Holy See. They had thus amassed great wealth, which destroyed them. The greedy pontiff, coveting their wealth, lanced a bull of anathema against them. In vain did the Franciscans protest their orthodoxy, and offer to prove that they followed the rule of Saint Francis, in accordance with a charter granted them by Pope Celestin, who freed them from all obedience towards the general of the provincials of that order. All their protests were useless; the holy father even went further, and under the pretext that Boniface the Eighth had annulled the acts of Celestin the Fifth, he condemned the Fratricellists as heretics, confiscated their property, and handed their persons over to the inquisitors.

Public clamour, however, was raised at this new crime, and the pope was openly accused of sacrificing to his detestable avarice those unfortunate men, who refused to despoil themselves of their wealth for him. John, to justify his criminal conduct, joined calumny to cruelty. He published a new bull against the Fratricellists, accusing them of teaching that there were in the church two parties, the one carnal, plunged in luxury, and soiled with every crime, over which the pope and his prelates presided; the other chaste, frugal, charitable, to which belonged true Christians, the enemies of the Holy See. "Thus," added the pontiff, "is it not just that these abominable sectarians, who combat the holiness of our power, should be surrendered to the tribunals of the inquisition to be burned alive without pity?"

Ever since the assassination of the emperor Henry the Seventh, Germany and Italy continued to be the theatre of frightful disorders. Two competitors, Louis of Bavaria and his cousin Frederick of Austria, disputed the throne of Germany, and inundated the provinces with the blood of the people, who were senseless enough to sustain the quarrels of kings. After two years of cruel wars and terrible battles, Louis took his competitor prisoner, and compelled him to renounce all pretensions to the imperial crown, as the price of his liberty. In the midst of these divisions, the pope, faithful to the crooked policy of the Holy See, had been unwilling to declare for either of the two rivals, in order to profit by their discords, to re-establish his authority in Italy. But when Louis of Bavaria, by his victory, had put an end to the bloody strife which was desolating this unfortunate country, John, forced to abandon his sacrilegious hopes, lanced a bull of excommunication against the prince, set aside the officers and vicars whom he had appointed, declared the throne vacant, and adjudged to himself the government of the empire.

In order to show that he had a right to dispose of the imperial crown, he gave the post of vicar of the kingdom to king Robert, and cited the two competitors, Louis of Bavaria, and the duke of Austria, to appear before him. He then looked around for a candidate who would agree to give him a suitable price for the crown. Louis did not remain inactive; He put into play with the electors, all the resources of policy to induce them to ratify his usurpation. His commissioners traversed Italy, and strengthened his party by detaching the most important cities from the cause of the pope. To counterbalance the success of his enemy, John attempted to render him odious, by accusing him of having attempted his life, and he was careful to render this calumnious imputation public, by addressing a bull to the bishop of Frejus, whom he commissioned to hunt out this pretended attempt.

The following is this singular piece:—"We have been informed, my lord bishop," wrote the holy father, "that Jean Damant, a physician, Jean de Limoges, Jacques, surnamed the Brabancin, and some others, apply themselves with condemnable perseverance to magical arts; that they frequently make use of mirrors made under certain constellations and enchanted figures; that they place themselves in cabalistic circles, and force the spirit of darkness to appear in their presence; that they can put men to death by the violence of their enchantments; that they confine demons in long-necked glass bottles, and torment them with fire, to cause them to reveal the past, the present, and the future; that they affirm that, by mere words, they can abridge or prolong the duration of existence; and, finally, that they have conspired against us at the instigation of Louis of Bavaria, to wrest from us our tiara and our life, by all sorts of conjurations and mal-practices. We consequently order you to proceed against them as you would do in a case of heresy, that is, to hand them over to the inquisitors, that the violence of torture may draw from them an avowal of their crime."

It is thus that priests and kings have always acted; they call the discoveries of the learned, whether in physics, chemistry, or astronomy, infernal inventions, and burn for heretics those who would enlighten the people and bring them out of the shades of superstition; they still denominate as discoveries, subversive of all social order, the political theories of the philosophers of our own times, and plunge reformers into dungeons to stifle the seeds of the liberty and emancipation of the people.

Whilst John the Twenty-second was burning, indiscriminately, monks, heretics, and alchymists, for the greater glory of God, he was pursuing with anathemas, princes and lords who refused to do homage to him for their states or their domains. Mathew de Visconti, who had already been censured, was placed beneath the ban of the empire, excommunicated, declared an obstinate heretic, and as such pointed out to the inquisitors to be tortured by the cord, water, and fire. But these anathemas, though still dreaded by the faithful, produced no effect on enlightened minds, so much had their abuse discredited them; thus the holy father, who well knew their want of power and ridiculous character, added a clause, that the possessions of the Visconti should be given to the princes who should conquer them, hoping thereby to excite the cupidity of Henry, the brother of the archduke of Austria.

Mathew Visconti, who was a skilful politician, immediately sent an embassy to the archduke to represent to him, that by oppressing the Ghibelines, the avowed partizans of the emperors, he was acting against his own interests, and preparing a triumph for Louis of Bavaria; the justice of these representations struck the archduke, who prevented his brother from taking the part of the pope.

John, foiled in his hope of finding an avenger, tried his last resource, and preached a crusade against his enemies. Bands of adventurers organised at his call, to whom he gave, as pay, indulgences and the power to commit rape, pillage, and murders, on their route. These wretches having united with the troops of Robert, king of Naples, an ambitious and fanatical prince, marched against the Ghibelines, and gained at first some advantages over them. Mathew then took his revenge, repulsed the army of the church from his domains, and forced them to raise the siege of Milan.

Furious at this new check, the pontiff wrote to the ecclesiastics of Italy and Germany, to the governors of the cities, to the communes as well as the inhabitants of the provinces, that, in his capacity of protector of the empire, he ordered them to pursue Louis of Bavaria to extremities, under penalty of excommunication, interdict, and confiscation: threatening, in case of refusal, to hand them over as heretics to the tribunal of the inquisition. He, moreover, cited the emperor a second time to Avignon to be judged by the sacred conclave. Louis paid no attention to the citation: and on the appointed day no one appeared in his name; the pope then lanced a terrible sentence against him, and threatened a second time to hand him over to the inquisitors, which produced no result.

John suspended for a moment his pursuit of the prince, and appeared to avenge himself on the Fratricellists for the insults offered him by his powerful enemies. He renewed his persecutions of these unfortunates, with more bitterness than before. Not only did he denounce them as disturbers of the public peace, but he had even the impudence to call them infamous liars for affirming that Jesus Christ and the apostles had not possessed great temporal wealth. Michael de Cesene, the general of the Minor Brothers, and William Occam, a celebrated English monk, were so scandalised by this proposition, that they at once replied by an energetic protest, calling the words of the holy father impious and false, and tendering him to the tribunals of the inquisition, to be burned alive as a heretic. John, enraged at the boldness of the monks, ordered their bishops to arrest them; but he encountered a formidable opposition, precisely where he had expected to find passive obedience; the prelates refused to act as instruments of the hatred of the pontiff. Still further, the doctors Marfilus of Padua, and John of Ghent, of the sect of the Fratricellists, the most redoubtable opponents of the papacy, went to the emperor, and thus addressed him:—

“Prince, for very many years the throne of the church has been occupied by wretches, who arrogate to themselves, in the name of Christ, the right of committing every crime with impunity, of despoiling kings and people of their wealth, and of putting to death in dreadful tortures those bold men who reject their audacious pretensions to infallibility. We come to you, prince, in the name of our brethren, to entreat you to employ all your efforts to destroy this horrible theocratic despotism, and to overthrow from the pontifical chair this disgrace to humanity. Recall to your recollection that the priests are the most contemptible of men, and that the pope is the most infamous, the most abominable of priests. No longer suffer these thieves, these sodomites, these assassins, to enchain the nations and devour the substance of the laborious people in sloth and debauchery. Act, prince, that we may see the termination of this scandal.”

Louis listened favourably to the two doctors, and entrusted them to draw up the virulent manifestos which he lanced against John. In one of these writings the holy father was accused of a great number of crimes, and particularly of that of heresy. As it was very difficult for him to disprove the imputations of avarice and simony, he endeavoured, at least, to prove his orthodoxy, not being willing to imitate in this the conduct of Boniface the Eighth, who openly gloried in being an atheist. From propositions which he put forth on certain points of the controversy, we must conclude that the pontiff was in formal opposition to the deceased Nicholas the Third, who was thus ranged among heretics. This circumstance, however, is not extraordinary; for it is an admitted principle in the church, that popes have full authority to abolish the decrees of their predecessors, to condemn their memories, and even to inflict punishments on their dead bodies, the privilege of infallibility being only for life.

Marfilus of Padua then composed his celebrated treatise known by the title of the Defender of the Peace; and John of Ghent published an equally remarkable work upon the ecclesiastical power. John the Twenty-second dared not to hand over these two works to the tribunals of the inquisition, but contented himself with condemning the five following propositions: “Jesus paid tribute to the emperor, because temporal goods belong to Cæsar.—Christ, when dying, left no visible chief to govern his followers; and the language which is attributed to him, ‘Thou art Peter, and on this rock will I build my church,’ is but a sacerdotal trick; for it is proved that St. Peter, during his life, had less authority than St. Paul, and several other disciples of Jesus; thus he could not have been the vicar of Christ.—The popes having been created by princes, the latter have the right to appoint, depose and punish them.—All priests have equal authority, and equal jurisdiction.—Ministers of religion, even when assembled in council, cannot inflict any punishment on their colleagues. . . .” Thus the pontiff pursued with his anathemas the doctors of Germany, who sought to overthrow his rule, and at the same time he laboured to excite revolts against the authority of the emperor.

His star was already paling; at Rome Sciarra Colonna had driven away the aristocracy, and established a council of fifty citizens, who governed the city. In order, however, to maintain his new constitution, since he could not yet rely on the aid of the priests, he sent ambassadors to Avignon, to beseech the pope to return to Rome with his court, as the decretals and canons ordered him; informing him, if he persisted in prolonging his sojourn in France, that the citizens would be compelled to choose another pope to govern the church. Before such an overture, which was nothing less than an order from Sciarra Colonna, the pope dissembled his anger. He replied, that he had the greatest desire to go to Italy, but that he could not undertake the journey at once, the roads not being safe; but that he would start as soon as Rome should be freed from the Ghibelines; and that, in the meantime, he appointed king Robert senator, and James Sabelli and Stephen Colonna consuls. He also gave to the deputies a proclamation, addressed to the citizens exhorting them to live in peace, and to assemble their forces to attack the heretic Louis of Bavaria.

This reply was far from satisfying the Romans, who desired the return of the pope less for his own account than for the profit they derived from the residence of the sovereign court, which spread among them the gold wrested from other people. They then addressed the emperor, and besought him to choose Rome as his capital, vaunting the position of that city, from whence he could, they said, pacify the peninsula and put an end to the troubles excited by the clergy. They were supported in their request by the Ghibelines of Tuscany and Lombardy; these measures determined Louis to make a journey to Rome, not to instal himself there, but to be consecrated, and make another pope to replace the unworthy John the Twenty-second.

He first went to Trent, where he assembled the principal chiefs of the Ghibelines, to confer with them on the steps to be taken for the pacification of Italy; he then convened the prelates, doctors, and nobles of his party in an assembly: in their presence he declared the pope attainted, and convicted of heresy on sixteen articles, and caused him to be excommunicated. Immediately after the termination of this diet, he passed the mountains and went to Milan, where he received the iron crown from the hands of the bishop of Arezzo. His interference, however, instead of appeasing the troubles, appeared to augment them, from the effervescence which the two parties manifested. Both Guelphs and Ghibelines claimed the sovereignty of the cities, and maintained their pretensions by arms. The Romans also, who only desired to have their city declared the capital of the empire, seeing themselves deceived in their hope, gradually detached themselves from the cause of Louis, and sent secretly a new embassy to the pope, to beseech him to come among them. John promised the deputies to yield to their wishes; and, to gain time, lanced a new bull of excommunication and deposition against the emperor; he sent at the same time, by them, to the cardinal John des Ursini, his legate in Tuscany, instructions to go with them to render himself absolute master of the holy city; he also enjoined on him the sentence of anathema, interdict, and deposition against Louis of Bavaria, and to excite the ultramontane lords against that prince, whilst he himself would influence the German electors to choose another king.

John des Ursini obeyed, punctually, the orders of the holy father; he published the censures against the emperor, and presented himself before Rome with the prince of Morea, the brother of Robert of Naples, and a troop of Calabrian bandits, who entered the Leonine city by night and seized on the quarter and church of St. Peter. The legate had already taken possession of it, in the name of the pope, when the Ghibelines arrived; they attacked the church with vigour, and, after a combat of three hours, drove away John des Ursini and the prince of Morea in disgrace. Tranquillity being restored, Louis of Bavaria entered Rome, and was received with great testimonials of joy, by a large majority of the citizens. As the Guelphs had abandoned the city, from fear of becoming the victims of the popular fury, the prince found no opposition, and was crowned in the church of St. Peter, by James Albertino, the nephew of the Cardinal de Prato. After the ceremony he caused three edicts to be read from the pulpit of the church, by which he pledged himself to support the Catholic faith, honour the clergy, and protect the widow and orphan. On the very day on which the emperor made so solemn a declaration of his peaceful intentions, the pope lanced a terrible bull against him, calling the people to arms, and promising plenary indulgences to all who should take the cross against the heretic, Louis of Bavaria.

The prince, at last, determined to punish the audacity of this implacable old man. He convened a grand assembly of the clergy, nobility, and people in the public square of the church of St. Peter; and, on the appointed day, an Augustine monk, named Nicholas, having mounted a platform, addressed the bystanders, exclaiming three times: “who among you wishes to defend the priest Jacques de Cahors, who calls himself John the Twenty-second?” No reply being made, he displayed a long roll, which contained a list of the crimes charged against the pontiff, and which terminated thus: “Being unable longer to suffer the rule of this priest of Cahors, who has proclaimed himself sovereign pontiff, supreme chief of kings and emperors, spiritual and temporal ruler of the world, we accuse him of having destroyed thousands of innocent persons to seize their spoils, and of having made a tariff, to insure impunity to all kinds of crime and debauchery. Finally, for the causes set forth in our present declaration, we order his goods to be seized, and his person delivered up to our officers, and we prohibit all Christians from communing with him, under penalty of being deprived of the fiefs which they hold of the empire."

None of the partizans of the pope dared to undertake his defence; but on the next day, a young noble, James Colonna, came to the place Saint Marcel, and, in the presence of some curious persons, made a protest in favour of John, and affixed it to the door of the church. But this bravado produced no result when he saw the number of the people increase, he leaped on his horse, and prudently fled to his father at Palestrina. James was recompensed for it, however, by the pontiff, who gave him a bishopric, though he had not attained the age to receive ecclesiastical honours.

Louis of Bavaria then published a law, providing, "that the pope should make Rome his place of residence, and should not remove from it, without being authorised to do so by the people and clergy; that even in his absence, the court and consistory should continue to sit in the holy city, and that in case the pontiff transgressed these rules, he should be deprived of the sovereign dignity, and be regarded as dead." After this, they proceeded to the election of a pope, to replace John the Twenty-second.

NICHOLAS THE FIFTH, ANTI-POPE.

[A. D. 1328.]

Conspiracy against the emperor—John the Twenty-second is condemned to death—Election of Peter de Corbière—His history before his pontificate—John essays to render him ridiculous, by urging a woman, from whom he had been separated for forty years, to claim her rights as his lawful wife—The two popes excommunicate each other—The party of John rises again in Italy—The general of the Minor Brothers declares for the emperor—Singular agreement between the two popes—Abdication of Peter de Corbière.

WHILST Louis of Bavaria was proceeding to the deposition of John, the latter was pursuing his negotiations with the princes of Germany, to induce them to choose a new emperor, and even organised a conspiracy in Italy to assassinate Louis. These efforts having been discovered, Louis made a decree, which condemned the pontiff to death, and ordered the Romans to assemble at once in the square of St. Peter to proceed to the election of another chief of the church. Louis, clad in his imperial ornaments, and placed under a dais, presided over the assembly, having by his side the venerable Peter Rainallucci, of the order of the Minor Brothers. James Albertini, bishop of Venice, having three times demanded from the people if they would accept brother Peter as pope, and unanimous acclamations having replied to his appeal, he read the decree which conferred the papacy on this venerable monk. Louis of Bavaria then gave him the name of Nicholas the Fifth, and himself clothed him with the cape, gave him the pastoral ring, and seated him on his right hand. The new pope then distributed largesses among the crowd and gave them his blessing.

According to Ciaconius, Peter Rainallucci was born at Corbière, and belonged to the illustrious family of the Colonna. Wading speaks with admiration of the severity of his morals, the charms of his eloquence, and the purity of his evangelical soul. He had been married in his youth to a woman, whose irregularities were such that he had been obliged to have his marriage annulled by an ecclesiastical sentence. He had then entered the order of Minor Brothers, where, as Maimbourg says, "he lived in great reputation for holiness, by the beautiful examples which he gave of all monastic virtues."

John the Twenty-second, furious at having so redoubtable a competitor as this holy man, endeavoured to disconcert him by exciting a ridiculous process against him. At his instigation, the old wife of Peter, who was still living, presented herself before the bishop of Rieti, to claim her rights as his lawful spouse. This prelate, who was one of the partizans of John, and who had received a large sum to play this farce, declared that the marriage had not been lawfully dissolved, and ordered the new pope to take back his wife.

As soon as the sentence was rendered, the pope of Avignon addressed a copy of it to all the princes of Christendom, representing his competitor as a debauched, avaricious, and proud monk. These different imputations were so many calumnies; for the venerable Nicholas had really accepted the papacy, only to re-establish the morality and humility of evangelical times in the church. A partizan of the doctrine of the general of his order, he maintained that Jesus possessed nothing of his own, and that priests, after the example of their divine master, should live on alms.

These beautiful sentiments were not, however, agreeable to a corrupt clergy; thus, from the very commencement of his reign, the virtuous Nicholas, discovering the impossibility of carrying out his doctrines of reform, wished to abandon that chair, dishonoured by so many abominable pontiffs; but overcome by the entreaties of the emperor, he consented to keep the tiara until peace was re-established; and at the urgency of the prince, who showed him the necessity of forming a court at Rome to cause himself to be loved by the priests, he consented to appoint cardinals, and permitted them to have horses, hunting dogs, domestics clothed in brilliant liveries, and gentlemen and pages in their service.

Louis of Bavaria had at first furnished money from his own purse, for all the expenses of the apostolic court. When these resources were exhausted, the cardinals forced the venerable pontiff to sell the benefices, privileges, and ecclesiastical dignities. Every vacant bishopric was set up at auction at Rome, as it was at Avignon, and adjudged to two competitors, who then combatted for the possession of it. The two pontifical courts issued bulls of anathema, and pursued to extremity the partizans of each, according to the chances of war. Thus, whilst John the Twenty-second was torturing two monks, guilty of having pronounced the name of Nicholas in their prayers, the prefect of Rome was burning a Tuscan and a Lombard for maintaining that John was the only lawful pope.

In the midst of these scenes of violence, the venerable Peter de Corbière could only mourn over the misfortunes of the church, and beseech the emperor to free him from the burthen which bore him down. He at last played his part of pope so badly, that his coffers were entirely emptied; and as the prince could no longer supply the exactions of the cardinals, they began to detach themselves from his cause. The agents of the pope of Avignon profited by this disposition of men's minds, to scatter gold about abundantly, and to subsidise the discontented. Bands of armed men soon traversed the environs of Rome, and entered the city, uttering menaces of death against the anti-pope and the emperor. Louis and Nicholas, alarmed at this state of things, prudently left their palaces. But on their departure from Rome they were pursued by a multitude of fanatics exclaiming, "Death to the heretics and the excommunicated! Long life to the sovereign pontiff, John the Twenty-second!"

That same night the cardinals opened the gates of the city to the bands of the cardinal legate, John des Ursini, who entered it amidst the acclamations of the clergy. They burned the next day, on the public place, the decrees of Louis of Bavaria, and of Nicholas the Fifth; they then proceeded to the massacre of the Ghibellines, and disinterred the bodies of Germans, who were dragged through the streets. John wrote from Avignon, approving of all that had been done, and returned solemn thanks to God for having answered his prayers by exterminating his enemies.

The joy of his triumph was, however, soon troubled by a check given him by Michael de Cesene, general of the Minor Brothers, who had been cited before the sacred college, to justify his opinions on the poverty of Jesus Christ—opinions for which several of the brethren of his order had already been delivered up to the inquisitors, and burned alive. The courageous Michael, unalarmed by the fear of punishment, presented himself before the pope, and defended his cause with that noble boldness which carries conviction with it. He retorted victoriously on the diffuse dissertations of the holy father—even convicted him of heresy—showed conclusively that Jesus Christ, having never possessed any thing of his own, prelates should have neither lands nor domains, nor wealth—and finished his harangue by declaring that he appealed from all the decrees, and all the decisions of John, to a general council, which alone had the right to judge the members of the clergy canonically.

The old audacity of John was roused by so energetic an opposition; but not daring to rid himself of his adversary openly, he prohibited him from leaving Avignon before the decision of the sacred college was given; and he wrote at once to the general chapter at Bologna, to depose Michael de Cesene from the generalship. He was again foiled; the Minor Brothers confirmed their chief in his functions, and declared themselves out of the jurisdiction of an heretical pope. The reply of the monks threw the pope into a frightful fit of anger. He blasphemed the name of God, hurled imprecations on his enemies, and ordered his familiars to assassinate Michael de Cesene. The latter was fortunately warned in time; he escaped from Avignon, and reached the city of Pisa, where he found the anti-pope and the emperor. The holy father, unable to avenge himself by murder, anathematized Michael—declared him a heretic, and ordered the Preaching Brothers to attack the Minor Brothers.

John was so perfectly obeyed, and the quarrels between these two orders became so violent, that all Europe was occupied with their disputes. The Minor Brothers maintained that Christ had glorified poverty, since he had died upon the cross in utter nudity; and that his head, instead of being crowned with a diadem, was crowned with thorns. They proved that, during his sojourn on earth, he had lived on alms, without possessing a stone on which to lay his head. The Preaching Brothers, or rather the pope, affirmed, on the other hand, that Jesus had died on the cross, wearing a magnificent vesture of purple; that he had a crown of gold, glittering with carbuncles and brilliants; and that rich sandals were attached to his feet. They even distributed images through the cities, in which Jesus was represented as crucified in a purple robe, ornamented with rich embroidery in gold.

The holy father at last dared to publish, in the name of his penitentiary, Alvarus Pelagus, a treatise, in which he thus set forth his pretensions: "As Jesus Christ is recognised as the Pontiff, King and Lord of the universe, so his vicar upon earth can have no equal; and since the whole world belongs to God, it should equally appertain to the pope. Emperors, kings, and princes cannot then be recognised as lawful, unless they have received their states as fiefs from the chief of the church, who possesses this immense power, not by the right of the sword, but by divine right; for Jesus gave to St. Peter the keys, not the key of the kingdom of heaven only, that is one for spiritual and another for temporal things. The faithful should only obey God and the pope, and when kings refuse obedience to the Holy See they place themselves without the bosom of the church; they condemn themselves with their own mouths as heretics, and should consequently be handed over to the inquisitors, to be burned for the edification of the faithful."

At the very time that the holy father was spreading abroad these alarming theories, the venerable Nicholas the Fifth was carrying into execution his plan of abdication, which he had formed long since; and he wrote to John the Twenty-second, "I heard brought against you and your court accusations of heresy, exactions, simony, debaucheries, and murders, which rendered you, in my eyes, the most execrable of pontiffs; I then thought it my duty not to refuse the tiara, in order to deliver the church from a pope who was drawing the faithful into the abyss. I have since learned, from my own experience, how difficult it is to live a holy life in the chair of the apostle, and I avow that no one is more worthy of the papacy than yourself. I thus renounce this dignity, and I will abdicate solemnly in your presence, in such place as you shall please to designate." Notwithstanding this complete denial of the good old man, his partizans exacted from the pontiff that he should preserve his life in safety with a pension sufficient for his wants. John promised all that was asked of him, swore on the host to execute his engagements faithfully, and even sent a letter of congratulation beseeching him to come and receive the recompense of his humility.

Peter de Corbière embarked at Pisa in a Provençal galley belonging to the holy father; but scarcely was he in the power of the agents of the pontiff than he was submitted to the most unworthy treatment; he was compelled to confess in public imaginary crimes, for the purpose of degrading him in the eyes of fanatics. He was then constrained to enter Avignon in a secular dress, and a few days afterwards was mounted on a scaffold to make his abjuration; the pope then put a cord around his neck, led him around the square, and forcing him to prostrate himself with his forehead in the dust, placed his foot upon his head, and thundered forth a Te Deum as a mark of his victory. This humiliating ceremony being finished, Peter de Corbière was cast into a dungeon, where he lived for three years and a half.

One morning the jailer who carried to him his daily ration of bread and water, was much surprised at finding the door of his prison open, and a dead body upon the threshold. It was that of the unfortunate Peter, who had been strangled during the night. Thus perished another victim of John the Twenty-second.

JOHN THE TWENTY-SECOND, SOLE POPE.

[A. D. 1331.]

The pope rejects the conditions of peace offered by the emperor—Ruse of the pontiff to gain possession of the city of Bologna—Doctrines of the pope concerning beatific visions—He is declared a heretic—The king of France threatens to burn him alive for heresy—His death—His character—Tariff of the Roman chancellors for the absolution of all crimes.

As soon as John was disembarrassed of his competitor, he pursued with activity the nomination of a new emperor in Germany. The electors had already assembled, some gained by rich presents, others seduced by promises, and it was feared lest they should decide to choose an emperor favourable to the Holy See, when Louis of Bavaria, advised of the measures of the pope, hastened to return to Germany to overthrow his plans.

During his absence from Pisa, Otho, duke of Austria, John of Luxemburg, the king of Bohemia, and the archbishop of Treves, desiring to put an end to the division between the church and the throne, had sent ambassadors to the court of Avignon to make proposals of peace to the holy father, even engaging, in the name of Louis of Bavaria, to recognise him as the lawful pope and to subscribe to the deposition of Peter de Corbière.

John received the ambassadors badly, and dismissed them without giving them any reply; some days afterwards, however, he addressed the following letter to the king of Bohemia. "It is neither useful nor honourable to the church to have a heretical emperor who gives an asylum to Marsilus of Padua, John of Ghent, Michael de Cesene, William Occam, and the brother Bonne-Grace de Bergame, all heretics, schismatics, and excommunicated like himself. He offers to depose the anti-pope; but is he ignorant that Peter de Corbière has deposed himself, and is expiating his crime in our dungeons?"

And you who solicit our clemency for him, do you not fear to draw upon yourselves our wrath for this cowardly complaisance? Cease then to supplicate us in the name of the heretic Louis of Bavaria, or dread lest the thunders of the church strike you on your throne."

John of Luxemburg treated the threats of the pontiff with contempt, and seeing that force alone could abate his audacity, went, as the vicar of the emperor, into Italy, at the head of an army, seized, in his name, several important cities, and established himself in Lombardy. This invasion exasperated the pope; he lanced one of his most terrible anathemas against the king of Bohemia, and published that he himself was preparing to invade Italy. He preached, in fact, a crusade, which brought in large sums to him, and declared that he would make choice of the city of Bologna as his residence, that he might the better direct the operations of the campaign.

But it was soon discovered that his only intention was to fill his treasury with the money of the simple, and to render himself master of a city, which, from its central position, was the most important in Italy. In fact, the cardinal, Bertrand Poët, presented himself at Bologna, to confer with the magistrates for the concession of the necessary land for the construction of a fortified palace for the pope, and several castellated chateaux for the cardinals and their followers; and, after having obtained their authority, he built around the city, fortresses which entirely commanded it. The stupid magistrates of Bologna, who had not perceived the snare set for their vanity, sent an embassy to the pope to entreat him to hasten his arrival. John received the deputies with great marks of affection, loaded them with presents, and promised to go to Bologna as soon as his palace was ready. Fortunately, in the interval, the Bolognese, more clear-sighted than their magistrates, understood the perfidious intentions of the holy father, who was only building the fortifications to render himself the absolute master of the city. A revolt broke out; the legate, Bertrand de Poët, was assailed in his palace, as well as other Gascon prelates who were attached to the pope. Several Guelphs were massacred, and the legate only escaped by being disguised.

This expedition having failed, John, unable to struggle with arms, threw himself into the religious contests, and set the Christian world in commotion by his heterodox doctrines on the beatific vision; that is, the manner in which the blessed contemplate the face of God in the kingdom of Heaven. He maintained that the saints, before the coming of the Messiah, had been received into Abraham's bosom; that since the passion of Christ they had been placed under the altar of God, that is, under the protection of the humanity of Jesus Christ; and that after the judgment, they mounted upon the altar, that is, above the humanity of Jesus Christ; that they would, consequently, be gods; or, in other words, that they would contain the divinity, and see God face to face, according to the expression of Saint Paul, and with a perfect equality.

All the doctors in theology exclaimed against a proposition so bold, and accused the pope of heresy. Philip of Valois, himself, alarmed at the scandal, and the consequences which might result from it, immediately convened an assembly of doctors, bishops, and abbots, at his castle of Vincennes, and proposed these two questions to them:—"Do the souls of the saints now behold the face of God?" "Will this vision cease on the day of judgment to be replaced by another?" All replied to the first of these propositions in the affirmative, and added, that with regard to the beatific vision, it would not cease with the final judgment, but would exist through all eternity.

On this decision of the prelates, the king wrote to John the Twenty-second, that he must immediately retract his errors if he did not wish, notwithstanding his infallibility, to incur the penalty of heretics and be burned before his palace in Avignon. This threat compelled him to make the following declaration:—"We confess and believe that souls separated from the body, and purified, inhabit Paradise with the angels, and clearly contemplate God in his divine essence face to face. If we have preached or written any contrary proposition, we expressly revoke it."

The terror which the threats of Philip produced, brought on a grievous attack. From that moment he appeared no more in public, and when he perceived his end approaching, he called around him his cardinals to recommend his nephews to them. He died on the 4th of December, 1334, at the age of ninety. X

He had, during his reign, covered Germany and Italy with wars and disasters. He had caused more than ten thousand heretics to be burned by his inquisitors, and extorted at least fifty millions of florins of gold from the people of Europe. "After his death," says John Villani, "they found in his treasury eighteen millions of florins in coined money, besides his vessels, crosses, mitres, and precious stones, which were valued at seven millions of florins. I can render certain testimony to this," adds the historian, "because my brother, a man worthy of belief, who was one of the purveyors of the pontifical court, was at Avignon when the treasurers made their report to the cardinals. This immense wealth, and the still greater which the holy father had expended, were the proceeds of his industry, that is, of the sale of indulgences, benefices, dispensations, reserves, expectatives, and annates. But what contributed the most to increase his treasures, was the tax from the apostolical chancellors, for the absolution of all crimes."

We translate some of the articles of this infamous code, which alone should be sufficient to cause popes and their satellites to be held in detestation, if the list of their crimes had not already taught us that they were the most implacable enemies of humanity.

"If an ecclesiastic commits the sin of the flesh, whether with nuns, his cousins, nieces, goddaughters, or any other woman, he shall be absolved for the sum of sixty-seven francs, twelve sous.

"If, in addition to the sin of fornication, he asks for absolution from the sin against nature, or bestiality, he shall pay two hundred and nineteen francs, twelve sous. If, however, he has not committed this sin but with young men or beasts, and not with women, the fine shall be reduced to one hundred and thirty-one francs, fifteen sous.

"A priest who shall deflower a virgin shall pay two francs, eight sous.

"A nun who shall have abandoned herself to several men, simultaneously or in succession, in her monastery, and without it, and who shall wish to obtain the dignity of abbess, shall pay one hundred and thirty-one francs, fifteen sous.

"Priests who shall wish to obtain authority to live in concubinage with their relatives, shall pay seventy-six francs, one sou.

"For every sin of luxury committed by a layman, the absolution shall cost twenty-seven livres, one sou. For incest, four livres shall be added.

"An adulterous woman who desires absolution to place her beyond the reach of all pursuit, and to have a free dispensation to continue her guilty relations, shall pay to the pope eighty-seven francs, three sous. In a like case, a husband shall be submitted to the same tax. If they have committed incest with their children, they shall add six francs.

"Absolution and assurance against all pursuit, for the crimes of rapine, robbery, and incendiarism, shall cost the guilty one hundred and thirty-one francs, seven sous.

"Absolution for the simple murder of a layman is taxed at fifteen francs, four sous, eight deniers. If the assassin has slain several persons on the same day, he shall pay no more.

"A husband who shall have rudely struck his wife, shall pay into the chancellery three francs, four sous; if he kills her, he shall pay seventeen francs, fifteen sous; if he has committed this crime to marry another woman, he shall pay besides, thirty-two francs, nine sous. They who shall have assisted the husband in the murder, shall be absolved on the payment of two francs a head.

"He who shall have murdered his child, shall pay seventeen francs, fifteen sous. If the father and mother shall have slain their child by mutual consent, they shall pay twenty-seven francs, one sou, for absolution.

"The woman who shall destroy her child in her womb, and the father who shall aid in the crime, shall each pay seventeen francs, fifteen sous. He who shall procure the abortion of a child, of which he is not the father, shall pay a franc less.

"For the murder of a brother, a sister, a mother, or a father, they shall pay seventeen francs, fifteen sous!!!

"He who shall slay a bishop or superior prelate, shall pay one hundred and thirty-one francs, fourteen sous.

"If a murderer has slain several priests, in different encounters, he shall pay one hundred and thirty-seven francs, six sous for the first assassination, and half of that for the rest.

"A bishop or an abbot who shall have committed murder by an ambuscade, or through accident, or from necessity, shall pay one hundred and seventy-nine francs, fourteen sous, for absolution.

"He who would buy absolution in advance for every accidental murder which he may in future commit, shall pay one hundred and sixty-eight francs, fifteen sous.

"A converted heretic shall pay two hundred and sixty-nine francs for his absolution. The son of a burned heretic, or one put to death by any other torture, shall not be reinstated until he has paid into the chancellery two hundred and eighteen francs, seventeen sous.

"An ecclesiastic who cannot pay his debts, and who wishes to avoid the pursuits of his creditors, shall give to the pope seventeen francs, nine sous, and his debts shall be remitted.

"Permission to open a store to sell different kinds of commodities beneath the portico of a church, will be granted on the payment of forty-five francs, nineteen sous.

"For smuggling, and defrauding a prince of his dues, they shall pay eighty-seven francs.

"If a city demands permission for its inhabitants, priests, monks, and nuns, to eat food made of milk and meat, at forbidden seasons, it shall pay seven hundred and thirty-one francs, ten sous.

"If a monastery asks permission to change its rules, and to live in greater abstinence than before, it shall pay one hundred and forty-six francs, five sous.

"A virtuous monk, who desires to pass his life in a hermitage, shall pay into the treasury of the Holy See forty-five francs, nineteen sous.

"An apostate vagabond, who wishes to re-enter the pale of the church, shall pay a like sum to be absolved.

"Monks and priests who desire to travel in secular garments shall be subjected to a like tax.

"The bastard of a curate who desires to do parochial duty in the cure of his father, shall pay twenty-seven francs, one sou.

"A bastard who desires to receive sacred orders, and to possess benefices, shall pay fifteen francs, nineteen sous.

"A foundling who shall desire to enter into sacred orders, shall pay into the treasury of the pope twenty-seven francs, one sou.

"Lame or deformed laymen, who shall wish to receive sacred orders, or to hold benefices, shall pay to the apostolic chancellery fifty-eight francs two sous.

"One blind in the right eye shall pay a like sum; if he has lost his left, he shall give the pope one hundred and six francs, seven sous;

those who squint shall pay forty-five francs, three sous.

"Eunuchs shall give the pope, for permission to enter into sacred orders, three hundred francs, fifteen sous.

"If a man wishes to acquire one or more benefices by simony, he shall apply to the treasurers of the pope, who will sell him this right for a moderate price.

"He who shall desire to break his oath, and be guaranteed from all pursuit, and all infamy, shall pay to the pope one hundred and thirty-one francs, fifteen sous. He shall pay three francs a head besides, for those who shall have become his guarantees."

We will make no comments on this tax of the apostolic chancellery, a masterpiece of infamy, sprung from the brain of a pope, and containing in a few pages all the secrets of an institution which weighed down people and kings for more than fourteen centuries. The pious Conrad, abbot of Usperg, thus speaks of the book of the taxes of the Roman chancellery:—

"O Vatican, rejoice now, all treasures are open to thee,—thou canst draw in with full hands! Rejoice in the crimes of the children of men, since thy wealth depends on their abandonment and iniquity. Urge on to debauchery, excite to rape, incest, even parricide; for the greater the crime, the more gold will it bring thee. Rejoice thou! Shout forth songs of gladness! Now the human race is subjected to thy laws! Now thou reignest through depravity of morals and the inundation of ignoble thoughts. The children of men can now commit with impunity every crime, since they know that thou wilt absolve them for a little gold. Provided he brings thee gold, let him be soiled with blood and lust; thou wilt open the kingdom of heaven to debauchees, sodomites, assassins, parricides. What do I say? Thou wilt sell God himself for gold."

In fact, the tax exacted by John the Twenty-second, became for the popes, his successors, one of the most vast and fruitful financial operations that the avarice and infernal genius of the pontiffs ever invented

BENEDICT THE TWELFTH, THE TWO HUNDRED AND SECOND POPE.

[A. D. 1335:]

Election of the cardinal Jacques Fournier—His history before his pontificate—Portrait of him—He revokes the commendams and reversions—Secret as to the beatific vision—He refuses to go to Italy—His debaucheries at Avignon—His negotiations with the emperor—Proceedings against Frederick of Sicily—The Greek ambassadors at the court of the holy father—Bologna passes under the sway of the popes—Death of Benedict.

SOME days after the death of the infamous John the Twenty-second, the count de Noailles and the seneschal of Robert, king of Naples and count of Provence, arrested the twenty-four cardinals whom they found in the city, and shut them up in conclave in the pontifical palace of Avignon, after having informed them that they need not count upon being set at liberty until they had chosen a pontiff. The sacred college had been for a long time divided into two parties; the most powerful and numerous was unquestionably that of the French cardinals. They then agreed to choose a pope of their nation, and offered the tiara to Cominges, bishop of Porto, provided he would continue to dwell at Avignon, and would not transfer the pontifical court to Rome. He having refused to make this pledge, they united on the humblest of the members of the sacred college, the cardinal Jacques Fournier, of the order of the Citeaux, surnamed the White, from the colour of his frock. As soon as he knew of his promotion, the poor monk, rendering himself full justice, said to the cardinals: "You have chosen an ass to govern you, my brethren." He took the name of Benedict the Twelfth.

Jacques Fournier, or Dufour, was, according to some authors, the son of a pastry cook named William, of the city of Saverdun, in the countship of Foix; according to others—and their version is supported by more authentic witnesses than those of the first—he owed his birth to an incest of John the Twenty-second with his sister, and the pastry cook William was his adoptive father. The history of his early years seems to corroborate this opinion. The abbot of Boulbona took him, when very young, from the pastry cook William, without any apparent motive, to rear him in his abbey; he was then sent to Paris with a considerable allowance to study theology and law. Having finished his studies, the rich abbey of Fontfroide was given to him; and some time afterwards John the Twenty-second made him bishop of Pamiers and a cardinal. He was endowed with an excellent judgment; but his studies in theology and the canon law had so absorbed his faculties, that he was unfit for temporal affairs.

Though the son of John the Twenty-second, the new pontiff had no exterior resemblance to his father. John was small, with a pale face, and a feeble voice. Benedict, on the contrary, was large, and high coloured, with a loud toned voice. John was avaricious—Benedict very liberal. He was submitted to the usual tests, and solemnly crowned in the church of the Preaching Brothers at Avignon, on the 8th of January, 1335.

In a consistory which was held soon after, the holy father ordered the stranger prelates and curates, to leave at once the pontifical court and return to their dioceses, under penalty of ecclesiastical censures. He also wrote to the bishops of the kingdom of Castile, to urge them to reform the conduct of their priests. "We have been advised," he said, to them in his bull, "that the ecclesiastics of your provinces live publicly with concubines, commit adulteries, incests, robberies, and murders, pillage the farmers and burn their houses, in hopes of being acquitted by the payment of a few pence to our treasurer. As these disorders bring our religion into contempt in the eyes of the Mohammedans of the neighbouring cities, and prevent them from being baptized, we exhort you to put an end to them, informing you that we are not disposed to pardon crimes for money, as it pleased our predecessor to do."

Benedict published a second bull, condemnatory of the doctrine of John on the beatific vision, and framed his opinion of the state of the soul in heaven, in these terms:—"The souls of saints who left the world before the passion of Christ; those of the apostles, martyrs, and other faithful who died without having been baptized; those of baptized infants who have died before the age of reason, have all been received into paradise as soon as they were separated from their bodies.—From that moment they have lived with the angels, and have seen the Divinity with an intuitive vision, and face to face, without the aid of any creature interposed between them and God. By this vision they enjoy the divine essence which gives to them repose and eternal life, that is, which renders them entirely and uninterruptedly happy throughout eternity. On the other hand, souls which die in a state of mortal sin descend to hell, to be there tormented eternally by bad angels, without the hope of seeing an end of their pains, even at the last judgment. We shall, then, regard as heretics, and treat as such, those who in future shall have the temerity knowingly to advance any propositions contrary to this bull." Thus the doctrine imposed on the faithful by one infallible pope, was condemned by another equally infallible.

Benedict did not stop at this first step in his reforms; he revoked the commendams, or friar's benefices, which his predecessors had sold to the ecclesiastics, as well as the briefs of reversions and annates. This last impost, invented by John the Twenty-second, consisted in levying on the bishoprics or abbeys which were given to new titularies, one year's revenue for the benefit of the Holy See. Finally, he employed every method in his power to drive simony from the pontifical court; and if he did not entirely succeed, he should be at least praised for his good intentions.

Some historians, however, maintain that this great disinterestedness had its source in interested policy, and that Benedict had only in view the restoration of some regard for his trade of pope, which had been so much weakened by his predecessors. It is true, that the wealth amassed by John the Twenty-second afforded him the means of abandoning traffic in indulgences and absolutions; and if he had been really virtuous, we would not have to relate a fact which attests the corruption of his morals.

Hieronimo Squarciafico affirms, that Benedict did all in his power to seduce the sister of the poet Petrarch, named Selvaggia, and was remarkably beautiful, and that this young girl informed her brother of it. He adds, that Petrarch having gone to the pontifical palace to complain energetically to the holy father, the dissolute old man proposed to pay him a considerable sum for the virginity of Selvaggia, and to give him, besides, a cardinal's hat. The indignant poet rejected the infamous proposal with a virtuous energy. Benedict then, in revenge for his refusal, denounced him to the inquisitors as a heretic. Petrarch escaped from Avignon, but was compelled to leave his young sister in the care of his brother Gerard. This wretch could not resist his thirst for gold, and in the night, this poor young girl, who was scarcely sixteen years old, was carried off from his house, borne to the pontifical palace, and abandoned to the monstrous caresses of a corrupt old man.

Some time afterwards, Benedict received, in a solemn audience, some Roman deputies who came to entreat him, in the name of their fellow citizens, to re-establish the residence of the popes in the holy city, explaining to him in full consistory, that the pontiffs and cardinals were better located among a people accustomed to their morals, and who were not scandalised at seeing virgins and youths serving their pleasure. These reasons convinced the mind by their justness, and the cardinals, after consultation with the pope, replied to the ambassadors, that his holiness consented to return to Rome, and would at last fix the period of his departure from France.

Several important motives compelled the holy father to defer his entrance into Italy. At first he feared lest he should fall into the power of Petrarch, who had thrown himself into the party of the Ghibelines. Then he wished to be assured of the possession of Bologna, to make it a point of support against his enemies. But the nuncios whom he sent to the Bolognese to treat of peace found them so exasperated against the court of Avignon, that they had to quit the city at once, to avoid being taken by the Ghibelines. Benedict judged that, under such unfavourable circumstances, it was imprudent to dream of re-establishing the Holy See at Rome, and he resolved to fix definitively the sojourn of the pontiffs at Avignon. He consequently laid the foundations of a magnificent palace, surrounded by castellated walls and towers, which were to place the pope out of the reach of every danger.

He soon, however, discovered that these walls, high as they were, could not, in case of war, protect him against the kings of France, and he bent all his cares to preserve the good graces of Philip. This prince, on his side, knowing the weakness of Benedict's character, did not hesitate to demand new privileges which the pope dared not refuse to grant. He claimed for his eldest son, the post of vicar of the empire in Italy, and for himself the right of levying tithes in his kingdom for ten years, and of dividing with the pope the treasures of the church, under the pretext of paying the expenses of an expedition which he was preparing against the infidels. These exaggerated demands alarmed the pontifical court; and as they dared not resist the prince openly, they excited secret enemies against him, and sent emissaries into England, to induce Edward the Third to invade the kingdom of Philip, with the promise that the pope would ratify his usurpation. Edward embraced the plan with ardour; he took the title of king of England and France, roused Flanders, and went to lay siege to Tournay, in person. It was in this war that the French first employed fire arms, as is authentically proved in a memoir of Bartholomew de Prach, war minister, dated 1338.

The holy father, not content with having drawn a terrible war on France, wished, in case of a reverse, to assure himself of protection against the French monarch, and endeavoured to reconcile himself with Louis of Bavaria. He dared not, however, ostensibly, take the initiative in this step; and he sent some prelates of his party to induce the prince to send to him a solemn embassy to open negotiations between the Holy See and the empire.

Louis of Bavaria received these overtures for peace very favourably, and sent several deputies to Avignon, to place in the hand of the pope a deed by which the prince declared that he revoked the decrees which had been made against John the Twenty-second, and annihilated the edicts published at Rome against the privileges of the church. He promised, moreover, to make all equitable concessions that could be asked of him, in order to arrive at a durable peace. As the French cardinals were present at the audience of reception, Benedict dared not give a definite answer to the envoys of the emperor. He only told them that he and his cardinals would see with great joy, Germany, that noble branch, reunited to the church to augment its strength. He eulogised Louis of Bavaria, and added, that the disorders in Italy, and the loss of Armenia and the Holy Land, were to be attributed to the vacancy in the empire, and not to that prince whom he regarded as the noblest knight in Christendom. He finished his harangue by promising to grant in a few days the absolution of the anathemas as pronounced by the dead pope. As soon as Philip and Robert of Naples were informed of the determination of the pontiff, they hastened to send deputies to Avignon, who bribed the most influential members of the Sacred College; they then demanded a public audience of the pope, and, in the presence of the cardinals, reproached him for the preference he had given a heretic over their masters, and threatened to denounce him to the inquisition as a favourer of heresy.

Benedict, surprised at so direct an attack, turned towards his cardinals: "Eh, what," he said to them, "do the kings of France and Naples pretend to put an end to the empire of the West?"—"No, most holy father," they replied, "they only blame the choice you have made of Louis of Bavaria, who is the prince—who, of all others, has done the most injury to the church." "You lie," replied Benedict; "it is you who have fulminated unjust anathemas against that king; and his submission is so great, that he would have come here as Henry the Fourth did, in his shirt, and with scales in his hands, to implore the mercy of our predecessor, if he had been permitted."

This energetic reply imposed on the cardinals sold to Philip and Robert; they no longer dared to oppose the opinion of the pope, and feigned to enter into his views, contenting themselves with pointing out to him, that the kings of Bohemia, Hungary, Poland, France, and Naples, and the dukes of Austria and Bavaria, had formed a league against Louis, and were pledged to establish another king of the Romans. Benedict, who had not in reality any strength of will, yielded, little by little, to their reasoning, asked for a delay to deliberate on what he should do, and dismissed the deputies of Louis, without absolving their master. The latter seeing the ill success of his embassy, learned that he must no longer count upon an accommodation with the court of Avignon, and resolved to cast off for ever the insupportable yoke of the church. In order, however, not to submit himself to the lightest reproach, he convened in the city of Spire an assembly of prelates, who decided to send, in the name of the German clergy, a deputation to the holy father to demand the absolution of their sovereign; and to inform him, that if their prayer was not regarded, they would assemble anew, and arrange measures definitely to render the empire independent of the popes.

Benedict received the delegates with great honours, and said to them in private, "I would take off the censures pronounced against your prince, but I cannot do it without the consent of the king of France, Philip of Valois, who, if I were to disobey him, would treat me with more indignity than Philip the Handsome treated Boniface." This last effort of the emperor at the pontifical, did not lead to the result it was hoped it would: it only contributed to strengthen his authority; for the German bishops and princes, indignant at the of the pope, immediately convened a primary electoral diet at Rens. All the electors, except the king of Bohemia, were present; they declared that they alone had the right to confer the imperial dignity, and that the chief whom they chose had no need of the approval of the pope, in order to be clothed with the imperial dignity. Louis of Bavaria, seeing the disposition of their minds, was not content with this first success. He convened a new diet at Frankfort, and caused them to decree the famous pragmatic sanction, which declared the emperor responsible to God alone, and condemned the censures of the church against him as crimes of lèse-majesty. The doctor Albert, of Strasburg, was commissioned by the electors to inform the court of Avignon of the decision of the princes of the empire.

As soon as Benedict was informed of these proceedings, he protested against their tenor, lanced terrible bulls against Louis of Bavaria, and sent a circular to the different kings of Europe, to engage them to take up arms against his enemy. Following the example of his predecessor, he declared the throne vacant, and named himself protector of the empire; Luquin Visconti was appointed his vicar in Italy; Guelphs were appointed by him governors of the cities of Verona, Parma, and Vicenza; the lords of Gonzaga received the two cities of Mantua and Reggio, as an appanage; and the marquis of Ferrara, the territory of Modena, paying therefor an annual rent of five thousand florins of gold, and engaging to maintain, at his expense, two hundred knights, and three hundred well-armed foot soldiers, ready to combat for the church on the first requisition by the pope. Still further to assure himself of a powerful auxiliary in lower Italy, he resolved to take away the kingdom of Sicily from Peter the Second to bestow it on Robert, king of Naples; and, for this purpose, he sent orders to Goa, the titular patriarch of Constantinople, and to Natier, bishop of Vaison, his two nuncios at Naples, to go to Palermo and excommunicate Peter of Arragon, his children, and other heirs; to declare them deprived of the possession of Sicily, and to pronounce the junction of that island to the estates of King Robert, by virtue of the sovereign authority of the Holy See. In spite, however, of the anathemas of the pope, Peter maintained himself on his throne, and struggled courageously with King Robert, who could only seize the small islands of Zerbi and Lipari.

The cardinals at the same period induced Benedict to make some efforts to assure to the Holy See the possession of Rome. The greater part of the senate was bribed, and two lords who were sold to the clergy, Stephen Colonna and the count of Languillara, were appointed consuls for five years. The holy father was then occupied with the affairs of the Bolognese, who had been excommunicated, deprived of their academy, and all the privileges which had been granted them by emperors and pontiffs. The powerless wrath of Benedict, at first, produced no other result than to excite the raillery of the excommunicated against him; but when they found the pontifical court was gaining some preponderance in Italy, they followed the example of the other cities, and asked to be received into favour, which was granted them, on the payment of an annual tribute of eight thousand florins in gold.

Benedict had not time to profit by the reaction in favour of the popes, which was taking place. In consequence of excesses at the table, and nocturnal debaucheries, he suffered from violent fits of the gout; his limbs were covered with hideous sores, and he died on the 23d of April, 1342, after a reign of seven years, four months, and six days. He was buried in the cathedral at Avignon; the holy father, who exhibited so much disinterestedness in the early part of his reign, became afterwards as greedy and avaricious as his predecessors, and they found after his death, in the treasury of the church, immense sums, which were of great assistance to the cardinals in the subjugation of Italy. After his death, Benedict was declared a saint, by a miracle, and his name was placed in the Gallican Martyrology.

There flourished a singular sect during his pontificate, who were called the Quietists of Mount Athos. These fanatics pretended to have pushed the perfection of prayer so far, as to see God with their corporal eyes, when they had attained the supreme quietude. They prayed as follows: the newly initiated monk shut himself up in his cell, seated himself in a corner, then having rolled up his frock under his armpits, he rested his chin on his breast, turned his eyes with all his thoughts towards the middle of his belly, held his breath, even through the nose, and sought in his entrails, the power of his soul. At first, says the Abbot Simon de Xeroquerque, the inventor of this singular mode of prayer, in his instructions to his disciples, you will see but thick darkness; but then by renewing your prayer twenty-one times, you will experience a surprising joy; the spirit will have found the place of the heart, it will perceive the atmosphere of the soul, and will contemplate itself shining with light, and filled with discernment.—According to these sectaries, the navel was the seat of the soul, which caused them to be called Omphalopsques.—Quietism is one of the most curious and singular aberrations to which the idleness of the cloister has given birth.

THE Holy See remained vacant only eleven days after the death of Benedict. The cardinals, to the number of twenty-two, having assembled in conclave, agreed unanimously to divide the treasures of the church among themselves, and to choose as sovereign pontiff the most corrupt of all, the famous cardinal of Nerea, who took the name of Clement the Sixth. He was the son of Peter Roger, lord of Rosière, who, intending him for the church, caused him to enter the abbey of Chaise-Dieu in Auvergne, at ten years of age, where his beauty procured for him the honour of being distinguished by the abbot of the Benedictines, who made him his minion. The young monk, on arriving at manhood, quitted his convent, went to Paris to finish his theological studies, and obtained the grade of doctor, and the abbey of Fecamp; he was then made bishop of Arras, and Benedict at last created him cardinal archbishop of Rouen. When he was proclaimed pope, he led so dissolute a life, that he had been obliged to abandon his benefices to his numerous creditors, so that he showed no difficulty in complying with the requisitions of the cardinals.

"You ask me to divide the treasures of the chancellery," said the new pope to the members of the conclave; "I joyfully consent, and you will see the necessity of refilling, for a pope who knows how to exercise his trade." In fact, in less than a year, the sale of apostolical offices, annates, reversions, commendams, with the taxes and confiscations of the property of heretics, by the tribunals of the inquisition, had repaired all his losses, and supplied the enormous expenses of his mistresses and minions. Clement pushed the scandal of immorality so far as to glory in his depravity. Courtezans, great dames, and beautiful pages, entered his sleeping chamber in the presence of all, and were waited upon by the chamberlains, even on the very bed of the holy father. Thus the clergy of Avignon became so dissolute from the example of the pontiff, that the smallest clerk considered himself dishonoured, if he had not attached to his person some minion or several girls of a dissolute life. Though universally recognised as the most corrupt of the cardinals, Clement was none the less submitted to the proof of the pierced chair. On the day succeeding his consecration, he promoted ten cardinals, among whom were his brother Hugh Roger, and his nephew, William de la Jugie, the faithful companions of his orgies.

The kings of Europe hastened to send their ambassadors to the new pope, to congratulate him; a great number of Italian cities imitated this example, and Rome, that degenerate city, which aspired constantly to the disgrace of being called the pontifical city, sent a solemn deputation of eighteen citizens to him, at the head of whom were the republicans, Nicholas Rienzi and Petrarch. They were commissioned to offer the pope, in the name of their fellow citizens, the posts of first senator and captain of the city, provided he would return to Rome, and reduce the interval of the two jubilees, from one hundred to fifty years, in order to multiply the causes of the prosperity of Italy, and increase the imposts of the holy city.

Clement accepted the dignities and magistracies which were offered to him, and assured the ambassadors, that he had the re-establishing of the Holy See in Italy much at heart, and that he would engage to do it as soon as it was possible. As a proof of the sincerity of his words, he fixed the period of the new jubilee for the year 1350. The following was the bull published on the occasion:—"The Son of God, by expiring on the cross, my brethren, has acquired for us a treasure of indulgences, which is increased by the infinite merits of the Holy Virgin, the martyrs, and the saints; for you know that the dispensation of these riches belongs to the successors of St. Peter. Boniface the Eighth has already ordered the faithful to make a pilgrimage to the churches of Saint Peter and Saint Paul, and his bull grants entire absolution of sin to those who make this journey at the commencement of each century. We, however consider that in the Mosaic law, which Jesus Christ came to accomplish spiritually, the fiftieth year is that of Jubilee or the remission of debts; for this reason, then, on account of the short duration of human life, and that the greatest number of Christians may participate in this indulgence, we grant full and entire absolution to those who shall visit the churches of the two apostles, and that of St. John of the Lateran, in the year 1315, during thirty days, if Romans, and during five months, if strangers." This done, the pontiff dismissed the ambassadors, loaded with marks of honour, especially Petrarch, whose reputation was the glory of Italy, and whom he wished to attach to his cause.

Robert of Naples had died, leaving to his grand-daughter Joanna immense treasures, and a throne which her youth prevented her as yet from occupying. Not to leave her without a protector, he had, however, already married her to Andrew of Hungary, the son of Charibert: and by his will had appointed Philip Cabassole, and the queen Donna Sancha, of Arragon, to administer the kingdom of Naples. They wished to exercise the rights of regents immediately on the death of Robert, but Clement opposed them, under the pretext that that kingdom, emanating from the Holy See, should revert to the pope until the majority of Joanna, which was fixed at twenty-five years. He published a bull which broke the will of the king, as trampling upon the privileges of the church; and annulled the proceedings of Philip Cabassole and Donna Sancha, as irregular and usurped. He sent the cardinal Aimeric de Chastelus, in the capacity of apostolic vicar, to seize the reins of government, to receive the liege homage of Joanna, and to crown her. He then confided the tutelage of the young queen to depraved females, who were certain to make a monster of lubricity of her. What mattered it to Clement that sovereigns should render themselves contemptible in the eyes of the people? His policy was to elevate the chair of St. Peter above the thrones of kings, and all means by which he could reach that end were to him good.

Assured of Sicily, he turned against Germany, and lighted the fire of civil war in the empire. His emissaries distributed gold freely, and induced the cities of Italy, which had remained faithful to Louis of Bavaria, to revolt. He caused the bulls which John the Twenty-second had proclaimed against the emperor, to be fulminated in Germany, France, England, and the whole Roman peninsula, and added this imprecation to them:—"May the divine wrath—may the anger of St. Peter and St. Paul light on Louis of Bavaria, in this world and the next—may the earth engulf him alive! May the elements be adverse to him, and his children perish before his eyes, massacred by the hands of his enemies." He was, however, obliged to suspend the effects of his vengeance, having been warned by the French ambassadors that Philip had need of the emperor, and that he forbade him from continuing his furious denunciations of that prince. Clement, not daring to disobey the injunctions of his powerful ally, retracted his bulls, and contented himself with citing Louis of Bavaria before the court of Avignon, to be judged by the sacred college. Instead of going before the holy father, or sending deputies to him, Louis wrote simply to the king of France:—"If Clement undertakes any proceeding against us, we will hold you responsible for it:—we salute you." Philip, who feared the arms of the Germans, immediately informed the holy father that he was to proceed no farther.

Forced to abandon his plans against the empire, the pope cast himself on England. He distributed the benefices of that kingdom among the new cardinals, whose revenues were insufficient to maintain the luxury of their establishments; he granted to them the richest abbeys, the best churches, and the wealthiest dioceses, granting them, besides, authority to send agents into Great Britain to take possession of them in their name, that they might spend the revenues at his court. But King Edward did not exhibit the docility he had hoped for: his officers drove off the French priests who went to take possession of the benefices for the cardinals.

Clement endeavoured to implant in Edward sentiments less hostile to his interests, and wrote to him:—"We have learned, my son, that you have published edicts which tend to destroy ecclesiastical liberty, the primacy of the Roman church, and the authority of the Holy See. You cannot be ignorant that Jesus Christ himself gave to the apostles and their successors, authority to govern the world. You know that, by virtue of this power, the popes have founded patriarchal churches, or metropolitan churches, cathedrals, and secondary churches, and have established the hierarchy of the clergy. For many ages there has been no change. The full and entire disposal of ecclesiastical honours, dignities, and wealth, has always pertained to the popes. You have then rendered yourself guilty of a great sin, by authorising the persecutions against the agents of our cardinals, and by hindering the execution of our favours. We now send you our internuncios Nicholas, the metropolitan of Ravenna, and Peter, bishop of Astorga, with powers to assemble a council which shall abolish every edict, or declaration contrary to our authority, and who will pronounce an anathema against you, if your officers or people refuse us obedience."

This letter was not more successful than the bull. Edward replied to the pope, that he was scandalised by seeing the wealth of his kingdom at the mercy of the court of Avignon; that "Shepherds should cherish their lambs, and not shear nor slay them; that this work appertained to kings, and that for the future he would dispose of the ecclesiastical benefices as William the Conqueror had done."

Clement, repulsed in England, had at least the consolation of seeing, that France did not contest his right of sovereignty over the kingdoms of the earth. He received a solemn embassy from Philip de Valois, at the head of which was Louis de la Cerda, usually called Louis of Spain, because he was descended from Ferdinand, the eldest son of Alphonso the Wise, king of Castile, and of Blanche, the daughter of St. Louis. This prince came to ask from his holiness the proprietorship of the Fortunate Isles, now called the Canaries, which he said were inhabited by infidels, and which he engaged to conquer, to bring the inhabitants to a knowledge of the Christian religion. The pontiff acceded to his desires, and proclaimed him king of these countries, with absolute power over their temporal affairs, subject to an annual rent of four hundred florins in gold to the church; and he placed on his brow a crown of gold, as a sign of investiture. This ceremony did not, however, prevent Louis de la Cerda from dying before he made the conquest of the Canaries.

In the beginning of the year 1344, the emperor again endeavoured to reconcile himself to the holy father; and sent an embassy to Philip of Valois, to request him to inform him of the causes which prevented the maintenance of peace between the empire and the church. As it was difficult to reply to a demand thus distinctly expressed, the king sent the deputies to the pope, accompanied by officers of his court.

Clement, having heard the messages of the two sovereigns, called to him one of his cardinals, and dictated to him a form of a request for pardon, with conditions so humiliating for Louis of Bavaria, that a conquered prince, beneath the sword of an enemy, should not have accepted them. This letter of the holy father was expedited at once to the emperor, who, contrary to the expectation of the court of Avignon, declared he would accept the conditions offered him; and swore, in the presence of the prothonotary of the pope, that he was ready to execute them. This resolution of the prince surprised Clement greatly; and he could not avoid saying, on reading his letter, "This man is much embarrassed; but he is more embarrassing."

In fact, four German ambassadors presented themselves before the sacred college, and swore, in the name of their master, in accordance with the orders of the pope, to avow the heresies attributed to him, to renounce the empire, and place himself, his children, wealth, and estates, at the disposal of the pontiff. They then besought Clement to remit by them, in writing, the articles of penance which he wished to impose on Louis of Bavaria; and informed him, that they had orders not to quit Avignon until they had obtained them, so anxious was the emperor to reconcile himself with the church. The holy father then gave them only requirements relative to the constitution of the empire, and not to the person of the prince. It was an immense blunder on the part of the pope, of which Louis took advantage. He immediately sent orders to the electors and to the estates to assemble in a general diet, in the city of Frankfort. He joined to his letter of convocation a copy of the penance which the holy father had imposed on him; and in which, among others, was this article:—"The emperor shall make an edict, to subject to the punishment of fire those of his subjects who shall refuse to recognise that the empire is a benefice of the pope."

These cruel orders and exaggerated pretensions discontented the members of the assembly, who immediately made this reply to Louis of Bavaria:—"Lord, the electors and other vassals of the empire, having examined the conditions which the pope imposes on you, as the terms of your reconciliation with the church, declare, that they all tend to the destruction of the empire; and, that neither you nor they can accept them. They have consequently decided, that a deputation should be sent to Avignon, to request the pope to desist from his intentions; and to inform him, that if he refuses to do justice to our claims, we have determined to resist with all the means in our power, his enterprises against our liberty."

The ambassadors of the princes of the empire, in fact, went to the holy father, and informed him of the objections of the diet of Frankfort to the singular articles of penance which he had imposed on Louis of Bavaria. Clement, at this opening, became very angry, and drove away the deputies, without being willing to give them any reply. He then commenced very secret negotiations with a prince of the House of Luxemburg; with John, king of Bohemia; with Charles, marquis of Moravia, his son; and with Baldwin, archbishop of Treves, to assure himself of vengeance. We shall soon see the deplorable results of this coalition.

If the policy of the holy father was powerless to procure for him a triumph in England and Germany, it had at least succeeded in Italy, and especially in Naples, where queen Joanna left all the power of the kingdom to the cardinal Aimeric, in order to occupy herself at her ease with pleasure and debauchery. The young queen, through the lessons of depravity which she had received, though she had scarcely attained her sixteenth year, deserved to be compared to Messalina. She had already received into the royal couch the lords of the court, simple guards, and even sailors of the port. Her husband Andrew, enervated by her lascivious caresses, and unable longer to respond to her desires, excited her hatred, and he was found one morning cast from the window of his bed-room, after having been strangled with a cord of silk. It was published the next day through Naples, that secret enemies had entered the palace and assassinated the king. No one dared to fathom this terrible mystery. The pope, even, though informed of the true circumstances of the murder, by the cardinal Aimeric, lanced a bull against the guilty, without naming them; he contented himself with declaring them infamous, deprived of all dignities, incapable of making a will or any lawful act; he confiscated to himself their wealth and domains, freed their vassals and subjects from their oaths of fidelity, and pronounced an interdict on the land into which they should retire, with penalties against those who granted them aid or asylum; and, finally, he took all the measures which his policy suggested to him, to prepare for the moment on which he could, without striking a blow, seize on the throne of Naples.

But the crime of Joanna had excited so great an indignation among the kings of Europe, that it was feared lest an avenger should arise to call her to account. She perceived this, and hastened to write to Louis the Great the king of Hungary, her brother-in-law, to free herself from the suspicion of having murdered her husband. Her letters received only doubtful replies, and she learned that Louis had placed himself at the head of a powerful army, to invade her kingdom, and avenge his brother. In this extremity, she sought a protector in one of her lovers, her cousin Louis of Tarentum, whom she married. Notwithstanding the talents and courage of the young prince, the Hungarians seized on Naples, and compelled the sovereigns to take refuge in the city of Avignon, which belonged to the queen. Clement received Joanna favourably, and even experienced a violent passion for her, of which she feigned to partake, in order to attach him to her cause; the ruse, however, only half succeeded, for the pope would not consent to reinstate his new mistress on the throne of Naples, and absolve her from the murder of Andrew, unless she would surrender the sovereignty of Avignon to him. The bargain was soon concluded, and they stipulated as the price of the purchase, that he should give eighty thousand florins in gold for it, which was never paid. Such were the rights of property of the Holy See over this territory for six centuries,—rights which they have only recently abandoned.

The pontiff at once declared himself openly the protector of Joanna; he lanced terrible bulls against his enemies, praised the innocence, mildness, and purity of the queen in the presence of the ambassadors of all the Christian princes, assembled in consistory, and threatened Louis the Great with ecclesiastical thunders, if he persisted in keeping the kingdom of Naples. The young king was thus compelled to forego his vengeance, and return to his kingdom. Joanna returned in triumph to her capital, and plunged anew into such excesses, that her court was only equalled in depravity by that of the sovereign pontiff.

Clement the Sixth, master of the city and territory of Avignon, showed more audacity than before; he renewed his attacks on Louis of Bavaria, published a bull against that prince, declared him infamous, and a heretic, deposed him from the empire, and enjoined the electors to proceed at once to the election of a king of the Romans.

John of Luxemburg, king of Bohemia, and Charles his eldest son, went to Avignon to sign the secret treaty with the pope, which was to assure to them the empire; other pretenders took the same steps, and sought to obtain the protection of the holy father. Clement was extremely embarrassed how to decide among these conflicting interests, and he instructed the cardinals assembled in consistory, to choose the king of the Romans. But, as each of the cardinals had received large sums, to sustain the interests of different pretenders, there resulted a division which had almost proved fatal to the cardinals. At first they abused each other vehemently; then from words, they came to blows; the officers and domestics then took the part of their masters, and the mêlée became general. Several prelates received severe wounds, and the pope himself had a shoulder put out of joint by the blow of a club. At length, by the intervention of wise men, tranquillity was restored; the cardinals reassembled in the chamber of the holy father, and it was decided to give the empire to the son of the king of Bohemia, Charles of Luxemburg, who made more magnificent promises than any of his competitors.

They were as follows: "If I am king of the Romans," said the prince, in the secret treaty which the pope showed to the prelates of his court, "I pledge myself to maintain all the concessions which the emperor Henry the Seventh my grandfather, and his predecessors made to the Holy See. I will not seek to occupy, or acquire by any means, the cities of Rome or Ferrara, or other land and places which belong to the church, whether with or without Italy, as in the kingdoms of Sicily, Sardinia, and Corsica, and the territory of Avignon. I will not enter Rome before the day of my coronation, and I will leave it with my people immediately after the ceremony, not to return but at the command of the holy father; and finally, I will ratify all my promises at the time of my consecration."

"It was not difficult," says Maimburg, "for Clement to have Charles chosen emperor, for the cardinals knew he was sustained by the king of Bohemia, his father, and by Baldwin of Luxemburg, archbishop of Treves, his great uncle. His only adversary was Henry of Virneburg, archbishop of Mayence, an avowed partizan of Louis of Bavaria; the pope freed himself of him, by deposing him, and appointing in his place the young Count de Gerlac, of Nassau, a canon of the same diocese, who had sold him his suffrage. Valderan of Juillers, the metropolitan of Cologne, was bought for eight thousand marks of silver; Rodolph, duke of Saxony, who was greedier, obtained fifteen thousand, and at length, all the electors having been gained, the diet assembled at Rents, near Coblenz, in the diocese of Treves, and proclaimed Charles marquis of Moravia, king of the Romans." This election was confirmed by a bull, in which Clement declared, that God had given to the popes supreme power over the celestial empire and the kingdoms of the earth. Some months afterwards, Louis of Bavaria, so say the chroniclers, died of poison, but whether administered by the pope, or his competitor, no one could tell. Charles, recognised as king of the Romans and future emperor, a second title as illusory as the first, exercised, however, no influence over Germany; the high Germanic aristocracy possessed the real power, and the new Cæsar had to content himself with the insignia of royalty.

This same year a revolt broke out in Florence against the grand inquisitor, Peter of Aquila, a knavish, sordid, and cruel monk. It was on this occasion: the grand inquisitor had bought, at a low price, from the cardinal Peter Gomez de Banos, a debt of twelve thousand florins of gold, against the firm of the Acciapoli of Florence, who threatened to suspend payment. He desired to avail himself of the terror which his terrible office produced for him, to put himself in possession of the wealth of the firm through the regency of the republic, and obtained, in fact, sufficient security to assure himself of the entire payment of his debt. Not satisfied with these measures, he caused Sylvester Baroncelli, one of the principals of the firm, to be brought from his palace by three officers of the inquisition, and plunged in the dungeons of the holy office, until the debt was entirely paid. Fortunately, Sylvester could call for aid: the people assembled, and rescued him from the hands of the officers, who were themselves handed over to the captain of Florence, and condemned to have their hands cut off for having touched a free-citizen. After the execution they were transported beyond the territories of the republic, and banished for ten years. The people then rushed to the house of the inquisitor, who had escaped out of the city to avoid the fate of his myrmidons, and pillaged his palace.

Peter d'Aquila, who had taken refuge at Sienna, immediately excommunicated the captain, and declared Florence under interdict if, within eight days, Sylvester Baroncelli was not sent to him, bound hand and foot. The Florentines appealed to the court of Avignon against this iniquitous measure, and deputed two commissioners to the true creditor of the house of Acciapoli, who paid, on account, five thousand florins; and pledged themselves, in the name of the republic, to pay the seven thousand, which were still due, in the following year. After having set things thus aright, they deposited, in the hands of the holy father, a complaint against Aquila, and proved, by authentic records, that this unworthy legate was in the habit of accusing the young girls of Florence of heresy, in order to confine them in his prisons, that he might glut his horrid passions on them. They also showed that rich citizens of the republic had been tortured by this monster until they paid him large sums. Clement, yielding to their entreaties, consented to punish the inquisitor, provided the republic would pay him ten thousand florins in gold. The Florentines sent the money which was required, and obtained from the pope a decree, which provided that, in future, no inquisitor should inflict pecuniary penalties on heretics, and should only condemn them to the scaffold. They suppressed the prison especially designed for the prisoners of the inquisition; and it was decided that persons accused of heresy should be incarcerated in the public prisons: and, finally, the inquisitor was formally prohibited from having more than six familiars.

Peter d'Aquila, whom such a decree struck in his dearest interests, went at once to Avignon and offered to the holy father twenty thousand florins if he would repeal his first ordinance and confirm the excommunication lanced against Florence. Clement received the money from the inquisitor, and without further formality erased the decree, approved of the sentence of anathema uttered by Aquila, and cited the bishop of Florence, the podesta, the priors, and the captain, to appear before the sacred college, to be judged as guilty of rebellion against the church. They only shunned the condemnation by reinstating the inquisitor in his former privileges, and by paying a new fine to the court of Avignon.

Whilst Florence was thus submitting cowardly to the pontifical despotism, the Romans were assembling in arms at the call of Nicholas de Gabrino, surnamed Rienzi, and were breaking the chains of slavery.

Nicholas, the son of a mere tavern-keeper, sprung from the ranks of the people, had, from his youth, given a promise of what he would one day be. His aptness for study, and the rapid progress which he made at the first schools, determined his parents to husband all their resources to defray the expense which the culture of letters involved at that period. The young Nicholas responded to the hopes of his family; he addicted himself with ardour to the study of the Roman orators, and drank in, in meditating on their works, a deep veneration for republican institutions.

At the time that he was acquiring a profound knowledge of the manners and laws of antiquity, he was seeking, by his eloquence, to lead the masses to the worship of freedom. Rome, though freed from popes and emperors, was still governed by nobles, who were shut up in their palaces, or in the monuments transformed into citadels, from whence they exercised every kind of brigandage against the citizens, pillaging their property, violating their wives, and massacring them without pity. The poor, even, were not beyond the reach of their cruelty; they murdered them in the streets or public places, to seize on their rags. The generous Nicholas Rienzi was moved at so deplorable a sight, and swore implacable hatred to these tyrants. He at first induced the citizens to send a deputation to Avignon to entreat the pontiff to punish his representatives in the holy city, and to give repose to the ancient city of Brutus and Cassius. But the deputation having been unable to obtain any redress from that greedy, debauched, and proud priest, who was solely occupied with the care of extending his sway, and increasing his wealth, Nicholas resolved to call the Romans to liberty, and by the power of his eloquence to re-establish the reign of the laws. There existed not a monument, a public place, a stone in Rome that did not present the theme of a discourse which he addressed to his fellow citizens, as a lesson which the past had bequeathed to the future. At length his burning eloquence rallied an immense crowd to his views; and on the 20th of May, 1347, the republic was proclaimed, before the church of St. John of Piscina, without tumult and without fighting. Nicholas de Rienzi was conducted to the capitol, and the title of Tribune and Liberator of Rome decreed to him.

The new tribune perceived that, in order to assure the triumph of the popular cause, he must exercise extreme prudence in his new authority. He at first united himself to the legate of the pope, to avoid having three enemies to contend against at once, the nobles, the Holy See, and the emperor. He then established order in the city, by organising a regular military, and driving the turbulent barons out of it: and, finally, by his wise administration, brought back peace and plenty to his country. He sent ambassadors to the cities of Italy, and the different courts of Europe, to inform them of the re-establishment of the Roman republic. His letters were written with such persuasive eloquence, and love for the public good was expressed with such evident sincerity, that Rienzi's epistles communicated his enthusiasm to all minds. Kings themselves received his deputies respectfully. Louis of Bavaria recognised the republic; Joanna of Naples sought the friendship of the tribune; Louis of Hungary chose him as the arbiter in his quarrel with the Queen in regard to the murder of his brother Andrew; and such is the magical power of that word, Republic, that Rienzi, the son of an Italian inn-keeper, the man of the people, became greater than kings and emperors. Clement the Sixth, fearing lest a power so formidable should elevate itself to a rivalry with his own, resolved to destroy it before it had time to take root in the soil. He lanced a terrible anathema against the tribune, declared him to be a heretic, excommunicated him, annulled the acts of his government, and interdicted him the use of fire and water.

The enemies of Rienzi were prodigal of their gold to the people, organised a conspiracy, placed the count of Minerbino at their head, and introduced into the city a troop of banditti, who proclaimed a counter-revolution. The tribune desired to sound the tocsin of alarm to call the citizens to arms; but he found the churches in the power of the insurgents; treason was every where, and he was compelled to flee from Rome in the disguise of a monk, alone and without resources, to escape from death; he took refuge in Bohemia with the emperor Charles, who basely surrendered him to the court of Avignon. Fortunately for the fallen tribune, a terrible scourge which had fallen upon Europe suspended the preparations for his punishment, and saved his life; the plague broke out in Italy, England, Germany, Spain, and France. The city of Avignon was decimated, and the pope thought no more of Rienzi, being occupied in collecting the spoils of a large number of rich ecclesiastics who had perished of the malady.

Whilst the cities of the empire were under the impression of the terror and affright which this public calamity inspired, Charles of Luxemburg was seeking to improve his situation, and caused his partizans to take the following oath: "I recognise the emperors to be subject to the popes; that they have no power to depose or choose them; and I regard as heretics those who affirm the contrary. I swear a blind and absolute submission to the Roman church, pledging myself upon the consecrated host to recognise no prince as lawful, without the approval of the sovereign pontiff; finally, I promise obedience and fidelity to Charles the Fourth, appointed emperor by the Holy See." This formula was rejected by the magistrates of Basle, who, in the presence of the emperor and his court, protested that they would obey him who had been proclaimed by the electors, and him only, even though his election should be against the will of the pope. In consequence of this declaration, several cities of Germany appointed deputies, who offered the imperial crown to Gunther of Schwartzenburg, a skilful captain, who had rendered great services to his country during the reign of Louis of Bavaria. He at first refused this high dignity; but when the princes, nobility, and principal ecclesiastics of the kingdom united with the deputies of the city, and declared the empire vacant, by an authentic deed, he consented to mount the throne. The first use which he made of his authority was to publish the following edict:

"Our predecessor, Louis of Bavaria, of glorious memory, who died a victim to the perfidy of the pontifical court, made a law which declared him master of the empire who shall have obtained the majority of the votes of the electors. By the advice of our ecclesiastical and secular princes we confirm this law, filled with wisdom; we also declare every act contrary to it, and all decrees made since by the pontiffs, null and void, as departing from the apostolic doctrine, which orders priests to be submissive to Cæsar." Such a protest against the pretensions of the Holy See, must necessarily draw down divine punishment on its author; accordingly, some days afterwards, the unfortunate Gunther died of poison.

Then came the period of the new jubilee, so ardently desired; and as the holy father was anxious to attract a great concourse of the faithful to Rome, he sent his bull through all Europe to excite the simple to come to obtain the plenary indulgences granted to the pilgrims. This time, the number of fanatics who visited the tomb of the apostles, and the church of the Lateran, was still greater than at the first jubilee; and during the year 1350, more than six hundred thousand strangers visited the holy city. The pope had instructed Annibal Cecano, his legate, to receive the offerings which this crowd of brainless beings deposited upon the tomb of Saint Peter, which was done without opposition on the part of the Romans; but the cardinal legate having wished to profit by the circumstance to enrich himself, and to undertake a negotiation in indulgences on his own account by selling to the pilgrims dispensations which abridged their duties in Rome and permitted them to make a shorter sojourn in the city, the inhabitants who had transformed their houses into hotels, and who lost money as landlords in proportion as the prelate gained by vending early dismissals to their guests, wished to oppose his traffic, attacked his palace several times, and killed some of his people.

The commerce in indulgences did not, however, relax,—so strong was the faith of the pilgrims. Annibal Cecano placed his soldiers around the church of St. John of the Lateran, and at the end of the year he left Rome, followed by fifty wagons loaded with gold and silver, which he conducted to the holy father under the charge of a good escort. Clement himself had not remained inactive; he had sold a goodly number of dispensations to kings, princes, and lords who could not go to Rome; and they counted that the jubilee produced incalculable wealth to the court of Avignon.

During this display of fanaticism reappeared the sect of the Flagellants, who had been so cruelly persecuted in Italy by pope Alexander the Fourth, in the middle of the last century—and in several cities there were seen a prodigious number of men and women publicly castigating themselves to appease the anger of God.

Albertus Argentinensis says that they practised flagellation in the following manner:—“The penitents came in procession, two and two, upon the public squares before the churches; they then formed in a circle, took off their garments, and each of them, after having slowly passed around the circle, placed himself in the centre, extended upon the ground, the arms stretched out in the form of the cross, with the face to the earth; three penitents relieved each other in turn, and struck the patient with leathern thongs, garnished with iron ends. The operation being finished, the beaten one arose, sung hymns in honour of Jesus Christ, the Virgin, and the saints, made again the tour of the circle, and put on his clothes.”

These sectarians spread through Saxony, Bohemia, Hungary, and Austria; some crossed the Rhine and came into France as far as Avignon, where they flagellated themselves in the church in the presence of the cardinals and holy father. Two of these female penitents appeared to Clement so beautiful in their nudity, that he caused them to be carried off under the plea of occupying himself with their conversion, and kept them confined in his palace. The brethren, furious at the abduction of their companions, immediately assembled before the pontifical residence, and declared they would not separate until they had restored the prisoners to liberty. Clement ordered his guards to charge them, and fulminated a terrible anathema against the sect, enjoining on the bishops to hand them over to the inquisitors, and to punish them with fire if they refused to abjure.

At the time that he showed himself so implacable towards the Flagellants, he was defending the mendicant monks, whose depravity excited general indignation. A holy prelate accused them, in full consistory, of having despoiled the dying during the pestilence; of having entered the houses of the sick to pillage them; of having excited scandal by their shameless debaucheries with prostitutes, in the midst of the general calamity. He finished his address by invoking all the severity of the cardinals against them. Clement rose to reply to the orator.

“No, my brother,” he said to the cardinal, “the monks are not so despicable as you maintain; they have received their call from God by the mouth of the popes, to aid us in the government of the faithful. How could we teach the people if we had not these preaching brothers? Could we talk of humility, whose luxury surpasses that of satraps and Cæsars? Could we, who now hold the wealth of nations, recommend poverty? Could we speak of chastity, who are abandoned to excesses of depravity unknown to Sodom and Gomorrah? Could we blame sensuality, when our feasts equal those of Apicius and Lucullus? Finally, could we condemn frivolity, whose palaces are filled with buffoons, play-actors, and jugglers? Let us not then judge these poor monks too severely, because they have appropriated to themselves some money whilst attending on those who were afflicted with the pestilence; let us not call it ill that they repose in some commodious retreats, and repair, by succulent food, their strength, weakened by the long abstinences they have borne. I, who am infallible, declare them to be absolved from all the sins they have committed; and I even authorise them to retain the nuns who inhabit their convents, that they may multiply and increase the population decimated by the late scourge.”

Towards the close of this year (1352) Clement was attacked by a violent fever, which the physicians pronounced fatal. The holy father then appeared to be no longer assured of his own infallibility, and published a bull which contained this singular avowal:—“If, since we have been elevated to the papacy, we have advanced in our writings or language, propositions contrary to religion or morals, we revoke them, and submit them to the correction of our successor.”

The reply to this bull was not delayed, and on the next day a letter was sent to him, written in characters of fire on black vellum: “Beelzebub, prince of darkness, to pope Clement his vicar:—Your mother, Pride, salutes you; your sisters, Knavery, Avarice, and Shamelessness—and your brothers, Incest, Robbery, and Murder, thank you for having caused them to prosper. Given from the centre of Hell, amid the acclamations of a troop of demons, and in the presence of two hundred damned popes, who wait your presence with impatience." This letter was attributed to the metropolitan of Milan, John Visconte, to whom the pope had sold the investiture of Bologna for a hundred thousand florins in gold. Clement died on the 6th of December, 1352. His remains were transported to the abbey of Chaise-Dieu, where he had been a monk.

According to the historians of the times, the court of Avignon, under this last pontificate, was the receptacle of every vice, and of the most horrible depravity. Petrarch has left us the following description of it: "Who would not by turns smile with pity, or feel indignation in seeing these decrepid cardinals and prelates, with their white hair, and their ample togas, beneath which are concealed an impudence and lasciviousness which nothing equals? These libidinous dotards are so forgetful of age and the priesthood as to fear neither dishonour nor opprobrium; they consume their last days in every kind of excess of libertinage. These unworthy priests think to arrest time, which drags them along, and believe themselves young in their old age, because their shamelessness and intemperance urge them on to saturnalia which are repugnant to youth. Thus Satan himself, with his infernal laugh, presides over their debauches, and places himself between the virgin objects of their nauseous amours and these old cacochymes, who become irritated at constantly finding their strength less than their lubricity.

"I will say nothing of the adulteries, rapes, incests; these are but the preludes, the beginnings, of their debauchery; I will not count the number of women carried off, or of young girls deflowered; I will not speak of the means employed to force outraged husbands and fathers to silence; I will not tell by what threats they have been compelled to take back their prostituted wives or children, bearing in their bosoms the fruit of their amours with the princes of the church; outrages which are renewed as soon as their unfortunate victims are delivered; outrages which cease only when these old men are satiated, tired, disgusted with the women whom they have deflowered. The people know these things as well as I do, and loudly condemn them; for grief now will be heard, and threats no longer awe indignation into silence."

INNOCENT THE SIXTH, THE TWO HUNDRED AND FOURTH POPE.

[A. D. 1352.]

The cardinals make regulations to restrain the authority of the popes—Election of Innocent the Sixth—He annuls the rules made by the cardinals—His plans of reform—He undertakes to reconquer the domains of the church in Italy—Return of Nicholas Rienzi to Rome—His death—Persecution of the Fratricellists—Coronation of Charles the Fourth, emperor of Germany—Treaty of the Greek emperor with the pope—Death of Innocent the Sixth.

CLEMENT the Sixth, some days before his death, made, at the request of the cardinals, some modification in the ordinance of Gregory the Sixth, regarding the conclave; he authorised the members of the sacred college to have partitions between their beds, and each cardinal to have two pages to serve him, clerks or laymen at his choice; he also permitted them to be served during the whole conclave, for dinner and supper, with a dish of meat or fish, some soup, a salad, cheese, and fruit or confectionary. Such an ordinance was still further agreeable to the prelates, since it gave them the facility of introducing their mistresses in the dress of pages, or their minions in that of priests.

Six days after the death of Clement, they assembled in the pontifical palace, to proceed to the election of a new pope. The venerable John de Birelle, the general of the Chartreux, was first proposed; but the majority rejected him, the cardinals saying, with effrontery, that they did not want an humble, chaste, and rigid man to govern the church; but, on the contrary, they must place in the Holy See a worthy imitator of Clement; and, to fortify themselves from the consequences which might result from a bad choice, they resolved to make a regulation which might serve as a counterpoise to the power of the pope.

They consequently decreed, "That pontiffs could not create cardinals but with the consent of the members of the sacred college, and that the number should never exceed twenty; that they should not be permitted to anathematise a cardinal without the unanimous consent of his colleagues; that popes should not seize their property during their lives, nor after their death; that they should be prohibited from alienating or infeoffing the territories of the Roman church, without the consent of two thirds of the cardinals; and, finally, that the sacred college, in accordance with the privilege granted by Nicholas the Fourth, should receive half of all the revenues of the pontiff. They also decided that no relative or ally of the pope should be promoted to the post of marshal of the pontifical court, nor that of governor of the provinces or domains of the church; and finally, that the pontiff should be prohibited from making treaties with princes, or selling to them the right to levy tithes, or reserve them from the apostolic chamber without the approval of the sacred college, whose suffrages should remain free from every influence."

Believing themselves well guaranteed against the encroachments of pontifical authority, the cardinals fixed their choice on Stephen Aubert, cardinal bishop of Ostia, who was enthroned by the name of Innocent the Sixth. This prelate was born near the small city of Pompadour, in the parish of Bessae; he had been appointed Professor and Doctor of civil law at Toulouse, and had afterwards been one of the principal magistrates of that city. In 1337, he was raised to the bishopric of Noyon, from whence Clement the Sixth had drawn him to make him cardinal bishop of Ostia, and grand penitentiary. Wernerus says, "that the new pope was humble, of regular morals, and an excellent canonist." As soon as he had been proclaimed supreme chief of the church, he was subjected to the usual proof, and then the ceremony of his consecration was proceeded with.

On the day succeeding his exaltation he repealed the rules published by the cardinals, though he himself had sworn to observe them, maintaining that the pope could break the oath of the cardinal without committing a sin. Innocent in reality perjured himself in this matter, though we should not blame him too severely, as he did it to annul several scandalous privileges which had been granted to the cardinals by his predecessor. He then reduced the number of his domestics, compelled the cardinals to follow his example, and issued the following decree against the commendams, or concessions of vacant benefices to clerks and inferior prelates:—"Experience has shown that, owing to commendams, divine service is neglected in the churches; that hospitality is refused to the unfortunate; that churches are falling into ruins; and that both the spiritual and temporal rights of benefices are lost. We consequently revoke the commendams and sacrilegious concessions of prelacies, dignities, and secular or regular benefices."

The holy father exerted himself to put an end to a great number of abuses, which had for a long time become customs at the court of Rome; especially the rights which the officers of the apostolic chancellery granted, in the name of the church, to tolerate prostitutes; and the payments of the taxes which John the Twenty-second had established for incest, murder, parricide, and generally for all crimes. As he knew that the officers of the Holy See prolonged indefinitely, or terminated promptly, the affairs submitted to their judgment according to the amount of the sum they received, he desired to remedy these scandalous disorders, and decreed severe punishments for them. The pontiff not only showed himself to be as austere in his morals as his predecessor had been corrupt, but he had also the merit of preferring the good of the people to his own interest. His treasures were employed in the organisation of armies, which he sent into Italy to free the provinces from a crowd of lords who had erected themselves into despots, and tyrannised over the people. The first expedition was confided to Giles Alvarez d'Alberno, his legate, who penetrated into the territories, where he found but two cities which recognised the authority of the Holy See, Monte Falco and Monte Fiascone; the other cities were all under the rule of the nobles, who murdered with indifference the partizans of the emperor or the pope.

Rome, especially, was abandoned to the most deplorable anarchy. Bands of robbers, in the pay of the Savelli and the Colonna, traversed the streets and the country, and destroyed the faithful who came as pilgrims to the church of the apostles. The people had tried several forms of government in hopes of putting an end to these disorders; after having had prefects and tribunes, they had tried rectors; they then had chosen two senators, Count Berthold des Ursini and Stephen Colonna. Under this last form the discontent had reached its height, in consequence of a considerable rise in the price of grain; agitators accused the senators of wishing to enrich themselves, by favouring the export of wheat; they attacked the capitol, and count Berthold was stoned.

Innocent, who wished to re-establish his authority over that city and Italy, adopted the policy which the kings of France had followed since the time of Philip Augustus, relying on the people to overthrow the aristocracy. He liberated the republican, Nicholas Rienzi, and promised to reinstate him as tribune in Rome, if he would second the Holy See in its plans of pacification. Rienzi eagerly accepted the proposals of the holy father, and joined the legate Giles d'Albornos, who was already marching on Rome. At the approach of the papal army, the Colonna, the Savelli, and their partizans mounted artillery upon the walls, and prepared to make a vigorous resistance; but as soon as Nicholas Rienzi had displayed his standard, the people rushed on the nobles, drove them from the city, and opened the gates to the tribune, who went at once to the capitol amidst the acclamations of the people.

Nicholas occupied himself in re-establishing justice, and in again putting in force the wise regulations he had made before his captivity; but as he was compelled to divide his authority with the legate of the pope, the people took umbrage at it; his enemies accused him of wishing to subject Rome to a theocratic government, and showed letters which had been intercepted, and in which Innocent the Sixth gave him the title of knight and senator. Rienzi hastened to arrest the sedition, and wished to speak in order to defend himself; but he had scarcely commenced his justification, when a monk, rushing from the crowd, cast himself, dagger in hand, upon him, and disappeared after having struck him in the throat. The tribune fell dead near the Porphyry Lion, on the great square of Rome. This tragical end left the legate sole master of the city.

Whilst we render full justice to the popes by glorifying the actions which have illustrated several pontificates, we should also show severity towards them, when they depart from the precepts of the gospel; and we cannot too much call down the reprobation of men upon the sanguinary acts of which they have been guilty. Thus Innocent the Sixth, after having edified Christendom by great virtues during the first years of his reign, turned suddenly into a fanatic, and persecuted heretics with extreme severity. He was very bitter against the Fratricelli, who courageously confessed their doctrines in the midst of frightful punishments. John of Chatillon, one of these unfortunate men, whose punishment afforded a spectacle to the pontifical court, defied the rage of his executioners at the funeral pyre, and from the midst of the flames cried out to the people, "Christians, my brethren, I declare in the presence of God who judges us, that you are the dupes of the knavery of the pope; in the name of my salvation, I affirm, that John the Twenty-second, Benedict the Twelfth, Clement the Sixth, and Innocent the Sixth, are all enemies of God, simoniacs, forgers, robbers, murderers, and heretics."

Some ecclesiastical historians remark on the impassability of the pope in this matter, as a proof of the goodness of his heart; and are astonished that he did not cause the fire of the stake to be extinguished, to recommence torturing the palpitating members of the heretic. Mathew Vilani, on the other hand, exhibits indignation against this pope, who was cruel enough to listen, without emotion, to the just reproaches of an unfortunate man, given over to the punishment of fire as an expiation of his virtues. "If one wishes," he adds, "to be convinced of the cold cruelty of this priest, let him read this bull which he had before published:—

"We are informed that men, called Fratricelli, seduce the people by their humility, and teach them to fail in respect to the Holy See; we commission you to hand them over to the inquisitors, without any further form of process."

Charles the Fourth having learned that the pope had re-established his authority in Rome after the death of Rienzi, sent to demand permission from him to come and receive the crown of gold in the church of St. Peter, which was granted to him under certain very humiliating conditions. The emperor first entered Milan with naked feet, and received the iron crown from the metropolitan of that city; he then went to Rome, with the princess Anne, his wife, in the dress of pilgrims. On the day of his arrival, he was solemnly crowned emperor by Peter Bertrandi, cardinal bishop of Ostia; and immediately after the ceremony he left the holy city, in accordance with the promise he had made to Clement the Sixth.

No prince had shown so much subserviency to the popes as he: thus Petrarch, indignant at this act of cowardice, wrote to him, "Where will you conceal your ignominy, prince? What! you have promised, and promised under oath, to remain but a single day in Rome! What glory for a bishop thus to humiliate a sovereign, who ought to be the protector of liberty! How proud should he be at seeing you cringe beneath his feet! What more ignominious for an emperor than to be trampled under foot by an audacious priest, and to be content with the title of Cæsar, without daring to inhabit his residence? Go to,—you are fit to live in Avignon, that city which is the sink and the receptacle of all the vices!

"I can speak of it, for I know its abominations. In that third Babylon, which has no equal but Rome, there exists no pity, no charity, no faith, no fear of God; there is nothing there holy, sacred, honest, humane; in a word, shame, charity, and candour, are banished from it; as for truth, it never entered it. How could it exist in a place where every thing is false? The air, the earth, the houses, the palaces, the streets, the markets, the temples, the chambers, the beds, the angles of the walls, the hotels, the seats of the judges, the pontifical throne, and the altars consecrated to God, all are peopled by knaves and liars. In this infernal labyrinth of frightful dungeons, or sombre prisons, commands an imperious Minor, who agitates, in a fatal urn, the lot of mortals. At the least signal from his master, a minotaur, under the form of a priest, casts himself upon the victims, and drags them into the temples of the shameless Venus. No! truth could not show itself in that infamous place without being violated. Unhappy, thrice unhappy would be the candid man who should hazard himself in that abyss of vices; he would find neither fidelity, nor sincere friends, nor a second Ariadne who could give him a thread by which he might extricate himself from this inextricable labyrinth. In this city, the Elysian fields, Styx, and Acheron, are regarded as ridiculous fables; a future life, the immortality of the soul, the resurrection of the body, the end of the world, and the final judgment, are regarded as tales and idle stories; in a word, the salvation of the human family lies in gold: it is gold alone which can appease the monster, enchain him, make him smile. With gold you may deflower your sisters, murder your father; with gold you can open heaven, buy the saints, the angels, the Virgin, the Holy Spirit, Jesus Christ, and the Eternal Father himself; the pope will sell you every thing for gold except his tiara."

This energetic letter made a strong impression on the emperor; he perceived the mistake he had made, and hastened to return to Germany to prevent the effects of the discontent which his submission to the pope had excited. He was not long in perceiving the justice of the reproaches of Petrarch. At Pisa the people rose on his arrival, and wished to set fire to the palace in which he had taken refuge. Several persons of his court were hung, and he had great difficulty in escaping, by night, with his wife and the remains of his escort. At Cremona, he was obliged to wait before the walls for six hours, before the magistrates decided to permit him to enter, alone and without his sword, to rest for a day; and, finally, most of the cities refused positively to open their gates to him. Such were the sad consequences of his submission to the Holy See. Charles, however, was only a weak man, and not an incapable prince; for, on his return to his kingdom, he governed with wisdom, re-established peace and prosperity through the provinces, and published the famous bull of gold, which is the true fundamental constitution of the empire.

During this year, John Paleologus, emperor of Constantinople, finding himself attacked at once by the Turks and the brother of John Cantacuzene, king of Adrianople, sent to ask for aid from the people of the west; and in accordance with the policy of his predecessors, who knew the ambition of the pontiff, he offered to the court of Avignon to submit the Greek church to it, in exchange for its protection. Innocent sought earnestly for defenders for him, and sent letters on the subject to the different Christian princes; but his missives were unanswered; and, as he could not furnish either the number of vessels or troops which were required, the schism between the east and the west continued.

The only monarch who showed any favour for the plans of the Holy See, was still Charles. Unfortunately for the pontiff, the chancellor Conrad, of Alezia, prevented the levy of subsidies by the counsel which he gave the prince. "Recollect," he said to Charles, in full council, "that the popes have always regarded Germany as an inexhaustible mine of gold; and that they have their hands constantly extended towards us to despoil us. Do we not send enough money to Avignon for the instruction of our children and the purchase of benefices? Do we not furnish every year sufficiently large sums for the confirmation of bishops, the impetration of benefices, the pursuit of processes and appeals; for dispensations, absolutions, indulgences, privileges; and, finally, for all the simoniacal inventions of the Holy See? Lo, the pope demands still a new subsidy. What does he offer us in exchange for our gold? Inefficacious blessings, anathemas, wars, and a disgraceful servitude. Arrest, prince, the course of this evil, and do not permit pontifical despotism to make a second Italy out of Germany." Charles cancelled his decree, and wrote to the court of Avignon, that the subsidies which were demanded would not be paid.

Furious at this check, Innocent immediately sent his nuncio into Germany to take possession of the vacant benefices, with power to excommunicate and denounce to the tribunals of the inquisition, clergy and laity who should oppose the execution of his orders. So much cupidity excited a general discontent. On every side arose preachers who publicly condemned the conduct of the holy father, and called down the judgment of heaven on the pontifical court. Among these brother John of Rochtaillade, of the order of the Minor Brothers, was remarked for his vivid eloquence, and the efficiency of his allegories.

We translate the last sermon which he preached in Avignon: "In times past, my brethren," said the preacher, addressing the crowd, "an extraordinary bird was born into the world; it was large, strong, and had no feathers. The other birds having heard of this phenomenon, went in crowds to the place where it was born, to admire it; but, as soon as they saw this poor being trembling with cold, dying of hunger, and incapable of seeking its food—since it could not fly, they took pity on it, and agreed that each should pluck out some feathers to cover the unfortunate: this was readily done. As soon as this bird found himself covered with a plumage shining with purple and gold, he became proud and arrogant, and treated with contempt the birds who had so generously despoiled themselves for him; he soon even pretended to have sprung from the eagle of Jupiter, and wished to subdue his benefactors; he attacked them, one after another, and pursued them into all countries, to devour them. At last the birds, worn out with his tyranny, assembled in council, and decided to fall all at once on their tyrant, and tear his plumage from him. The peacock, vulture, and owl commenced the attack—the others followed: and the phenomenon bird, despoiled in a moment of the feathers which had been given to him, died of hunger on the very spot in which the birds had first found him. Thus will it happen to you, pope and cardinals," continued the orator, turning towards the tribunal of the pontifical court, "when the people shall have taken back the wealth they gave you." On quitting the stand, brother John was arrested by superior orders, and handed over to the inquisitors, who burned him as a heretic.

Innocent died shortly after, at a very advanced age; he was interred in the cathedral of Avignon, on the 12th of September, 1362

URBAN THE FIFTH, THE TWO HUNDRED AND FIFTH POPE.

[A. D. 1362.]

Election of William Grimoald—He gives the bishopric of Avignon to his brother—Efforts of the pope against the Visconti—Interview between the pope and the king of France in the city of Avignon—Urban makes a journey to Rome—He gives the golden rose to the infamous Joanna of Naples—He crowns Charles the Fourth in the church of St. Peter—He prepares to return to France—Prediction of St. Bridget—Death of Urban.

TEN days after the funeral of Innocent the Sixth, the cardinals assembled in conclave, to the number of twenty, in the pontifical palace, to elect a new chief. They disputed for a whole month, without being able to agree;—at last the wisest, despairing of ever putting an end to the divisions of their colleagues, proposed to choose a pope from without the sacred college, and to cast their suffrages upon William Grimoald, or Grimand, abbot of the monastery of St. Victor, at Marseilles. This motion was favourably received by the cardinals; they wished, however, beforehand, to make conditions with him, and wrote to him to come to them secretly, to give them his advice in relation to the election of a new pontiff. The abbot hastened to obey; and when he arrived, they proposed to elect him supreme chief of the church, if he would swear to permit the cardinals to accumulate benefices, and to keep their equipages, palaces, concubines, and minions. He consented to every thing, and was proclaimed pope on the 28th of October, 1362, by the title of Urban the Fifth.

He was a son of the lord of Grisac, a domain situated in Gevaudan, in the diocese of Mende. He had been set aside for a monastic life from his youth, and placed in the priory of Chiriac, whose superior was renowned for his depraved morals. This abbot, who had conceived a scandalous affection for the young Grimoald, wished to offer violence to him; but the child resisted, and informed his father of the danger he had incurred. He took him at once from the monastery, and sent him to Montpellier, to finish his studies. His progress in science acquired for him, some years after, the rank of doctor; he was a professor of the civil and canon law, first at Montpellier, and afterwards at Avignon: in this last place, he was preferred to the abbey of Saint Victor, by Innocent the Sixth.

On the day succeeding his installation in the Holy See, Urban gave the bishopric of Avignon to his brother, the canon Anglic Grimoald, and put an end to the scandal the popes had so long given, by leaving that church without a pastor to seize on the revenues of the diocese. It is true, that no particular merit was due to Urban for filling this vacancy, as, in so doing, he had no other intention than to prepare for the return of the pontifical court to Rome, where the legate, Giles d'Albornos, still ruled as absolute master.

Unfortunately, at the very moment in which he was counting to put his plans in execution, a revolution broke out in Italy; the Ghibelines took up arms, attacked the Guelphs, and massacred a prodigious number of the partizans of the popes. Giles d'Albornos, on his side, assembled an army, fell on the revolted cities, sacked and burned them, and was seen, himself, with his sword in his hand, and his casque on his head, setting an example of pillage, rape, and murder. The brothers Visconti, however, and especially Barnabo, repulsed the troops of the legate, and obliged them to shut themselves up in Rome. The pope, unable to annihilate his enemies, declared them to be excommunicated heretics, and deprived of all their dignities; he prohibited the faithful from communing with them; and after having fulminated a terrible sentence of anathema in the cathedral of Avignon, he mounted the altar, extended his arms toward heaven, and pronounced horrible imprecations, calling Jesus Christ, the apostles, the saints, and all the heavenly hosts to his aid, to exterminate the Visconti.

Barnabo continued none the less to combat the legate, with alternate reverses and successes; finally, after a year's contest he was, in his turn, repulsed by the troops of the pope, and forced to fall back on Bologna. He then agreed to lay aside his arms, engaging to restore the castles and fortresses on which he had seized in the districts of Modena, Bologna and Romagna, on condition that he should be paid the sum of five hundred thousand florins in gold in eight years' time, counting from the day of the restitution of the places taken from the church. In consequence of this treaty, the lord Barnabo became a son of the church; he was declared innocent of all the crimes for which the pope had excommunicated him, and relieved from the censures pronounced by the court of Rome.

During the following year, the king of France went to the holy father to consult him on the proposal which the ambassadors from Naples made him to espouse Queen Joanna, whose second husband had died after a wasting and enfeebling illness; thus uniting upon his head the crowns of France, Naples, Sicily, and Provence. Urban, to whom this alliance was very distasteful, hastened to dissuade John the First from concluding this marriage with Queen Joanna, whose turpitudes he unveiled, and whom he represented as the most depraved of the prostitutes of her kingdom. He informed him of the numerous murders she had committed among her lovers, and showed him even the correspondence between Clement the Sixth and that princess, in which the causes of the assassination of Andrew were related in obscene terms, and in which Joanna proposed to the holy father to purchase absolution from him by gold and nights of pleasure. John, who was now old, feared the consequences of an union with this Messalina, and promised the pontiff to put off his plan.

This was not enough for Urban, who feared, more than any thing in the world, the realization of a marriage which would have made the popes dependents on the French sovereigns; to cause him to break it finally, he resolved to create serious occupations for John, and to name him as chief of a new crusade in Palestine. Religious enthusiasm was, at this time, generally very cold; the wary pontiff, however, availing himself of the arrival of Lusignan, king of Cyprus, who had come to Avignon to solicit aid against the Saracens, celebrated a solemn mass in the presence of the two sovereigns, and preached a new crusade with so much unction, that the stupid John exclaimed, with tears in his eyes, that he would avenge Christ. Immediately, and without giving him time for reflection, he was conducted before the altar, and sworn on the consecrated host to conduct one hundred and fifty thousand soldiers into Asia.

On his return to his capital, John experienced a lively opposition on the part of his council to the execution of his extravagant projects. His ministers represented to him that his kingdom was plunged into the most profound misery, that pestilence and famine were desolating his people, that it was impossible to find money to defray the expenses of a crusade, and that his age and infirmities prevented him from directing so dangerous a war; they recalled the example of his predecessors who had ruined and depopulated France, without being able to conquer a rood of the Holy Land. All remonstrances were useless; the obstinate old man would listen to nothing; he ordered a recoinage of money to procure him silver, and convoked all who held tenure under the crown, to organise his army. But none of the other princes of Europe being willing to join the king of France, this holy enterprise did not take place.

Moreover, as in the interval Queen Joanna had espoused the king of Majorca, one of her lovers, and had taken a new oath of obedience to the Holy See, the pope ceased to concern himself about the crusade. All his cares were applied to one end, that of obtaining means to return to Italy. He openly announced that it was his desire to establish the pontifical court at Rome; and, by his orders, the bishop of Orvieto went to the holy city to superintend the repairs of the pontifical palace. At length on the 30th of April, 1367, Urban embarked at Marseilles, with a numerous train, on a fleet of twenty-three richly decorated galleys, which his allies the Venetians, Genoese, and Pisans, had sent to him. He arrived at Genoa, after a passage of forty days, and from that city he went to Viterba, where he intended to sojourn for some months. On his entrance into that city, the holy father was assailed by a crowd of citizens who demanded justice on his legate Giles d'Albornos, who was by his side. This manifestation so alarmed him, that in order to appease them he ordered him to leave the procession, and to be ready to render an account of his conduct at first call. The cardinal obeyed; but on the next day, at day-break, a great noise of horses and rattling of iron was heard beneath the windows of the pope's apartment, and when Urban stepped on the balcony to inquire the cause, he saw his legate in a chariot with an enormous quantity of keys which he was jingling. "Holy father," he exclaimed, "behold the keys of the cities which I have subjugated for your holiness. I know that one should never expect gratitude from kings and popes. I have served you too well, and to the detriment of the people; I repent it. Adieu!" and leaping upon a horse which his people held, he struck him with the spurs, left Viterba, and abandoned the carriage bearing the keys.

When the people heard of this flight, they accused Urban of having favoured it, to free this great culprit from their vengeance; a revolt broke out, and armed bands traversed the streets, exclaiming, "long live the people! death to the priests." The cardinals, who were lodged in isolated palaces, hurried at once to the pontifical residence which was fortified; and it is related that the panic was so great among them, that the cardinal de Vabres fled in his shirt from a brothel where he had passed the night; and that the cardinal de Carcassonne escaped from a Benedictine convent, in the disguise of a nun.

Urban, fearful of the consequences of this insurrection, sent an express to his legate with a letter in which he besought him to return. As ambition easily deceives itself, Giles thought he had been restored to favour; he assembled some troops and attacked Viterba, which he immediately seized. The populace was disarmed, and the chains, which shut up the streets, were taken away; the pope then caused scaffolds to be erected on the public places, and two hundred of the principal inhabitants were hung. Tranquillity was thus re-established in Viterba. Some days afterwards, Giles d'Albornos was assassinated by the son of a citizen, in revenge for the death of his father. Urban feared a return of the troubles, and precipitately quitted that city, with his suite and an escort of two thousand armed men, to go to Rome. He was received with great demonstrations of joy by the clergy, who conducted him in triumph to the palace of the Vatican. Joanna of Naples also came to pay her homage to the holy father, and was admitted to his intimacy to the great scandal of Lusignan, king of Cyprus, who was astonished that a pope would consent to pass whole days shut up with a female so decreed: but the motive of these mysterious conferences was soon known. The day of the blessing of the golden rose having arrived, the pontiff, instead of offering it to Lusignan, as every one expected, presented it to the beautiful queen of Naples, who had become his mistress.

Such a mark of condescension to a crowned courtizan discontented the cardinals, and they made some observations on it to his holiness. In order to force them to silence and to show them how much he respected them, Urban assembled them in consistory on the following Sunday, and in the presence of the court and the foreign ambassadors, he passed an eulgium on Joanna, exalted her charity, her mildness, her courage, and gave to her a sword of gold. After the session, he retired with her to his delicious villa of Monte Fiascone, leaving to the cardinals the care of conducting the affairs of the church. James the Third, the husband of Joanna, informed of what was going on at the court of the pope, sent an express to his wife to return to Naples, threatening to expose her infamy to all the kings of Europe.

Urban, furious that any one should dispute his mistress with him, annulled, without loss of time, the third marriage of Joanna, under the pretext of relationship, and declared her at liberty to take another husband. Notwithstanding this decision, the Italian lords, indignant at the audacity of the pope, revolted against the Holy See, and the war commenced more terribly than before. Joanna, unwilling to share the perils of her lover, returned to Naples, and left Urban to his enterprises against the insurgents. In this extremity, the latter called the emperor Charles the Fourth, to his aid, who hastened into Italy, at the head of twenty thousand Germans, and presented himself before Verona. After having taken it, he marched on Milan, which he uselessly invested, the troops of Barnabo Visconti raising the blockade of the place. He then went to Viterba, where the pope awaited him to conduct him to Rome; the empress rejoined them in this last city, to receive the crown from the hands of the holy father.

Without disquieting themselves at the presence of the German army, the Visconti continued to carry on war with the adherents of the popes; his holiness then wished the emperor to give more severe orders to his troops to achieve the extermination of that family.

On the refusal of Charles to command bloody executions, which were nothing less than general massacres, in the finest provinces of Italy, Urban detached himself from his cause and resolved to depose him. But before acting openly, he thought it prudent to return to France, where the protection of King John the First would place him beyond the reach of all violence. During his preparations for the journey, John Paleologus came to Rome in person, to ask succours from the pope against the Musselmens, who were menacing his capital. The Greek prince was received by the Roman clergy with great honours; he made a profession of the orthodox faith in the church of the Holy Spirit, and swore to reduce his subjects to submission to the Roman church, if the western princes would consent to furnish him with troops to repulse the armies of the infidels. Unfortunately, his presents and promises could not induce the sovereigns of Europe to aid him, and he was compelled to return to Constantinople without money, without an army, and with the sole consolation of being an orthodox Christian.

Urban, released by the departure of the Greek emperor, was occupied with assuring the execution of his plans against the emperor of Germany; and, in a sermon, he informed the Romans that affairs of the highest importance compelled him to make a journey to Avignon. This resolution excited great discontent among the clergy; the monks even came in procession to address remonstrances to the pope; Saint Bridget, who was on a pilgrimage to the holy city, also came to the Vatican, at the instigation of a cardinal, and informed Urban that she had had a vision, in which the archangel Michael had revealed to her, that he would die on the very day on which he touched the land of France. The pontiff, who understood the value of prophecies, paid no regard to the warnings of the saint: he embarked at Corneto, and nineteen days afterwards entered Avignon. But evil befel him; for, on the day of his arrival, he was taken very sick, and died on the night of the 19th December, 1370. His remains were transported to the abbey of Saint Victor, at Marseilles, where he had erected a tomb.

GREGORY THE ELEVENTH, THE TWO HUNDRED AND SIXTH POPE.

[A. D. 1371.]

Election of Gregory the Eleventh—He pursues the Visconti—Foundation of the kingdom of Tinacria—Origin and doctrine of the Turlupins—Revolt of the Florentines—Marvellous history of Saint Catherine of Sienna—Return of the holy father to Rome—Wickliff the heretic—New revolt of the Florentines—Death of Gregory.

THE cardinals assembled in conclave on the 29th of December, 1370, and proclaimed Peter Roger de Maumont, cardinal of Beaufort, sovereign pontiff, who was enthroned by the name of Gregory the Eleventh, after the usual ceremonies. The new pope was the nephew of Clement the Sixth, who had elevated him to the cardinalate at seventeen years of age. Following the example of his predecessor, he declared himself the enemy of the Visconti; and as soon as he was upon the throne, he addressed a terrible bull to the bishops of the empire, in which, after having brought accusations of all kinds against Barnabo, he added: "Finally, this obstinate heretic has dared to arrest the bishop of Milan, because that virtuous prelate refused to elevate to the episcopate a monk, our declared enemy, who called the Holy See the throne of Satan; and when the holy prelate had been brought into his presence, he made him fall on his knees, and addressing him rudely, said to him, 'Wherefore, lewd fellow, hast thou refused to obey me? Dost thou not know that I am emperor and pope in my own domains, and that even God has no authority in them, but what I am willing to grant him? To inform thee of it, the executioner is about to apply fifty blows of the baton.' After this execution he has pushed his audacity so far as to proclaim his monk sovereign pontiff, by the name of Girardolus the First, and has prohibited his subjects from coming to our court to purchase indulgences, benefices, and absolutions; maintaining that his pope had as good a stock of these articles as we, and that he would furnish them at a discount."

Gregory finished his letter by declaring those excommunicated who should give aid, counsel, provisions, or money to the Visconti. He did not confine himself to spiritual arms, which were becoming daily less redoubtable. He levied an army, and entrusted the command of it to Amedeus, count of Savoy. The Visconti, alarmed by these preparations, then wished to enter into an arrangement with the Holy See, and made overtures of peace; but the pope refused even to see the ambassadors. "No, no," he said to the cardinal who asked permission to present them to him, "it is useless for me to see them; I will spare them from perjury, and I will save their souls in despite of themselves, by causing them to be interred alive if they fall into my hands." Hostilities then continued between the two parties, until money failing the pope, with which to pay his troops, he was obliged to conclude a truce with Galeas and Barnabo.

In the midst of these wars the holy father was not forgetful of the pecuniary interests of his see, and he imposed himself as an arbitrator between Joanna of Naples and Frederick the Second, king of Sicily, called the Simple, whose kingdom that princess claimed, by virtue of a treaty concluded in 1302 between Charles the Second and Frederick of Arragon. The intervention of Gregory prevented, it is true, a rupture between the two kingdoms; but they paid very dear for it, for Joanna was stripped of her pretensions, and the king of Sicily was mulcted in an annual tribute to the Holy See of fifteen thousand ducats. On the payment of this sum, Frederick, and his successors, were declared the lawful sovereigns of Sicily, which took the name of the kingdom of Trinacria.

The resources of the pontiff were already commencing singularly to fail; enthusiasm for crusades and indulgences had gone out of fashion; even the tax on crimes scarcely brought in any thing; whilst, on the other hand, the luxury of the cardinals increased as the revenues decreased. Thus, this rental of fifteen thousand ducats was promptly dissipated, and the holy father had to think seriously how he was to raise money. The simplest mode of procedure, he thought, was to light again the funeral pyres, and confiscate the property of heretics. Gregory then became a persecutor. The first sect whom he pursued was that of the Turlupins.

Haillan thus speaks of these schismatics:—"They were the continuators of the doctrine of the poor of Lyons, the Vaudois of Toulouse, and of the unfortunate Albigenses, who, for almost two centuries, had struggled against the execrable tyranny of the popes. They were called Turlupins, because, like wolves, they assembled by night in the woods; their enemies had also surnamed them Bulgarians, confounding them with the pretended Manicheans, who had spread from Bulgaria into Italy and France. For a long time sacerdotal policy had understood how advantageous it was to calumniate those whose spoils they coveted. Thus the Turlupins were not spared; they accused them, as they had done the Templars, of practising all kind of abominations and sacrileges. They pretended that they taught that man, on reaching a certain degree of perfection, was freed from the divine law, and was no longer subjected to the yoke of Christ, nor of his vicar; they affirmed that they never prayed to God, under the pretext, that prayers having been written by men, had not a divine character. False witnesses even deposed, that they assisted at their ceremonies in absolute nudity, and that they openly committed fornication."

Notwithstanding these atrocious accusations, Gregory could not diminish the veneration which was paid to them in Dauphiny, and informed Charles the Fifth, that his officers refused to persecute the heretics, and wrote to him:—"Prince, we have been informed that there is in Dauphiny, and the neighbouring provinces, a multitude of heretics, called Vaudois, Turlupins, or Bulgarians, who are possessed of great riches. Our holy solicitude is turned towards that poor kingdom, which God has confided to you, to extirpate the schism; but your officers, corrupted by the gold of these reprobates, instead of assisting our dear sons, the inquisitors, in their holy ministry, have themselves fallen into the snare, or rather have found death. And all this is done before the eyes of the most powerful lords of Dauphiny. We order you, then, by virtue of the oath you have taken to the Holy See, to exterminate these heretics; and we enjoin you to march, if necessary, at the head of your armies, to excite the zeal of your soldiers, and reanimate the courage of the inquisitors."

Charles the Fifth, called the Wise, seconded well the pope in his sanguinary plans. Soon a general massacre of the unfortunate Turlupins took place throughout all France; the dungeons of the inquisition were encumbered with victims, and they had even to build new prisons at Embrun, Vienne, Avignon, and a great number of other cities, to hold the accused. At Paris, they burned, by the hands of the executioner, without the gate Saint Honoré, in the hog market, the works and garments of pretended heretics; the grand inquisitor condemned to be burned the celebrated Joanna of Aubenton, whose intelligence, eloquence, and virtues rendered her one of the most celebrated females of the age; and on her scaffold they bore the dead body of a preacher, who had succumbed before the tortures of water and fire, which had been inflicted upon him simultaneously. At Toulouse and Avignon, the flames devoured several thousands of these unfortunates, who were gangrened and poisoned by heresy, as the holy father expressed it.

These terrible executions brought in magnificent recompenses to the persecutors, as a letter of Charles the Fifth, addressed "to Pierre Jacques de More, grand inquisitor of the Bulgarians, in the province of France," attests. The sect of the Turlupins was finally entirely annihilated, and the coffers of the apostolic chancellery were gorged with riches.

Gregory, thus finding himself in a situation to retake the field and to levy a powerful army against the Visconti, addressed letters to the emperor of Germany, the duke of Austria, the king of Hungary, the king of Sicily, and even the king of France, to inform them of his resolution to return to Italy and re-establish the residence of the Holy See in the ancient city of the Cæsars. His pretext was the temporal and spiritual interest of the church, which commanded him, he said, to retake the direction of the diocese of Rome, so as not to furnish an excuse to prelates, who, after the example of the popes, made no scruple in abandoning their churches, to occupy themselves exclusively with accumulating benefices and collecting enormous revenues. The better to conceal his plan, he even published a constitution which enjoined on bishops, regular abbots, and the heads of orders, to go to their churches in less than two months.

The spring, however, arrived, and the pope had not yet left Avignon, detained either by the pleasures and debauchery of that city, or by the preparations for war against the Visconti, which were not yet finished. On their part, the foreign prelates remained also, captivated by the charms of that third Babylon, without paying any regard to the orders of Gregory; and as he wished one day to compel a bishop to return to his diocese, the latter thus addressed him in the presence of the cardinals and ambassadors:—"Thou who wouldst force the shepherds to remain amid their flocks, why dost thou dwell away from Rome? Is it because the corrupt population of the city in which thou residest applauds the crowd of thy buffoons, minions and courtizans? Is it, finally, because thou canst commit with impunity adultery, incest, rape, and assassination? Well, we would follow this example; we wish to sacrifice to the gods of sodomy, robbery, and murder, in the temple thou hast erected to them." Desmarets, who reports this, says, that Gregory contented himself with replying to him: "Our dear bishop has passed the night in some tavern, in company with women of pleasure, and has left all his reason in the bottom of the wine cup."

Avignon, the abode of luxury and pleasure, was, in fact, a new Capua for the popes; and it was the more difficult for them to abandon it, since they had discovered the impossibility of transplanting its delights to the banks of the Tiber, among that crowd of mendicant monks, which covered Italy like an immense leprosy, and paralysed its agriculture, industry, and commerce.

From the midst, however, of the excess of misery and abjection, into which the Italian provinces were plunged, sparks of liberty and independence were emitted. At Milan, Rome, and Genoa they rose against their tyrants; at Florence, the people, worn out by the exactions of the legate, revolted and formed a powerful league, into which almost all the places and cities of the ecclesiastical states entered; every where the standard of the pope was cast down, and replaced by a standard formed of a long strip of purple, on which was written the Latin word "Libertas." Perouse, Bologna, Modena, Forli, and Nocera joined the revolt, and drove away the cardinals Noellet and Geraud, as well as the other nuncios of the Holy See; finally, the fortresses and fortified castles, those retreats of tyrants, were demolished throughout Tuscany.

On the news of this revolution, Gregory published a bull, prohibiting the people of Christendom, under penalty of anathema and excommunication, from lending, giving, or selling, to the Florentines, arms, money, corn, wine, wool, cloth, or any merchandise; he declared them deprived of all privileges; he suppressed their university, confiscated all their property, and gave to those who should seize their persons, power to sell them as slaves; finally, he levied a formidable army, which he placed under the command of John, an Englishman, and John of Malestroit, a Breton lord, and sent it against Florence. The papal troops could not seize the city; still, however, they ruined the environs and intercepted all communications from without.—This movement compelled the Florentines to enter into a negotiation with the pontiff; not for the conclusion of a definite treaty of peace, but to gain time, and wait the reinforcements of their allies, as appears from the choice which they made, as ambassador, of a young nun, named Catherine, of Sienna, whose beauty was remarkable, and who passed for inspired. Marvellous histories are related concerning this saint and her ecstasies, and of Raymond of Capua, her confessor, a knavish and debauched monk, who abused the poor fanatic.

The Florentines sent her as their ambassador to Avignon: the monk Raymond, her confessor, was unwilling to leave her, and accompanied her in her journey. She obtained the favour of a secret interview with the pontiff; and whether she was enabled to convince him of the reality of her marriage to Christ, by revealing to him mysteries which he believed impenetrable, or whether the intercourse between them was like that between Joanna of Naples and Clement the Sixth, it is none the less true that Gregory gave to her full power to treat of peace with the Florentines, and to determine them to pay him a large sum of money as a tribute. Saint Catherine left the city of Avignon, and was replaced by deputies less agreeable to the pope; it was an embassy which had Lucius Savelli as its head, which came in the name of the Romans, to represent to Gregory that it was absolutely necessary he should reside at Rome, since he called the Roman territory his patrimony; they signified to him that the people had determined to choose the abbot of Monte Cassino as sovereign pontiff, if he refused to embark immediately for Italy. Lucius Savelli swore on the crucifix that his fellow citizens recognised Gregory as absolute master of their property and lives, and that they would hand to the cardinal Peter, his legate, the keys of the bridges, gates, and towers situated beyond the Tiber, as soon as the apostolic court had touched the port of Ostia. A step so energetic, left to the holy father no other alternative than a schism or his departure from France. He determined on the latter, and on the 13th of September, 1376, he left the beautiful city of Avignon, escorted by his cardinals, mistresses, and minions, and went towards Marseilles, where he embarked. In his journey he visited Genoa, Pisa, Pevinbino, Port Hercules, and Corneto, and finally arrived at Ostia, passed up the Tiber, and entered Rome on the 17th of January, 1377.

On the next day he gave a sumptuous feast to the principal magistrates, in the palace of the Vatican, and distributed some alms to the poor. This became the cause of his disasters. Parsimonious as were his largesses, they exhausted the treasures of the church, and compelled Gregory to have recourse to loans, and as his creditors, who were already numerous, refused to make him new advances, he wished to tax the English, and published a bull, imposing on the ecclesiastics of that kingdom a tax of a tithe of their revenue; but he encountered a very active opposition.

For many years the clergy of Great Britain, sustained by the kings and the aristocracy, submitted impatiently to the yoke of the Roman church, and endeavoured to enfranchise themselves; several distinguished scholars, and among them the celebrated Wickliff combated the ultramontane doctrines, and sought to free their country from the pontifical sway. Already had King Edward the Third, at the instigation of the learned doctor, refused to do homage for the kingdoms of England and Ireland to Pope Urban the Fifth, and to pay the annal tribute which John Lackland had engaged to pay to the Holy See, and which was in arrears for thirty-two years. Gregory, to defeat so formidable an enemy as Wickliff, was so imprudent as to declare him to be a heretic, and he even wrote to William of Courtenay, bishop of London: "We order you, my brother, to cause the heretic John Wickliff to be arrested, and to put him to the torture, and send us under wax and seal the avowals which the tortures shall have drawn from him; you will then keep him well guarded until you have been advised of our decision, whether to put him to death or to set him at liberty."

The pope at the same time addressed other letters, and on the same subject, to King Edward, to his son the prince of Wales, to the university of Oxford, and to the clergy; but the illustrious professor, sustained by the duke of Lancaster, and Lord Percy, the university, and the king himself, braved the ecclesiastical thunders with impunity, and continued in his eloquent discourse to sap the basis of the pontifical power, by developing to the people the cruelties of the inquisitors and the scandalous turpitude of the court of Rome.

Having thus failed in his end, which was to procure money, Gregory found himself lowered in the opinion of the Romans, and was even obliged to retire to Anagni, to avoid being insulted by the lords banneret. As he was meditating a flight to France, he received a visit from Saint Catherine of Sienna, who came to render him an account of the ill success of her negotiation with her compatriots, who not only refused to pay the sum which the pope demanded for taking off the censures pronounced against them, but who even had the audacity to drive away the holy woman, loading her with injuries. This last blow broke down the courage of the holy father; the chagrin which he experienced, caused him to fall into a profound melancholy, which aggravated a disease under which he had laboured for many years. As he perceived his strength to be failing daily, he was transported to Rome, where he published the following bull, which may be regarded as the cause of the schism which rent the west for half a century, and caused torrents of Christian blood to flow:—"If my death happens before the first day of the month of September, the cardinals who shall be about me, without sending or waiting for the absent, shall proceed at once to the election of our successor."

He died on the 27th of March, 1378; his body was first deposited in St. Peter's, and then interred in the church of St. Maria de Novo, which had been his title as cardinal.

URBAN THE SIXTH, THE TWO HUNDRED AND SEVENTH POPE, AT ROME.

CLEMENT THE SEVENTH, AT AVIGNON.

[A. D. 1378.]

AFTER the death of Gregory, broke out the great western schism, which for fifty years turned Europe upside down. In Germany, France, Spain, and Italy, they took up arms to defend the rights of the popes of Rome, or make the pontiffs of Avignon triumph. These infallibles excommunicated and denounced each other, revealing the turpitude of each, and reciprocally accused their rivals of incest and sodomy, giving and retaliating the epithets, thieves, assassins, heretics, and anti-popes.

History has not yet decided which of them were the true pontiffs; and as, in the course of their reigns, they were rivals in crimes and outrages, one cannot say which of them were the most execrable, and best deserved the title of pope. In this uncertainty, we will preserve the name for both those chosen at Rome, and those at Avignon, since they all proved themselves equally worthy to bear it. A Jesuit, Father Maimburg himself, says, "We must avow, that in the course of thirteen centuries, no schism was more alarming than that, as well from the atrocities which the two parties committed, as from the impossibility under which the church laboured for fifty years, of recognising which was the lawful pope. An universal council, which had the infallible assistance of the Holy Spirit, could not decide this grave question; and the fathers declared that it was better to act by authority, than from a knowledge of facts, in a cause so involved; and, in fact, they deposed the two popes, and proceeded to the election of a third pontiff. Thus was seen, at this deplorable time, a thing which had never before occurred;—they declared that there was a schism, without schismatics."

As soon as the funeral ceremonies of Gregory the Eleventh were over, and whilst the cardinals were yet assembled in the church of Saint Maria, a deputation from the principal magistrates of Rome addressed these sage remonstrances to them: "Illustrious prelates, you must know that the long sojourn of the popes in France has caused the ruin of Italy; and that even at Rome, the churches, the orders of the cardinals, and the palaces have fallen into ruin. There is but one remedy for so many evils, which is, to fix irrevocably the residence of the popes in the city in which the people believe God established the Holy See, and in which all the pontiffs to Clement the Fifth resided. If, since that period, the chiefs of the church have abandoned Italy, it is because they were Frenchmen; and you know very well, that among men of that nation the love of country exceeds the zeal for religion. Thus their absence from Rome has excited rebellion in cities and places which were the ancient patrimony of the Roman church; and those cities have justly broken the yoke of officers who oppressed them in the name of strange popes. The result is, that the apostolic see draws no more revenue from its old domains, and has even been obliged to levy troops to bring back its subjects to their duty. All these wars have weakened the resources of the Holy See; and you have seen the want of money reduce the papacy to the lowest degree of contempt and abjectness. If, then, you would shun greater evils, we beseech you to assemble immediately in conclave, and choose a pontiff who is a Roman or Italian by birth; if you do not, fear lest the anger of the people light upon you."

The cardinals protested their good intentions, declaring, however, that they could not enter into any formal engagement. The magistrates, discontented with this ambiguous reply, seized the keys of the city, which were in the hands of the officers of the church, and caused the cardinals to be conducted, under a strong escort, to the Vatican, and confined in the chamber of conclave. Scarcely had they assembled, when the people made an irruption into the great square which surrounded the palace, exclaiming, "A Roman pope, or death to the cardinals."

At almost the same moment a storm broke over the city; a thunderbolt fell among the conclave, overtuned the table of the secretary, broke the doors of the chambers, and lighted up, with its sinister light, a picture, which filled the cardinals with terror. In an immense gallery surrounding the conclave, the chiefs of the quarters and the bannerets, at the head of their armed men, were ranged in order of battle; behind them were the soldiery, shaking the walls and floors with blows of pikes and halberds; they also perceived before the Vatican an immense scaffold with fagots of vine branches and dry reeds, to burn them alive. The members of the sacred college judged that their only choice was between martyrdom and the nomination of an Italian pontiff, and they chose the Neapolitan, Bartholomew Prignano, archbishop of Bare, supreme chief of the church. The French, however, reserved to themselves the right of protesting afterwards against the violence done to them, and agreed among themselves that this election should be only provisional. According to the historian, Henry of Sponda, Bartholomew pledged himself to surrender the tiara to him whom the members of the sacred college reserved to themselves the right of choosing in a more regular election. Notwithstanding this formal engagement, he compelled the cardinals, some days afterwards, to assist at the ceremonies of the pierced chair, and to consecrate him by the name of Urban the Sixth.

Such were the events which placed Bartholomew Prignano on the pontifical chair; "a prelate who would have been regarded as most worthy of the papacy, if he had never been pope;" a singular eulogy which we find in a history of the church written by Berault Bercastel, an adorer of the Roman purple. Is not the avowal, that a worthy archbishop, by mounting the Holy See, immediately became an execrable priest, enough to condemn the institution? Is it not enough to induce men to overthrow the colossus with the head of clay and the feet of brass, to show them that the supreme power perverts those who are invested with it?

Be that as it may, the court of Rome, indignant at the faithlessness of the new pope to his promise, threatened to separate from its chief and produce a schism, if he did not fulfil the engagements entered into in the conclave. This threat exasperated Urban; he vowed an implacable hatred to the French, and the better to rule them he resolved to remove them from his court; then, under the veil of great zeal for ecclesiastical discipline, he sought to discredit them, by publicly calling them sodomites, robbers and heretics; but these gross injuries produced no other result than to alienate all the prelates from him. He next exasperated the officers of the treasury against himself, by causing a collector of the apostolic chamber to be flogged unmercifully, for not having brought back enough money from a tour through the provinces.

The cardinals, tired of the tyranny of Urban, availed themselves of the return of summer to obtain permission to leave Rome and go to Anagni. On the day succeeding their arrival, they were joined by the cardinal Camerlingo, who brought with him the tiara, the keys of Saint Peter, the apostolic ring, and the other pontifical ornaments. They then published a decree, declaring the election of Urban null, as having been produced by violence; and they wrote to Bernard de la Sale, a French captain who was at Viterba, to come with his troops to guard the sacred college, whilst they proceeded to a new election. That captain started at once, after having overthrown a multitude of armed men, commanded by Urban in person, who had endeavoured to arrest his march. This victory was fatal to the French inhabitants of Rome, for the holy father turned all his anger against them; he ordered his satellites to make a general massacre of them, without sparing sex or age; women, children, and old men were murdered, and several bishops were assassinated in the chamber of Urban, where they had taken refuge to implore his pity. On hearing the news of this butchery, the cardinals addressed the following manifesto to all the powers of Europe:—

"We have already informed you of the fury of the Roman people and their leaders, as well as of the violence done to us by forcing us to choose an Italian pope whom the Holy Spirit had not chosen. A multitude, carried away by fanaticism, wrested from us the temporary appointment of an apostate, a murderer, a heretic soiled with every crime; he himself had recognised that his election was to be only provisional. In contempt of his oath, he, however, compelled us by threats of death to elevate him to the chair of the apostle, and to cover his proud forehead with the triple crown. Now that we are beyond the reach of his anger, we declare him to be an intruder, usurper and antichrist; we pronounce an anathema against him, and those who shall submit to his authority."

Urban, who dreaded the issue of a controversy with the French cardinals, did not reply to this manifesto, but sought to negotiate a peace with them, that he might afterwards destroy them. Otho of Brunswick, and Joanna of Naples, his wife, sent ambassadors to the insurgents to propose to them, in the name of the holy father, to enter into conferences in order to conclude some arrangement. The cardinals listened favourably to these overtures, and sent three of their number to Rome, who came with the envoys of Joanna to beseech the pope to submit to the chances of a new election. At this demand Urban became furious, spoke grossly of the queen, and wrote a violent letter to her in which he not only recalled the murder of Andrew and her debauchery with his predecessors Clement the Sixth and Urban the Fifth, but even threatened to divulge her crimes, and excommunicate her and her fourth husband. This rupture between the courts of Rome and Naples was useful to the French cardinals, and procured for them the protection of Queen Joanna, who even offered them the city of Fondi, in which they could proceed, without fear, to the election of a chief of the church. The latter accepted the residence which was offered them, and were engaged at once in forming a conclave; as, however, they had no Italian prelates among them, and as they were fearful lest, in consequence of it, the cardinals of that nation would desire to annul the election, under pretext that they had not concurred in it, they determined to renew the expedient employed by Philip, count of Poitiers, after the death of Clement the Fifth; that is, by writing secretly to three of the partizans of Urban, to induce them to come to the conclave, by leading them each to hope that the choice of his colleagues would fall on him. This ruse succeeded perfectly; the three cardinals hastened to Fondi and took part in the ballot; they were not long in discovering they had been tricked, for on counting the votes, Robert of Geneva, a cardinal priest of the order of the twelve apostles, was proclaimed chief of the church, and enthroned by the name of Clement the Seventh.

A bull was addressed to all the courts of Europe to inform them of this great news; and three days after his exaltation, the new pope embarked for France and came to Avignon to be consecrated. Maimburg has left us a very curious notice of Clement: "Robert of Geneva was thirty-six years old when he reached the pontificate," says the learned doctor; "he was of moderate stature, and one leg was rather shorter than the other, an infirmity which he knew how to hide by affecting a measured walk; his inclinations and manners were those of an emperor; and he spared nothing to treat with royal luxury the dukes, lords, and ambassadors who were admitted to his table. He spoke with facility Latin, French, Italian, and German; but he was incapable of a serious application to business. He, however, possessed courage, and more than once confronted the greatest perils to attain the end he desired.

"Among his principal vices, luxurioness held the first place; he chose, from preference, his mistresses and minions from his own family, and loaded them with riches, honours, and dignities. . . ."

Thus, from the portraits which have been left us of Urban the Sixth and Clement the Seventh, by ecclesiastical historians whose attachment to the Holy See cannot be doubted, we cannot say which of these two priests was the most worthy to occupy the apostolic chair. To follow a numerical order, we indicate the titularies of the Roman diocese in the succession of the pontiffs; and we bestow the title of pope on the titularies of Avignon, without giving them a place in the chronological series of the chiefs of the church.

The election of Clement the Seventh, and the defection of the three Italian cardinals, affected Urban the more, since he feared his courtiers would abandon him to follow to Avignon a young profligate pontiff who promised to renew the reign of Clement the Sixth. This, in fact, happened; bishops and cardinals one after another left Rome, and the Vatican was soon deserted. This solitude was a cause of profound affliction to the holy father; and Theodoric of Neim says, that he surprised him several times shedding tears. To reorganise his court, he gave the vacant places to new prelates, and even made a promotion of twenty-nine cardinals. Thus, with the exception of money, with which he was badly supplied, Urban had no cause to envy his competitor. He was recognised as the lawful pope in Germany, Hungary, England, Poland, Bohemia, Denmark, Sweden, Prussia, Norway, Holland, Tuscany, Lombardy, and the dutchy of Milan. Spain and France still maintained a neutrality. The king of Arragon, though Urban was desirous of despoiling that prince of Sardinia and Sicily, prohibited the admission of the briefs of Clement into his kingdom, and even sequestered the revenues of the Holy See, until a general council had decided about the schism.

In Castile, the legates of the Roman pontiff and those of the pope at Avignon, simultaneously urged the king to declare in favour of their respective masters; but in the council which assembled at Toledo to examine the rights of the competitors, the ambassadors reciprocally accused each other of such enormities, that the prelates and lords declared that the two pretenders were both infamous priests, and that they would recognise neither of them as chief of the church.

In France, a synod composed of prelates, doctors, and the principal lords, declared, as the result of inquiries into allegations against both Urban and Clement, that both were unworthy of the tiara, and both had been irregularly chosen. Charles the Fifth, however, allowed himself to be influenced by the court of Avignon; and having convened a new synod at his castle of Vincennes, each of the members of the council received a formal injunction to decide in favour of the least scandalous election; all voted for Clement, who was solemnly recognised as the sovereign pontiff. The example of France drew after it Lorraine, Savoy, Scotland, Navarre, and at length Arragon and Castile.

A bitter war then commenced between the two popes. Anathemas, interdicts, depositions, and maledictions were the prelude to the bloody strife which was soon to overwhelm the western nations. Urban lanced a bull against his competitor, and cited him to appear before the court of Rome to be judged and condemned as anti-pope; Clement, on his side, fulminated a terrible decree against his enemy, and cited him before the consistory of Avignon to be judged for his usurpation of the apostolical chair. Finally, both having refused to appear, they anathematised each other by the ringing of bells and the light of torches, declaring each other apostates, schismatics and heretics; they preached crusades against each other, and called to their aid all the banditti and malefactors of Italy and France, and let them loose like wild beasts on the unfortunate inhabitants who recognised Clement or preferred Urban.

In the states of the church the Clementists made horrible havoc, ruined castles, burned villages, and even several cities; they penetrated as far as Rome, under the leading of Budes, a Breton captain, seized on the fortress of St. Angelo, and committed atrocities in all parts of the city. In Naples and Romagna the Urbanists, commanded by an Englishman named Harkwood, a former leader of free companions, took their revenge and committed reprisal. Every where pillage, rape, incendiarism, and murder were committed in the name of Clement, or in honour of Urban. The unhappy cultivators fled with their wives and children to escape the satellites of the Roman pontiff, and were massacred by the soldiery of the pope of Avignon.

Every where hamlets and villages exhibited only ruins blackened by the flames; the dead bodies of thousands of men and women lay unburied in the fields; the flocks wandered without resting places; the crops were trampled under feet for want of reapers to harvest them, and these magnificent provinces were threatened to be converted into immense deserts, had not Captain Hawkwood taken prisoner the leader of the Clementists and thus arrested the devastations for a time.

Urban returned in triumph to Rome and at once fulminated an anathema against the queen of Naples, who had refused to send him aid in money during the late war; he declared her a heretic, and guilty of the crime of lèse-majesty; he deposed her from her throne, deprived her of dignities, honours, kingdoms, lands and fiefs which she held from kings or emperors, vassals of the Holy See; he freed her subjects from the oath of obedience they had taken to her, and ordered the inquisitors to confiscate her property and burn her alive. In order to put this sentence into execution, he sent Martin of Tarento his chamberlain, to Louis of Hungary, the brother of Andrew the first husband of Joanna, and induced him to send a powerful army into Italy, under the orders of Charles de Duras his relative, an ambitious young man, whom Joanna had already declared to be her successor.

In his impatience to occupy more promptly the throne of Naples, Charles accepted the offers of the pope, and demanded money from him to conduct his enterprise successfully. Urban sold the furniture of his palace and the domains of the church; he even converted into money the sacred vases, the crosses, the shrines of the saints, the pyxes and the chalices of the churches of Rome, to the great scandal of the bishops and curates who wished to prevent the pillage of their churches. With the money thus obtained, Charles levied an army.

Joanna could count no longer on the seductions she had exercised over the predecessors of Urban to allay this storm; old age and debauchery had broken her charms; she called craft to her aid, annulled the adoption of Charles de Duras, and, in order to obtain powerful support, declared Louis, duke of Anjou, the brother of the king of France, sole and lawful heir to the crown of Naples. This skilful movement had already rallied partisans around her, when the death of Charles the Fifth happened. This event stopped the armaments of the duke of Anjou, and compelled her new ally to remain in France as the tutor of the young king.

Charles de Duras availed himself of this forced inactivity of his rival, to go to Rome to receive the investiture of the states of Joanna; he then marched on Naples, which was in open revolt, seized it without striking a blow, and laid siege to the castle in which the queen and her husband had taken refuge. Otho defended himself valiantly for a whole month, but having been made prisoner in a sortie, Joanna was reduced to the necessity of surrendering to her enemy.

As soon as the news of the capture of Naples was received in France, the regent placed himself at the head of his troops, descended to Avignon to receive the investiture of the estates of Joanna from Clement, and prepared to pass into Italy. Charles de Duras, informed of these preparations of the duke of Anjou, determined to put an end to the war by crime, and caused the guilty Joanna to be stabbed on the steps of her altar whilst she was at prayers. Some historians give another version of the death of this princess; they maintain that he inflicted frightful cruelties on her, tore out her breasts and her womb, and strangled her with a silken cord, as she had done Andrew her husband.

This victory of Urban gave the preponderance to his party; he published that God had declared himself the avenger of his cause, and in his pride he wished to persecute Henriquez, king of Castile and Leon, and lanced a bull of excommunication against him. "In thy turn now," said the holy father, "in thy turn be accursed, John Henriquez; thou who daredst to declare thyself king of Castile, without our approval; we condemn thee to be burned as a heretic, and we prohibit thy subjects, under penalty of being handed over to our redoubtable inquisition, from affording thee aid and assistance. We order them to track thee as a wild beast, and we will grant infinite recompenses in this world and the next, to him who shall deliver thee up dead or alive; finally, we command all the people of Christendom to take the cross to exterminate thee with the execrable anti-pope Robert of Geneva." He also preached a crusade against France, and as the soldiers of that day fought only for money, he sent nuncios into England to levy tithes upon the churches.

Whilst Urban was making his preparations for war, Louis of Anjou was continuing his march across Provence, penetrating into Italy and advancing on Naples, at the head of an army of sixty thousand men. Charles de Duras, who was threatened to be besieged in his capital, called Urban to his aid, and besought him to come to Naples, to animate the people by his presence. The holy father complied with his request, left Rome, went to Tivoli, traversed Suessa, and met the prince in the city of Aversa, whither he had come to meet him. That evening, Urban and the king dined together, apparently good friends; but at the close of the repast, the pope having claimed the principality of Capua for his nephew, Butillo Prignano, as had been agreed between them, Charles bent his brow, refused to ratify his promise, and declared he would never raise to the rank of a prince a wretch soiled with every crime. Urban, who was naturally wrathful, and whom the capital wines of the land had drawn forth from his wise reserve, broke out against his host; he accused him of ingratitude, threatened him with his anger, and heaped such outrageous epithets upon him, that the prince in his turn, no longer restraining his indignation, caused him to be arrested by his guards, and conducted under a strong escort to a fortress of Naples, called the Castle Neuf. Necessity soon forced him to relax from his rigour, and the two enemies were reconciled to combine their efforts to resist the French; the king gave the principality of Capua as an appanage to Butillo Prignano, and in return Urban was occupied with the means of delivering his ally from the duke of Anjou.

Secret agents had been already sent to the hostile camp, to corrupt the domestics of the duke of Anjou, and to engage them to assassinate their master, when a new rupture broke out between Urban and Charles de Duras; the cause of this misunderstanding was an act of infamy on the part of the nephew of the pope. Butillo, supposing that his new dignity freed him from all restraint, had dared to break into the monastery of St. Saviour, to carry off a young nun of St. Clare—whom he violated and confined in his palace. As she was a relative of Charles, that prince immediately cited the ravisher before the royal council, to give an account of his conduct, and on his refusal to appear, condemned him to be beheaded for contumacy. The pope erased the judgment, under the pretext that he alone was the sovereign of the kingdom of Naples, and that no one could, without his permission, condemn a lord to death, especially for so light a fault as scaling a convent wall and carrying off a nun. It was a peccadillo which they must pardon the extreme youth of his nephew, added Urban, his dear Butillo being scarcely forty years old. He offered himself as a guarantee for his future good conduct, and demanded for him in marriage the daughter of the chief justice of Naples, a relative of the king, with the city of Nocera as a dowry; this arrangement terminated the dispute. Urban retired with his nephew to his new residence, and Charles awaited at Naples the result of their base attempts against Louis of Anjou. Eight days afterwards, that prince expired in the castle of Biselia, near Bari, poisoned by some monks. His death freed Charles de Duras from the only adversary who could inspire him with serious alarm; thus having no longer cause to fear the pope, he took no pains to preserve his friendship, and sent for him to come to Naples, to talk over certain important matters.

Urban, who was unused to such cavalier treatment, replied, "that it was for a king to come to him, since princes were but vassals of the pope, and not their lords and masters." He prohibited him, by way of punishment, from establishing imposts, levying armies, and exercising any sway as king, until he had given him authority, and threatened, in case he disobeyed these orders, to declare him a heretic, and inflict on him the fate of Joanna. Charles paid no regard to these threats, and proclaimed that the pope was mad, and that he wished to place him under the custody of the cardinals. This step, which flattered the ambition of the princes of the church, found, it is said, several partizans in the sacred college, but Urban did not give them time to put it in execution; at the first suspicion of it, several officers of his court and six cardinals were arrested and cast into foul dungeons, so contracted that they could neither stand upright nor lie down, but remained in a bent or squatting attitude. After an almost absolute fast of eight days, the bishop of Aquila, who was the senior of them, was brought out from one of these holes, and carried to the chamber of torture. He was tortured with so much cruelty, that he fainted seven times during the operation, and seven times the executioners recalled him to life by new tortures; his moral strength then left him, and he made the following declaration:—

"I avow that we were to go to the next consistory, with twelve domestics, having arms concealed beneath their garments; that at a given signal we were to fall upon the pope, carry him off from his palace, and conduct him to the church of St. Francis, where we should have questioned him on certain articles of the faith; no matter what his replies should have been, we should have pronounced them heterodox, and should have condemned him to be burned as a heretic, which would have been done at once."

As soon as the pontiff had this confession in his hands, he assembled his principal officers in privy council, and ordered them to seek out all those connected with the conspiracy. Theodoric de Neim, who was one of the great dignitaries of the court of Urban, wished to say something in favour of the accused: "I dared to speak," says he, in his history of the schism, "and to represent, though with trembling, that an avowal thus obtained should not be taken as an irrefragable proof against the other cardinals, as it had been frequently seen, since the institution of the inquisition, that innocent men, succumbing beneath the dread of torture, accused themselves of crimes they had not committed. Scarcely had I spoken, when the pope turned towards me with swelling figure, sparkling eyes, and his throat so distended, that he appeared to be about to suffocate—'No pardon for them,' said he, in a loud tone, 'and let their defenders dread my wrath!' He then rose and left the council, leaning on his nephew, to whom we heard him say, 'Come, Butillo, let us go see our enemies tortured.'"

Then commenced a series of frightful tortures; the victims, led into a place situated behind the castle, were handed over to the executioners, despoiled of their garments, and beaten with rods. This punishment not appearing to the holy father to be severe enough, Butillo, his nephew, undertook to carry on the executions himself. The unfortunate men were at once placed on the rack, and new tortures were applied to them. An archbishop, who had formerly remonstrated with Butillo on his bad conduct, was, by order of that monster, fastened to the trunk of a tree, with his head down, and flayed alive; the archbishop of Venice was nailed to a cross, and an old Genoese pirate, a worthy minister to the cruelties of Urban, stanced with salt and vinegar the blood which flowed from his wounds; a deacon was hung to a plane tree, with enormous weights attached to his feet and hands, to dislocate his members; the cardinal Sangro had his flesh torn from him with red-hot pincers; and as, notwithstanding his sufferings, he continued to protest his innocence, they exhausted upon him all the refinements of cruelty, until fatigue constrained them to stop. Another cardinal was fastened to the rack, and burned with a red-hot iron on his breast, arms, and legs; after which, his tormentors tore out his nose, tongue, and eyes, and broke his limbs with iron bars; and, to finish him, Butillo caused three chafing dishes to be lighted under the sufferer, to burn him at a slow fire.

Whilst these frightful executions were proceeding, the pope was promenading in an adjoining alley, reciting his breviary in a loud voice, and stopping, from time to time, to encourage the executioners to do their duty. On the next day, he convened in one of the courts of his castle, the clergy, the lords of the city, and even of the neighbouring villages, to inform them of the danger he had incurred; and, to justify his severity, he maintained that the conspirators had wished to seize his person: he affirmed that he had been informed of their plot by a miraculous apparition, and that God had ordered him to have no pity on the ingrates whom he had drawn from the dust, as well as Charles, their accomplice. He then raised the cross above his head, waved the pontifical banner, and fulminated his anathemas against King Charles, Queen Margaret, the anti-pope Clement, the abbot of Monte Cassino, and the unfortunate victims of his cruelties. In consequence of the declaration of war by the pope, bands of robbers organised, and took their way across the domains of Charles de Duras, pillaging, robbing, and massacring in the name of God.

The king, to put an end to these depredations, published, by the sound of the trumpet, that whoever should deliver up Urban, dead or alive, should receive ten thousand florins of gold, and that those who aided his flight should be declared traitors to their country, and be beheaded. He published a decree through the cardinal of Rieto, ordering that the excommunications and interdicts of the pope should be regarded but as idle words, and that ecclesiastics should continue to celebrate divine service, under the penalty of confiscation of their property, and deprivation of their liberty. After this, he placed himself at the head of his troops, and went to lay siege to Nocera, expecting to seize it at the first assault; but it did not turn out as he had hoped; and the resistance he encountered was the more ardent, as it had its source in fanaticism. Urban had raised the courage of his soldiers by strange ceremonies; four times a day he mounted the walls, to excommunicate the hostile army, holding a bell in one hand, and brandishing a lighted torch with the other; he also published a bull, granting indulgences for all crimes, past and to come, to those who should slay or wound one of his enemies.

Notwithstanding all the imprecations of the pope on the Neapolitan army, the siege was pursued with none the less vigour;—the city had been forced to capitulate, and the fortress in which he had taken refuge was almost reduced, when, fortunately for him, Raymond des Ursini, one of his partizans, appeared at the head of a troop of Germans and French, whom he had recruited in Rome, fell suddenly upon the besiegers, put them to flight, forced the gates of the city, and carried off from the fortress Urban, his treasures, his suite, and his prisoners.

This sudden blow succeeded perfectly; and when the Neapolitans, recovered from their first panic, wished to pursue the pope, they were too late, for he had already gained the defiles of the mountains which led to the city of Trani, where the Genoese galleys awaited him. They could only seize several mules laden with gold and precious articles, which the holy father had left behind.

Urban arrived at the end of his journey with his prisoners, without any accident, except to the bishop of Aquila, whom the pope caused to be put to death on the road, because the miserable hackney on which he was mounted delayed the march. The other cardinals, fastened upon vigorous horses, uttered lamentable cries, which their intolerable sufferings wrested from them, and showed to the guards their broken limbs, and their bodies frightfully lacerated. Such a sight was well calculated to excite pity; and the French deliberated whether they should not deliver these victims from the hatred of the pope, and make a prisoner of Urban himself. The cardinal Raymond, informed of the subject of their deliberations, hastened to dismiss them at Salerno, by paying them eleven thousand florins of gold, and promising thirty thousand more, which he never paid.

Urban, delivered from his dangerous liberators, continued his route towards Trani, and embarked immediately for the port of Genoa, where he arrived on the 23d of September, 1385. His victims were sent on shore during the night and plunged in the dungeons of the chief inquisitor. In vain did the magistrates of the republic, and even the clergy, sue for their pardon, the holy father was inflexible, and, to put an end to their entreaties, he instructed Butillo to put them to death. This worthy minister of the pope acquitted himself admirably of his cruel mission, and surpassed, in the performance of it, all the cruelties that we could imagine. He caused the cardinal Louis Donato to be interred in a bed of quicklime, leaving his head out of this infernal tomb, that he might feel his flesh all corrode and consume before his death. He shut up wolves in the dungeon of Bartholomew, to devour him alive, and Gentil de Sangro and Martin del Guidice were sewed up in bags of leather, with serpents, and then cast into the sea. An English cardinal, Adam Easton, was alone spared, thanks to the remonstrances of the ambassadors of his nation, who threatened the pope with the wrath of King Richard, if he dared to condemn to death one of the subjects of Great Britain. Urban contented himself with breaking both his legs. His cruelties, performed in cold blood, exasperated the minds of men; ecclesiastics who had hitherto shown devotion to his party abandoned him; the metropolitan of Ravenna and Garléot Tariat de Pietra Mala burned, publicly, their cardinal's hats, and started for Avignon. Notwithstanding this general abandonment, Urban did not change his conduct, but pursued his career of crimes. Louis of Hungary had died in the meantime, leaving the throne to his daughter Mary, under the tutelage of her mother, Queen Elizabeth, a princess whose morals could only be compared with those of Joanna of Naples, and whose cruelty was only equalled by that of Urban. The Hungarians, unable to endure the tyranny of this abominable woman, revolted against her, and proclaimed Charles de Duras king, who determined to go immediately into Hungary to receive the heritage of his cousin. The prince, forgetful of his quarrels with the pope, had the imprudence to traverse Italy with a feeble escort. At the moment when he reached the frontiers of his new kingdom, assassins reminded him that a priest never pardons; during the night, banditti attacked the castle in which he lodged and massacred him. The historian, Pogge, affirms, that these wretches were emissaries of the pontiff, and that Blaise Forgach, the leader of the expedition, deposited at the feet of his holiness a sword yet wet with the blood of his enemy.

As soon as the death of Charles de Duras was known in France, the pope at Avignon proclaimed Louis the Second, duke of Anjou, king of Naples, and gave the title of viceroy to Count Severin, with authority to enter immediately on the conquest of his new kingdom. On her side, the beautiful Margaret, the widow of Charles de Duras, had caused the states of the kingdom to recognise her son Lancelot, who was ten years old, as king, and herself as regent. She then assembled imposing forces to resist the French, and the provinces only awaited an order from the holy father to embrace her party, which would have infallibly assured a triumph to her as well as to Urban. But all attempts at reconciliation with the court of Genoa failed, before the obstinacy of this implacable old man. He renewed against Margaret and all her family the maledictions and anathemas he had so often pronounced, and declared that Naples had no other king than him, Urban the Sixth, supreme chief of the church. He then published a crusade against the two children, in whose names ambitious rivals disputed for the throne of the shameless Joanna.

The French pursued their march and seized on Naples, despite the anathemas of the Roman pope, in which city they caused the authority of Clement the Seventh to be recognised. Encouraged by this first success, the latter wished to unite, with the power of arms, the authority of miracles and prophecies; he chose for this purpose an unfortunate idiot, who was conducted to Genoa, and instructed in the part he was to play. On a day on which the consistory was assembled, he entered the palace of Urban, in the guise of a hermit, and in the presence of the magistrates of the republic, and many of the clergy, repeated the lesson which had been taught him, and said to the pontiff:—"For fifteen years I was praying in the rocks of my solitude, when suddenly Christ appeared to me, and announced that a false pope, named Urban the Sixth, was disputing the throne of St. Peter with the true pontiff. As a proof of my celestial mission, I declare that I am invulnerable, and I demand to undergo the torture of the cord, water, and fire." This harangue made a sensible impression on the bystanders; Urban alone remained impassable. As a pope is a man who does not believe in miracles, he caused the poor idiot to be arrested, and his head cut off in the audience chamber.

The holy father, however, fearful of the consequences of such a revelation on superstitious minds, resolved to combat his enemy with the same kind of arms, and wrote to Saint Catherine of Sienna, to come immediately to put an end to the doubts which some of the faithful had in regard to his election, at the same time he sent a brief to the mother abbess, to permit the holy girl to come to Genoa. The pope received Catherine in full consistory, the cardinals, the doge, and the other magistrates of the republic being assembled; the poor fanatic collected her scattered thoughts for a moment, then fell into an ecstasy, her eyes shining, her hair dishevelled, her mouth foaming, and like an ancient pythoress at Delphi, she said with an inspired voice, "Know all of you, that the pontiff Urban is really the vicar of Christ." A commentator of the Bollandists, who wrote a history of Catherine of Sienna, says, that they made this nun drink aphrodisiacal preparations, which brought on these extatic trances. What appears to confirm this opinion is, that she died some months afterwards in a paroxysm of hysterical madness.

The revelation of Saint Catherine was but of feeble assistance to Urban, and did not arrest his competitor, who daily increased his conquests both by arms and negotiations. It is difficult to explain the predilection of the people for Clement, for this pope was no less greedy, cruel, and infamous than his rival, and if we are to judge him by the chronicle of the anonymous monk of St. Denis, we should say, that he deserved to be accursed of God and men. "Clement," according to the learned monk, "availing himself of the indolence of the king and grandees, in regard to the Gallican church, had borne down the ecclesiastics and communities with imposts, and even surpassed Boniface the Eighth and John the Twenty-second, in the art of extorting money and causing the wealth of nations to flow into the treasury of the apostolic chancellery. Following the example of his competitor, he had created thirty-six cardinals; true vampires, escorted by a legion of procurers, armed with reversionary bulls, and ready to pounce upon the vacant benefices in the cathedral and collegiate churches, in the conventional priories, and in the houses of the hospitallers. Not only did the pontiff, in contempt of the decrees of his predecessors, authorise these abuses, but kept for himself the best and richest dioceses. On the death of a prelate, he sent into the country collectors or sub-collectors of the apostolic chamber, who seized on the moveables of the deceased, hunted up old debts and the arrearages on farms; and, after having imprisoned the heirs, they took the direction of the diocese, sold the sacred ornaments of the churches, and even pledged the revenues for two or three years, so that the new bishop was forced to beg for a living, or to place himself at the head of his priests and monks, and devastate the country, ransacking the inhabitants like the free companies."

Urban was not, however, discouraged by the success of his enemy, and prepared to dispute the kingdom of Naples with Clement. He was on his march for Lower Italy, when a fall from his horse compelled him to suspend the execution of his plans. This delay, and still more the want of money, compelled him to place his troops in winter quarters in Rome. A few days after his installation in the Vatican, he yielded up his breath; one of the agents of Clement, having, it is charged, given him a poisoned drink.

Urban was odious, even to those who followed his fortunes, so that his death excited no regret. He was buried on the 16th of October, 1389, in the chapel of St. Andrew, in the church of St. Peter.

BONIFACE THE NINTH, THE TWO HUNDRED AND EIGHTH POPE, AT ROME.

CLEMENT THE SEVENTH,—BENEDICT THE THIRTEENTH PONTIFFS AT AVIGNON.

[A. D. 1389.]

Election of Boniface the Ninth—The two popes excommunicate each other—Jubilee at Rome—Exactions of Boniface—Cruelties of Clement—Efforts of the university of Paris, to put an end to the schism—Death of Clement the Seventh—The French cardinals proclaim the cardinal Peter de Luna sovereign pontiff—Knavery of that pope—Negotiations for the peace of the church—Assembly at Rheims—The French refuse obedience to Benedict the Thirteenth—Negotiations of Peter d'Ailly—Benedict is besieged in Avignon—Debaucheries of Boniface at Rome—Conspiracy against the pope—Sect of the Whites—The emperor Manuel Paleologus comes to France—Benedict is driven from Avignon—He is reconciled with his cardinals—Fresh example of his bad faith—Embassy from Boniface to Benedict—Death of Boniface.

SOME days after the death of Urban, sixteen cardinals, who were in Rome or the neighbouring provinces, assembled in conclave, and chose Peter de Thomacelli, cardinal of Naples, sovereign pontiff, who was, after the usual ceremonies, enthroned by the name of Boniface the Ninth. His mother, named Gratiola Filimarini, hastened immediately to adore him as the universal father of Christians, saying to the assistants, "that she loved better to kiss his feet as pope, than his face as her son."

Boniface was originally from Naples; he had a fine person, a majestic port, and expressed himself with elegance, but he did not know how to write or chant, and his ignorance on religious subjects was very great; he, however, showed much address and prudence in his government. He commenced by destroying the sovereign authority of the bannerets and senators of Rome, in order to render himself absolute master in the holy city and the domains of the church. He then confirmed the institution of Urban; in regard to the period of the jubilee, which was approaching, under pretext, that Jesus Christ having passed thirty-three years on earth, it was proper to celebrate every period of thirty-three years; and, as the holy father was pressed for money, he immediately published a jubilee.

A concourse of pilgrims from all parts of the world flowed into Rome, to gain indulgences, and give their money to the pope. To increase the enormous sums he obtained from this operation, the insatiable Boniface sent bands of begging monks into Germany, Hungary, Poland, Bohemia, and England to sell indulgences, who brought him back more than five hundred thousand florins in gold.

Those of these agents who were suspected of unfaithfulness or of dallying in their business, were, on their return, put to the torture and burned alive. He punished with equal severity mendicants, monks, and secular clerks, who kept up an active rivalry with him in the sale of indulgences, by permitting libertinage to nuns, reconciling heretics to the church, legitimatising bastards, authorising incests, and granting absolutions for robbery and assassination on better terms than the holy father. He fulminated a terrible bull against them, and devoted to eternal punishments those who did not restore the money they had stolen. Some obeyed him, but the most guilty preferred exposing themselves to the wrath of the pope, rather than restore the money wrested from ignorance and superstition.

The avaricious pontiff then determined to shear the shepherds as he had done the flocks; and published through the different countries which were obedient to him, that he would grant graces and benefices to ecclesiastics who would come to his court and offer him presents. This fallacious promise induced a large number of priests to make a journey to the holy city, carrying with them all the gold they could procure, to obtain from the holy father the best benefices in their provinces. There resulted between the prelates of each country, and the mere priests of each diocese, a combat of vanity which was very profitable to Boniface, each of them outbidding his colleague in order to occupy a higher place on the roll of rewards which were to be distributed. The number of seekers became soon so great, that it was computed that if the world had been ten times larger than it is, the holy father would have been unable to grant as many benefices as were solicited; which did not, however, prevent the stupid pilgrims from bringing their offerings to the Vatican. He also sold the domains of the Roman church, in consideration of large sums paid in cash as a gift, or under the promise of annual rents to be furnished in kind, men-at-arms, or munitions of war.

On his side, Clement, in point of exactions, was not behind his competitor; he ruined the clergy of France and Spain by enormous impositions, and extorted incredible sums from the faithful. He also endeavoured to hurt the trade of Boniface by lanching excommunications against his partizans, which the latter freely returned; for, says a satirical author, it is the money of which the popes are most prodigal.

Maimburg, the Jesuit, thus expresses himself on this subject: "Boniface and Clement thought of sustaining themselves on the chair of the apostle, only by corruption and the aid of the temporal powers; and, although they appeared to desire, ardently, peace and the union of the church, neither of them was sincere, and each only hoped for the annihilation of his rival. In fact, Boniface wished to prevent England from concluding a truce with France, unless Charles the Sixth would consent to abandon the pope at Avignon; and Clement opposed the acceptance of the peace by France, if Great Britain persisted in sustaining Boniface. They sought to destroy each other, now by their bulls, now by the enemies they excited; and, finally, they pushed the scandal of their enmity so far as to compel the ecclesiastics on whom they conferred any benefices, to swear never to recognise their competitor as pontiff, which proves their intention to render the schism eternal."

The members of the university, the magistracy, a small number of virtuous priests, and some heads of the different religious orders were profoundly afflicted by the misfortunes of the people, and were desirous of putting an end to the scandalous disputes of the church, by restoring union to Christendom. Two monks of the order of the Chartreux, charged with the delicate mission of sounding the intentions of the courts of Rome and Avignon, went first to Boniface, who listened to them attentively, and appeared to approve of their advice. On dismissing them, the holy father gave them a letter to the king of France, in which he offered to submit the subject to the decision of that monarch, if he should be permitted first to send some Roman canonists to him to enlighten his conscience. The two monks then went to Avignon to make the same exhortations to Clement which they had done to Boniface; but Clement did not receive them so kindly; he seized them without any formality as soon as they entered the city, and put them to the torture to punish them for having gone to Rome without his permission.

This arrest excited the whole order of the Chartreux; the superior at once addressed a request to the king of France to demand the liberation of his brethren, and to complain of this violation of the law of nations. Charles the Sixth took the part of the monks, and wrote to Clement to set his prisoners at liberty at once, if he did not wish to expose himself to a terrible punishment. The pontiff feigned ignorance of what had occurred, threw the blame on the cardinals, and replied to the envoys of the prince, "Assure your master, our dear son, that we have the preservation of his friendship so much at heart, that we would joyfully surrender both our cape and our tiara, if he asked this sacrifice from us."

All appeared to be in a fair way for an arrangement; and it was hoped that, either peaceably or forcibly, the two popes would be brought to renounce their claims, when an unlooked for event, the insanity of Charles the Sixth, broke off the negotiations, and revived the old religious quarrels. This time, however, wiser than before, the French and English refused to espouse the quarrels of the pontifical courts; they excluded the two popes from their counsels, and signed a treaty of peace for twenty-six years. King Richard prohibited his subjects from crossing the sea to go to Italy to obtain benefices, under penalty of being punished as an enemy to the state. Boniface immediately annulled the ordinance of Richard, and solemnly excommunicated him. To revenge himself, the king caused a proclamation to be made in London, ordering English ecclesiastics who were in Italy to return to England within eight months, under penalty of forfeiture. The result was, that Great Britain entirely separated itself from obedience to the court of Rome.

If Boniface lost ground in the north, as a compensation for it he increased his authority in Italy, and soon found himself strong enough to exercise his rule, as in the best days of the papacy. Money was his idol, and he set to work all means of procuring it; he made an ordinance authorising usury, and lent money himself at heavy rates of interest. He established new charges, placed at auction the adjudication of benefices, declared the annates invented by John the Twenty-second, perpetual, and sold the reception of them in advance.

Whilst Italy was thus squeezed by an avaricious pontiff, France was groaning beneath the weight of imposts, which had accumulated in that country, to support the prodigalities of the pope at Avignon; his thirty-six cardinals, mistresses, and minions. At last the prelates of the kingdom, tired of paying to Clement, now a tenth, now a twentieth of their revenues, assembled at the university and appointed fifty-four doctors to decide upon the steps to be taken to re-establish union in the church, and in order, as they said, "to have but one pope to fatten." The result of their deliberations was, that the two rivals should be summoned to abdicate and submit to the decision of a general council.

For this purpose, the university composed an argumentative letter, to beseech the king, who had recovered, for a time, his reason, to lend the aid of his authority to a measure, which alone could put an end to the schism that had so long devastated Europe. "The church," said the doctors, "has fallen into contempt, servitude, and poverty; two popes elevate to prelacies only unworthy and corrupt ministers, who have no sentiment of equity or shame, and who think only of satiating their passions. They rob the property of the widow and the orphan, at the same time that they are despoiling churches and monasteries; sacred or profane, nothing comes amiss to them, provided they can extract money from it; religion is for them a mine of gold, which they work to the last vein; they sell every thing from baptism to burial; they traffic in pyxes, crosses, chalices, sacred vases, and the shrines of the saints. One can obtain no grace, no favour without paying for it; it is not the worthiest but the richest who obtain ecclesiastical dignities. He who gives money to the pope can sleep in safety, though he may have murdered his own father, for he is assured of the protection of the church. Simony is publicly exercised, and they sell with effrontery to the highest and last bidder dioceses, prebends, or benefices.—Thus do the princes of the church.—What shall we say of the lower clergy, who no longer administer the sacraments but for gold? What shall we say of the monks, whose morals are more corrupt than those of the inhabitants of ancient Sodom? It is time, illustrious prince, that you should put an end to this deplorable schism, proclaim the freedom of the Gallican church, and limit the power of the pontiffs."

This energetic demand was carried to the court of Avignon by ambassadors who read it in full consistory. Clement preserved an extraordinary impassability, whilst listening to the recital of the calamities, of which he was accused of being the principal author; but when he was summoned to renounce the pontificate, he sprang from his seat, cast himself on the deputy who bore the request, wrested it from his hands, tore it with his teeth, and trampled it under foot, whilst pronouncing the most horrid blasphemies. After this burst of passion, he addressed the cardinals, demanding from them what horrible punishment should be inflicted on those who were bold enough to use such language. They, to his great astonishment, replied, that the counsel given by the university demanded a serious examination, that money was failing, that all the resources of superstition were exhausted, that several of them could no longer support the expenses of their establishments, and that, unless he wished to reduce his court to a shameful mendicancy, he must, himself, think of putting an end to the schism. This reply redoubled his fury; he endeavoured to speak, but his voice failed him; he then cast his tiara into the midst of the consistory, and left the room with precipitation. He died a few hours afterwards from an attack of apoplexy, and was buried in the cathedral of Avignon on the 17th of September, 1394.

Doctor Clemangis has pronounced the following judgment on this pope:—"There never existed a more miserable priest than Clement the Seventh. A cowardly and servile flatterer, he called himself the servant of servants of the kings of France, and the vilest slave would scarcely have borne with the indignities in which the courtiers steeped him. He gave bishoprics and abbey to the minions of princes, and sold to them the right of exercising all kinds of imaginable vexations on the clergy; and it finally happened, that the mere buffoons of the duke of Berry were as much pope as Clement."

As soon as the news of his death reached Paris, the university sent a deputation to the king, to ask him to prohibit the cardinals at Avignon from proceeding to a new election, until a general assembly of the prelates of the kingdom had given an opinion about the schism. Charles the Sixth wrote to this purpose to the members of the sacred college; the king of Arragon addressed a letter to them for the same object; the university, the metropolitans of Treves, Mayence, and Cologne sent deputies to make the same request; Boniface the Ninth also addressed a bull to them, exhorting them to put an end to the schism. All these letters and steps were useless; the cardinals, having gone into conclave, refused obstinately to receive either ambassadors or letters until the election was over. In order to avoid, however, the accusation of having continued the schism, in opposition to the wishes of the sovereigns, they entered into this obligation:—"We all, cardinals of the holy Roman church, assembled in conclave for the election of a pope, being before the altar, swear upon the gospel and the sacred body of Christ, that without artifice, intrigue, and perfidy, we will labour faithfully and actively for the extinction of the unfortunate schism which destroys the church; to attain this end, he among us who shall be chosen pope, shall renounce the pontificate, if the sacred college regards it as necessary to produce the reunion."

They then proceeded to an election, and after some ballotings, Peter de Luna received a majority of the votes, and was declared pope by the name of Benedict the Thirteenth. The new pontiff was of the illustrious family of the lords of Luna; in the kingdom of Arragon, and had already been engaged in very important affairs, on account of his acknowledged skill in business. He was, unfortunately, devoured by a boundless ambition, which had induced Gregory the Ninth to say, when he elevated him to the cardinalate, "Be careful, my son, lest your moon does not suffer an eclipse some day, for vanity has destroyed many men." The predictions of Gregory were realised, says Maimburg, for, as soon as he became pope, he showed himself to be proud, implacable, tricky, insatiable of rule, and of an obstinacy that nothing could overcome. What induced the cardinals to choose him, was that he had acquired in his different legations immense wealth, which he promised to surrender to them. The members of the sacred college exacted, however, before they would consecrate him, that he should renew the oath taken in conclave, and reiterate the same promise in his letters addressed to the prelates and different kings of Europe. The new pope complied the more readily with the demand of the cardinals, since he had already discerned the advantage he could derive from allowing it to be thought he was extremely indifferent about the papacy.

The king of France and the university, deceived by this trick, recognised him without difficulty, being persuaded that a pope so submissive would abdicate the papacy at their first command. They, however, sent ambassadors to represent to him that it would have been easier to put an end to the schism, if he had not consented to his election. To this observation he lifted off his cape, and replied that he was ready to resign at once his title to the papacy, if the king and university desired it. Benedict played his part so well, that he imposed on the partisans of Boniface, who detached themselves from the cause of that prelate, because he affected great hauteur, and loudly declared he would preserve his tiara, in despite of people and kings. At last, all minds appearing disposed for peace, a national council was convened at Paris; in this assembly the lords, prelates, and doctors in theology of the kingdom, decided that the only mode of putting an end to the schism was by the joint abdication of the pontiffs at Rome and Avignon. Charles the Sixth immediately sent ambassadors to notify Benedict of the result of the deliberations of the council of Paris, and instructed his uncles, the dukes of Berry and Burgundy, and also the duke of Orleans, his brother, and the chiefs of the embassy, to hand the following letter to the pope:—

"Most holy father, the desire you have always expressed, both in conversation and by writing, to put an end to the schism which troubles Christendom, has induced us to send to you as ambassadors, our uncles, our brother, and several notables of our kingdom, who will inform you of the decision of the great assembly which we have held in our good city, and who will consult with you on the measures which shall be deemed necessary to insure its entire execution."

Benedict, finding himself caught in his own trap, protracted the negotiations, seeking daily new pretexts for not giving a definite reply. At last, when he had exhausted all the resources of his obsequious and tricky policy, when he saw himself pushed to the wall, and compelled to decide, he published in the presence of the cardinals, his officers, and the ambassadors of France, a bull, providing "That Boniface the Ninth and himself, should meet with their cardinals in a safe place, under the protection of the king of France, in order to confer together on the reunion of the church; but he could not explain himself as to the clauses of their agreement, lest the enemies of the church should throw obstacles in the way of this interview; he would, however, declare that he was not permitted to employ the mode of cession, as this step was not canonical, and had not been followed by the fathers; that he would rather break a promise given inconsiderately, than be guilty of heresy, by introducing this criminal novelty; if, however, the schism could be extinguished, neither by means of an interview, nor that of arbitration, he would, in order to put an end to the scandal, propose, or accept any other means, provided they should be reasonable, fair, juridical, and reconcilable with the traditions of the church and the sacred canons."

After the reading of this bull, which exposed the bad faith of the pope, the ambassadors indignantly left the hall without saying a word, and retired to the other side of the Rhone, to a part of the town called the new city of Avignon, where they lodged; during the night they deliberated on what was to be done, and held communications with the cardinals. Benedict, being informed that these latter were communicating with the princes, feared a conspiracy, and caused the bridge to be burned, to intercept the communications. This step did not, however, prevent the ambassadors from crossing the river in the morning in boats, and assembling with the members of the sacred college in the convent of the Minor Brothers.

In this consistory, the bull of the holy father was unanimously condemned, and they decided that Benedict should at once lay down the tiara. Instead of obeying this injunction, the pontiff fulminated a second bull, confirmatory of the preceding one. The ambassadors and cardinals, then despairing of overcoming his obstinacy by menaces, determined to try a step of conciliation, and went to the pontifical palace, "and there," says the chronicle of the monk of St. Denis, "besought him on their knees to abdicate the papacy." But the knavish Benedict, finally raising the mask, said to them in a tone of arrogance:—"Know all of you, princes of the state and church, that you are my subjects, since God has submitted all men to my authority! Know that the cardinals have no other power than that of choosing as pope the most worthy of their number, and as soon as they have declared him supreme chief of the church, the Holy Spirit suddenly illuminates him; he becomes infallible, and his power equals that of God: he can be no longer subjected to any sway; he is placed above the powers of the earth, and he cannot be deposed from the apostolic throne, even by his own desire; the dignity of the pontiff is, finally, so redoubtable, that the world should listen to our decrees, bend in the dust, and tremble at our word!"

The ambassadors, discovering the uselessness of their efforts, left the assembly without taking leave of Benedict, and went immediately to Paris to render an account of their mission to King Charles, and to consult as to the measures to be adopted at this juncture. In accordance with the advice of the principal doctors of the university, it was decided to send deputies to all the courts of Europe to call a universal council, in order to depose the two popes.

Benedict, furious at the university which had led the way in these steps, endeavoured to weaken its authority by fulminating the most terrible anathemas against it; he declared its doctors, professors, students, and supporters enemies of God and men, and accursed for ever. The university, unterrified at these powerless bulls, protested against this violence, and appealed to the first pontiff who should be canonically chosen. The holy father then declared this appeal to be contrary to the fullness of power which had been transmitted to him by the apostle and his successors, and renewed his excommunication. At the same time he sent agents into all the courts who scattered, with a prodigal hand, gold and promises to prevent the convocation of a general council.

Benedict, not content with these intrigues, even sought to organise a conspiracy against his competitor; at his instigation, the bishop of Segovia and the count of Fondi, his creatures, corrupted the bannerets, excited the people, and made an attack on the palace of the Vatican, at the head of a troop of cavaliers, either to carry Boniface off or to kill him. But the attempt failed in consequence of the great promptness of Ladislaus, king of Naples, who was then at Rome, in sending assistance to the pontiff. The insurgents were put to flight, and the bishop of Segovia, the count of Fondi, and the bannerets were compelled to leave Italy, to escape the chastisement they deserved. Boniface, having escaped from this danger, as if by a miracle, determined to place himself beyond the reach of a new sedition; he took a large number of foreign soldiers into his pay, constructed fortified towers on the walls of the castle of St. Angelo, and made that fortress his residence.

As nothing seemed to indicate a termination to the disputes which troubled Christendom, Benedict not appearing anxious to make the slightest concession, the emperor Wenceslaus, Charles the Sixth, and several princes of Germany, with a large number of prelates, assembled in the city of Rheims, and determined to proceed to a new election, without troubling themselves about the acceptance or refusal of Peter de Luna, and only to send an ambassador to Boniface to exhort him to give in his abdication. Peter d'Ailly, bishop of Cambray, charged with this mission, came to Rome and found Boniface excellently disposed, at least apparently; for often having advised with his cardinals, he declared he would lay aside his tiara, if his adversary would bind himself to follow his example. Peter d'Ailly immediately returned to France, passing through Coblentz, where Wenceslaus was, to whom he rendered an account of the success of his embassy, expressing, however, his fears that the holy father would reconsider his resolve. "Since that is the case," said the emperor to him, "be tranquil; I pledge myself that Boniface is serious; tell the king of France to reduce his pope to obedience, I charge myself with mine."

As soon as the bishop of Cambray arrived at Paris, King Charles assembled a national council, to which the ambassadors of Hungary, Bohemia, England, Arragon, Castile, Navarre and Sicily were admitted; they decreed that, on account of the obstinacy of Benedict, they would refuse him all subsidies. "In consequence of which," says John Juvenal des Ursini, "the church of France recovered her ancient liberties and franchises; that is, the clergy were authorised to elect to dignities and benefices." The assembly also decreed that the king, without further preliminaries, should send the venerable Peter d'Ailly and the marshal de Boucicaut to Avignon with an army, to compel Benedict to leave the chair of the apostle, which decree was carried at once into effect.

The pope was much alarmed on learning of the arrival of the French envoys, and the approach of the troops; he, however, knew how to hide his emotion, and when the bishop of Cambray came to inform him of the decree of the council, he replied in a calm voice, "No, I will not abdicate. Let your master learn that I have been chosen sovereign pontiff by the will of God, and that I will never obey the will of men; my resistance to their perversity may gain for me the crown of martyrdom." After this reply, the cardinals, who foresaw the consequences of such a refusal, and were unwilling to expose themselves to the horrors of a siege, rose one after another from their seats, and left the hall of audience to make preparations for their departure. Peter d'Ailly and the marshal de Boucicaut retired in their turn, and caused Avignon to be invested by their troops. Then, in accordance with the customs of the time in declarations of war, the French general sent a herald-at-arms to defy the pope in his palace.

The inhabitants, alarmed by this demonstration, presented themselves in a mass at the pontifical palace, declaring that they did not wish a war with France. In vain did Benedict inform them that the city was strong and well provisioned, that his allies in Italy were levying troops to assist him, and that the king of Arragon, as his relative and spiritual son, would not fail to hasten to him at the first call; the magistrates were immoveable, and declared that the citizens would never fight against the French. "Well, then, go hence, villains," he exclaimed, in a transport of rage; "guard your houses if you can; I will well defend my palace." The gates of the city were opened at once, and Marshal Boucicaut entered Avignon.

The pope caused the drawbridge of his castle to be broken, and swore never to surrender, and to precipitate himself from the top of the tower, rather than to become a prisoner. He then wrote to Martin, king of Arragon, employing in turn entreaties and threats, to induce him to send troops to free him from the hands of the French. Here he was again deceived, for the prince, after reading the letter of the pontiff, said to his ambassador, "What! does this priest think that I am stupid enough to go to war with France, to sustain his sacerdotal knavery? He is a prisoner in his palace; well, let him remain one."

Obstinate, like all priests, Benedict none the less continued to defend himself; in person he animated his soldiers, says Juvenal des Ursini, and contributed to save the castle by his vigilance. One night whilst he was making his round of the walls, he heard a low noise of the footsteps of men, and the clash of swords; these were the besiegers, who, having removed the grating from the sewers of the kitchen, were gliding, under cover of the darkness of the night, into the court yard of the palace; he called some of the guards in a low voice, and as soon as his enemies reached the court, one by one he cast a covering over their heads to stifle their cries, and had them carried off to the prisons. They made about sixty prisoners before the rest learned their danger.

For the eight entire months during which the holy father had to sustain the rigours of a siege, his firmness did not desert him for a moment. Charles the Sixth, on his side, was inexorable, and only consented to change the siege into a blockade, until union should be restored to the church.

Very different from his competitor, who maintained his rights to the papacy by force of arms, Boniface preferred corruption to resistance, and applied himself to increase his treasures, to buy up consciences, and maintain himself upon the throne. All the resources of simony being exhausted, he published a new jubilee for the secular year, although ten years had scarcely gone by since the last. Here was also a scandalous traffic in indulgences and absolutions; but the offerings were not so abundant as at the preceding jubilee, either because the zeal of the faithful had relaxed, or the confidence of pilgrims in indulgences had diminished. Boniface then turned his attention to the clergy; he revoked the graces and benefices which were sold ten years before; annulled the unions of parishes made by him or his immediate predecessors, and set up all graces, benefices, and indulgences for sale. This measure still failed, and the levy on the clergy not answering his expectations, he had recourse to the inquisitory, and caused a prodigious crowd of heretics to be burned, so as to seize on their spoils. He also persecuted, and for the same motives, the sect of the Whites, a species of mendicant monks, who traversed Italy bearing crucifixes skilfully made, which permitted drops of blood to fall or tears to be shed, to soften the faithful and extort money from the ignorant and superstitious people. Boniface, who saw in these Whites redoubtable rivals, seized on the treasury of the sect as on goods which had been stolen from him, and caused the chief leaders of them to be arrested and burned alive.

Whilst the western church was rent by a deplorable schism, the eastern had to struggle against the new religion of Mahomet, whose dreadful caliphs had already reduced beneath the sway of the Koran the north of Africa and a part of Asia. Thus far, Constantinople had resisted the efforts of the infidels; the conquests of Bajazet induced the suspicion that the Musselmens thought of reducing the Greek empire beneath its sway, and Manuel Paleologus, who was then on the throne, foreseeing that he could not resist his terrible adversaries, abandoned his capital, which comprised, if we may so speak, all his empire, and came to France to ask aid from Charles the Sixth. He passed two whole years in the chateau of the Louvre, amidst feasts and pleasure; his negotiations with France, England, and Germany amounted to nothing, and he was suffered to return almost alone to the east, so much had the schism exhausted Europe of men and money. This journey of Manuel, was, however, very advantageous to Italy and France, for the learned men whom he brought with him introduced a knowledge of those immortal master-pieces of antiquity which the policy of the Latin priests had proscribed from Gaul, Germany, and the Roman peninsula, and prepared for that era of revival of art which is called the Renaissance.

A remarkable revolution took place during the last year of the fourteenth century. The Germans hurled from the throne Wenceslaus, the eldest son of Charles the Fourth, a monster of shamelessness, drunkenness, and cruelty, who inflicted the most execrable tyranny on the people. It is related that he never left his palace without an escort of executioners, whom he called his compeers, and who murdered the unfortunate men who chanced to pass by when he was drunk. His crimes at last maddened the people; generous citizens placed themselves at the head of a conspiracy, attacked the palace of Wenceslaus, made him a prisoner, and confined him in the dungeon of a fortress. Unfortunately, the young daughter of one of the jailers took pity on the dethroned king, and suffered him to escape from his prison by a secret passage.

As soon as the electors were apprised of his escape, they hastened to pronounce him deprived of the empire, and proclaimed Robert the Third, duke of Bavaria, king of Italy and Germany. The pope of Rome having approved of this election, Benedict the Thirteenth naturally took the side of Wenceslaus, who still had powerful friends in Bohemia, Germany, and even in Italy. Thus the two popes, by sustaining each of them one of the emperors, rekindled the civil war and put off indefinitely the meeting of the council which was to depose them.

France was also much agitated in regard to the question of obedience. The dukes of Berry and Burgundy, the greater party of the clergy, and the university of Paris maintained that they should exact the renunciation of the apostolic throne by the pope at Avignon. But the house of Orleans, making common cause with the ambassadors of the king of Arragon, the university of Toulouse, and several influential ecclesiastics who had been bribed by Benedict, set every engine to work to deliver the pope and render him obedience. Violent discussions took place on this subject; and the people, as usual, taking the part of one or the other, fought for the pope, the king, and the princes. At last, the party of Orleans triumphed: a Norman gentleman named Robert de Braquemond, governor of one of the cities adjacent to Avignon, permitted himself to be bribed, and consented to assist the escape of the pope. As his rank permitted him to enter into conferences with Benedict without exciting suspicion, he availed himself of it to concert with him a plan of escape. It was executed in the following manner:—

After a conference which had lasted into the night, the holy father enveloped himself in the mantle of one of the domestics of Braquemond, left the fortress, and traversed the hostile lines in the train of the captain. Once past the blockade of the city, he found an escort of five hundred men, who accompanied him to castle Raynard, which was reputed to be impregnable. From this retreat he wrote to the king:—"Our dear and well-beloved son,—We have been besieged for three years in the palace of our city of Avignon, and our sacred person has been exposed to the greatest dangers in defence of the liberties of the church. We have however learned, in our captivity, that our constancy in supporting the iniquities of men has not touched your gross mind, and that our courageous resignation has been regarded as a proof of weakness. We have accordingly determined to act otherwise; and after having humbly recommended our person to the divine mercy, we left, without fear, the palace and the city, traversed the lines of your soldiers, and have arrived, safe and sound, at castle Raynard, where we hope, with God's assistance, to be able to defy princes and lords, and make our holy cause triumph."

Benedict occupied himself in providing a numerous garrison for this place; and when he found himself beyond the reach of all danger he fulminated a bull of degradation against the cardinals, so as to render them incapable of choosing another pope: he then sent ambassadors to the kings of Arragon and Spain to inform them of the change in his position.

These sovereigns, seeing that the party of the holy father was gaining the upper hand, feared to expose themselves to his vengeance, and took the oaths of obedience and submission to him. The envoys of Hungary imitated this example, as well as a large number of ecclesiastics and several French lords. The cardinals themselves followed the impulse which was given, and addressed a supplication to him to be received to his communion. As a kind master, the pontiff retracted the bull lanced against them, and invited them to a great festival as a token of reconciliation. "But," says the monk of St. Denis, "they might have excused such an honour, for they paid a dear reckoning in the great fright to which they were subjected. As soon as they were at the table, on a given signal armed men entered the banqueting hall with their drawn swords in their hands, appearing to await only the order to massacre them. The holy father amused himself for some minutes with the expression of fear on their countenances; he then sent away his guards, and contented himself with causing them to sign a treaty in which they pledged themselves to an entire and blind obedience to him, and promised to labour with all their might to reduce France beneath his sway."

In consequence of this amnesty, things were re-established as before: Benedict, however, was unwilling to pardon the city of Avignon except on condition that the citizens would repair, at their own expense, the fortifications of the pontifical palace, and pay a large sum as an indemnity for the war. These preliminaries adjusted, he gave full powers to the cardinals of Poitiers and Saluca to negotiate a peace with Charles the Sixth, and obtain the re-establishment of his authority in the kingdom. A large number of cities did not wait for the decree of the king to recognise the authority of the pope, so tired were they of the quarrel. At Paris, in several churches, the ecclesiastics immediately attached to an onyx shell the name of the pontiff and the date of his advent to the apostolic throne.

Charles the Sixth received the legates with distinction, and engaged by oath to recognise Benedict as before, as lawful chief of the church. He published the following edict on the subject: "Five years have passed since the clergy and lords of our kingdom, having met in assembly, declared, that to put an end to the schism, the two popes must be constrained to descend from the chair of St. Peter. In consequence of this decision, our kingdom was relieved from its obedience to Benedict the Thirteenth: unfortunately, the success we hoped for from this determination has not been realised; we thought that the intruder, Boniface, would be abandoned by his followers; but, on the contrary, he is more and more strengthened in his obstinacy. This anti-pope has constantly refused to descend from the Holy See, though Benedict has authentically offered to submit to the event of a new election. Besides, the cardinals, absolute judges of the remedies which should be employed to extinguish the schism, after having seceded from the holy father, having again placed themselves under his authority, we could not remain longer disobedient to him.

"In consequence of these considerations, and with the advice of our uncles, the dukes of Berry and Burgundy; of our brother, duke of Orleans; of our principal lords and prelates, and of the universities of Paris, Orleans, Toulouse, Angiers, and Montpellier, we declare that from this time the withdrawal has ceased; we restore to Benedict entire rule over us and our kingdom, expressly commanding our judges to publish this decree, and to punish, with all the rigour of the laws, those who contravene our present will."

As soon as Benedict was apprised of the favourable result of the negotiations of his legates, he left castle Raynard in triumph, and returned to his palace at Avignon. As long as he was a prisoner, the holy father made the most magnificent promises, and pledged himself to maintain in their offices, the ecclesiastics who had been promoted during the withdrawal; but as soon as he found himself free and powerful, he refused to confirm the different promotions which had been made, and exacted from the bishops an enormous sum for investitures. He anathematised the lords who had declared against him, placed the cities and convents within their jurisdiction under interdict, and laid on them a heavy fine to purchase their absolution. At last, when he had by his manœuvres refilled his purse, he recommenced hostilities against his competitor, with greater bitterness and fury than ever. Unfortunately for him, the authority of Boniface rested on a solid basis in Italy and Germany, and he found that he had profited by time and circumstances. In fact, on the death of Galeas, the tyrant of Milan, the pope had seized on the cities of Bologna, Perouse, and Modena—had laid a strong hand on his treasures, and had with these resources created a powerful party in Rome, where he reigned as absolute master. At that moment he was engaged in placing Ladislaus upon the throne of Hungary, in order to reduce that kingdom to his authority, by overthrowing Sigismund, the brother of Wenceslaus, his personal enemy. The Hungarians had revolted at his instigation, had made the king a prisoner, plunged him in the dungeon of a castle, and had proclaimed Ladislaus, the next heir to Queen Mary, whose memory they venerated, king.

This prince came at once to Warasdin, and was crowned by the cardinal legate Angus Acciajoli. His reign was of short duration. Having wished to levy new imposts upon the people, to pay to the holy father the arrearages of tax which had been due for three years, the provinces broke out into full revolt; Sigismund was taken out of prison, an army of peasants assembled round him, and marched against Ladislaus. The latter fled on the approach of his enemy, embarked on the shores of Dalmatia, and returned to Naples. A second time master of Hungary, the cruel Sigismund avenged himself on those who had declared for his competitor. He burned whole cities, levelled churches and monasteries to their foundations, and put to the sword the ecclesiastics and lords who supported Boniface. Such were the sad results to Hungary of its alliances with the pope.

Benedict wished to profit by this check to make a last effort with his rival; and, as he knew his unbounded love for money, he hoped, that by offering him a large sum, he might induce him to sell his share of the papacy. If the proposal was not agreed to, this step was not without danger with a skilful enemy, and could not especially be confided to secret agents, whom his competitor might cause to be arrested and tortured, in order to obtain revelations. He sent to Rome a solemn embassy, with apparent instructions to labour for a reunion of the church, and to offer to Boniface to make a mutual cession, and both to submit to a new election. The true object of his embassy was to make a bargain with his rival; and he selected for this negotiation safe, wary, and prudent men.

As soon as the ambassadors arrived at Rome, the holy father sent to them rich presents, and caused them to be invited, by his cardinals, to splendid festivals; refusing, however, to see them, and grant them an audience, until they should render him in public the honours which were due to his dignity. They, having deliberated about it, passed over this incident, which was unimportant, and appeared to yield with a good grace the point of ceremonial. Charmed with this mark of condescension, the pope conceived the hope of bringing them over to his interests, and consented to give them a secret audience; but when he saw that, far from taking his side, they wished, on the contrary, to induce him to sell his tiara to his competitor, he changed his tactics, skilfully dissimulated the wrath and contempt he felt for such an overture, and dismissed them, saying it was necessary to reflect on their proposal. Two days afterwards he secretly convoked in council the ambassadors of England and Naples, the magistrates of Rome, the bishops, cardinals, and all the officers of his court; he then sent to inform the envoys of Benedict that he waited to close with them. The French prelates hastened to the Vatican, and before they had time to concert measures, they were introduced into the consistory.

Boniface then turned towards them:—"I accuse," said he, in a thundering tone of voice, "Peter de Luna, the Arragonese, the anti-pope, who calls himself Benedict the Thirteenth, of having proposed an infamous bargain to me; of having offered me ten millions of florins in gold for the papacy! I summon his agents to confirm, by their testimony, the truth of my accusations!" Placing himself on the throne, with all the majesty of a conqueror, he awaited their reply. All this had been foreseen by the wary Benedict; the em-bassadors advanced into the midst of the assembly, and after having played the part of surprise and indignation, they declared under oath, that it was not their master, but Boniface himself, who had proposed this criminal bargain. Such audacity transported the holy father with fury; he ordered them to be put at once to the torture in full consistory, to draw from them an avowal of their felony.

Without appearing alarmed at the wrath they had excited, they replied that they were ready to suffer all kinds of torture, and even death, to defend the reputation of their master, but that in this circumstance, however, the truth was too palpable to render it necessary for them to submit to such proof; they, accordingly, invoked the inviolability attached to their character as ambassadors, and guaranteed by a safe conduct signed by Boniface. "This reply," says Theodoric of Niem, "so increased the anger of the pope, that he fell into a fit and was obliged to be carried to his apartment: three days afterwards his reign terminated. He was interred without pomp in the church of St. Peter, on the 2d of October, 1404, in the presence of the ambassadors of Benedict."

THE FIFTEENTH CENTURY.

INNOCENT THE SEVENTH, THE TWO HUNDRED AND NINTH POPE, AT ROME.

BENEDICT THE THIRTEENTH, AT AVIGNON.

[A. D. 1404.]

Reflections on the corruptions of the clergy in the fifteenth century—The legates of Benedict the Thirteenth are retained prisoners at Rome—Election of Innocent the Seventh—Character of the new pope—Sedition at Rome—Innocent takes refuge at Viterba—Benedict the Thirteenth goes to Italy—Innocent returns to Rome—Benedict causes his competitor to be poisoned—Council of France.

DURING the fifth century of the church, humility became a disgrace, and poverty an opprobrium for the ministers of religion. Already had bishops, charged with dispensing the blessings of heaven to the faithful, renounced their holy ministry, in order to occupy themselves about the means of enlarging their revenues and increasing their enjoyments. Thus pride, ambition, gormandising, and luxury formed the train of the bishops of Rome; the successors of the apostle became the king of kings and lord of lords, and the apostolic chamber, like a gaping gulf, swallowed up for their advantage the riches of nations.

The fifteenth century, however, surpassed all the preceding ages in corruption; the churches became the resorts of robbers, sodomites and assassins, popes, cardinals, bishops, and mere clerks exercised brigandage forcibly in the provinces, and employed, as was most convenient, poison, the sword, and fire to free themselves from their enemies, and despoil their victims. The inquisition lent its horrible ministry to popes and kings. In France, Spain, Italy, Germany, and England, it embraced in its thousand arms the victims to the cupidity of tyrants, and put them to the most frightful tortures. The country was covered with legions of priests and monks, who devoured the substance of the people, and carried off to their impure retreats, young girls and handsome youths, whom they again cast out disgraced and dishonoured; the cities became the theatres of orgies and saturnalia, and the palaces of bishops were filled with equipages for the chase, packs of dogs, troops of courtezans, minions, jugglers and buffoons

To all these causes of demoralization was joined the great schism which divided Europe into two hostile camps, and caused torrents of blood to flow.

At length, some courageous men undertook the defence of the oppressed people; the descendants of the unfortunate Vaudois or Albigenses, so cruelly persecuted by the pontiffs, raised their heads and taught their doctrines in England, Germany, and France. Wickliff, John Huss, and Jerome of Prague continued the movement, and prepared the way for the religious reform which was to strike so terrible a blow on the temporal power of the popes.

By the unforeseen death of the pontiff, Boniface the Ninth, the question of the schism seemed simplified, and the French ambassadors hoped to obtain from the cardinals the recognition of Benedict the Thirteenth, as lawful chief of the church. In consequence of this, on the day succeeding the funeral of the deceased pope, they went to the members of the sacred college, who were preparing to go into conclave, and besought them to defer the election, until they had received from their master a procuration of cession. Unfortunately, they had not money enough to buy all the cardinals; so that, instead of paying any attention to their request, they accused them of endeavouring to excite trouble, to hinder the election. A Neapolitan knight, who was a relative of Boniface, and governor of the castle of St. Angelo, caused them to be arrested, notwithstanding their right to safe conduct as ambassadors, and would not consent to restore them to freedom, until he had received a large ransom.

Immediately after their departure, the members of the college went into conclave, and proclaimed Cosmato Meliorato sovereign pontiff, by the name of Innocent the Seventh. The new chief of the church came from Sulmona, a town of the kingdom of Naples, celebrated as the birth-place of Ovid. Sprung from the lowest ranks of society, Cosmato, by merit alone, had been elevated through all the ecclesiastical grades successively; and the only thing for which he could be reproached was an excessive ambition.

Innocent was received by the Italian ecclesiastics without opposition, but it was not so with the citizens, who laid claim to the government of affairs on which Boniface the Ninth had seized to their prejudice. The Ghibelines placed themselves at the head of the malcontents; and, with the assistance of John and Nicholas Colonna, attacked the Guelphs, and crowded them into the part of the city situated beyond the Tiber. Forced to give satisfaction to the rebels, Innocent concluded a treaty with them, by which he declared that he yielded to them the sovereignty in Rome, and consented that the citizens should appoint regents to conduct the business of the state.

Notwithstanding this solemn recognition of the rights of the people, he soon thought to re-establish his sway; he wished, under pretext of placing himself beyond the reach of a sudden attack, to surround Rome with troops, and introduce several free companies into the Leonine city. As this manifestation compromised the public liberty, the regents went to the pontifical palace, to address remonstrances to the holy father, and to beseech him to remove his soldiers; but time was not given to them to discharge their mission. Scarcely had they entered the hall of audience, when, by the command of Louis Meliorato, nephew of the pope, ferocious satellites fell on them, seized them by their arms and feet, and hurled them from the windows of the Vatican upon the pavement, where they were killed by the violence of the fall.

Such an atrocity, committed in defiance of laws both human and divine, exasperated men's minds; the great bell of the capitol was rung—the people flew to arms, attacked the palaces of the cardinals, and hung all of them whom they could seize. Innocent had scarcely time to avoid, with his court, the fate of his partizans; his armorial bearings were dragged through the mud, his portraits broken, and his effigy, clothed in pontifical habits, publicly burned.

Benedict, informed of what was passing at Rome, wished to profit by the circumstances, and published that he was preparing to go to Italy, to confer with his competitor as to the means of bringing about a reunion of the church; he accordingly ordered a levy of tenths in France, and the different countries which were subservient to him, to defray the expenses of his journey. This new impost was paid by the provinces, notwithstanding the active opposition of parliament; and the holy father was enabled to embark at Nice, to put his plans in execution. He first went to Genoa, where the marshal de Boucicaut, his old adversary, who, since the cessation of hostilities, had become his friend, commanded. Through his influence, that city declared in favour of the pope of Avignon, and determined Pisa and the neighbouring villages to throw off their obedience to the Roman pontiff.

The Genoese soon repented of having permitted Benedict the Thirteenth, and the vagabonds who formed his body guard, to enter their city. His soldiery, accustomed to pillage, excited so much discontent, that Marshal Boucicaut determined to deliver the inhabitants from them. One Sunday, he informed the pope that he desired to review his troops, and asked authority from him to muster them without the walls of the city. When the soldiers had all gone out, he caused the gates to be closed, and announced to them that they were expressly prohibited from re-entering Genoa. The pontiff vainly strove to change the determination of the governor, and was obliged to disband his army.

Whilst the pope of Avignon was seeking to maintain himself in Italy, a civil war was kindled in Rome; the usurper of the kingdom of Naples, Ladislaus, had leagued with John Colonna, to reduce the new republic, and prepared for the execution of his plans, by sending troops towards the holy city. Forunately, the inhabitants were informed of the plans of their enemies, and endeavoured to drive the Colonna from Rome. They, however, maintained themselves in the castle of St. Angelo, from which they made daily murderous sorties. After several assaults, the citizens, discovering the impossibility of taking this fortress without foreign succour, decided to recall Innocent the Ninth, and informed him they would reinstall him in the Holy See, if he would engage to deliver them from the Colonna. The pope joyfully accepted the conditions offered him; he started immediately to take possession of the Vatican; and, on the very day of his arrival, lanced a terrible excommunication against the Colonna, the king of Naples, and all their partizans. Ladislaus, whose right to the crown of Naples was already contested by the duke of Anjou, feared lest an anathema should excite new enemies against him, and consented to make peace with the Holy See. He engaged to restore all the territory he had taken from St. Peter, and promised to furnish troops to Innocent, with which to combat his enemies.

Benedict the Thirteenth, who had essayed to frustrate these negotiations, having failed in his efforts, took other measures more efficacious than those he had employed, and simply decided to poison his competitor. He sent a solemn embassy to Rome, with the apparent purpose of proposing some mode of putting an end to the schism, and secretly instructed to bribe, at any price, a servant of the pope. Innocent, who had no more intention of abdicating than his rival, nor the desire of making any concession, refused to give an audience to the ambassadors. Benedict availed himself of this, and spread letters through all Europe in which his rival was called perjured, schismatic and heretic. The Roman pontiff on his side lanced terrible bulls against his adversary, and accused him of having sent his agents for the sole purpose of assassinating him. Benedict, judging from this that his plan was discovered, despaired of reigning in Italy, and returned to France, where, during his absence, matters had changed much. A formidable party was formed against him at the court of Charles the Sixth, and wished to pronounce him deprived of the Holy See. The wary pope applied himself at once to bringing back their minds, and sent the cardinal Chalaut as his legate to explain his conduct. An assembly of the lords, bishops, and doctors of the university was convened at Paris; the ambassador of the pope, in a long harangue, dwelt upon the vices of the court of Innocent, and pronounced a pompous eulogium on Benedict. His conclusion was, that his master, as the most worthy, should govern the church; and that it was the duty of all the faithful to submit to him.

Notwithstanding the brilliant addresses of the legate, the members of the council condemned the holy father, and declared that France should a second time withdraw its obedience from him. They accordingly published the following decree: "We inform all persons that the officers of Benedict shall no more receive annates, nor the revenues of vacant prelacies and dignities; that they must cease for the present from levying tithes upon the churches, and from claiming subsidies under any pretext whatsoever. Cardinals and chamberlains are prohibited from receiving, taking, or exacting the smallest sum until the holding of the national council, which is to be convened to put an end to the schism." This ordinance was scarcely made, when the death of Innocent the Seventh was known in France. The legates of Benedict had fulfilled their mission.

The national council, however, assembled at Paris, and confirmed the decision which had been made in regard to the relinquishment of the Holy See. Before separating, the fathers addressed, in the name of the king, a synodical letter to the Roman cardinals, to beseech them to put off the election of another pope; but the sacred college had already assembled in conclave and proclaimed the cardinal Angelo Corario sovereign pontiff, by the name of Gregory the Twelfth. This fatal haste of the Italian prelates discontented the French bishops, and prolonged the schism, by rallying around Benedict partizans who had detached themselves from his cause.

GREGORY THE TWELFTH, THE TWO HUNDRED AND TENTH POPE, AT ROME.

BENEDICT THE THIRTEENTH, AT AVIGNON.

[A. D. 1406.]

History of the cardinal Angelo Corario before his pontificate—Oath of the cardinals—Gregory sends an embassy to Benedict—Benedict excommunicates the national council—Knaveries of the two popes—Violent character of Gregory—The Roman cardinals abandon his party—He lances ecclesiastical thunders against them—King Charles the Sixth summons the pope at Avignon to lay down the papacy—Benedict places France under interdict—The bearers of his bulls are arrested by the order of the king, and subjected to an ignominious punishment—He flies from Avignon—Council of Pisa—Condemnation of the two popes—Election of a third pope.

GREGORY THE TWELFTH was descended from a noble Venetian family; he was eighty years old, and had passed through all grades in the church before he reached the sovereign pontificate. Before his election he was quoted as a model of mildness, prudence, humility, and holiness. On the eve of the conclave he had even proposed to the cardinals to take separately the following oath: "I swear on the gospels and the consecrated host, that in case I shall be chosen pontiff, I will renounce the dignity if the pope at Avignon will consent to abdicate: or if death strikes him, or even if the cardinals of both sides coalesce."

His first steps answered the hopes which had been placed in him from the day of his exaltation; he renewed the solemn oath he had before taken, and in the presence of the cardinals of his court, thus expressed himself: "Anathema on schismatics, whatever may be their power and dignity! Anathema on them! Anathema on myself, if I do not employ all my efforts to put an end to the unfortunate division which brings misfortune and disgrace on Christianity! Yes, my brethren, I swear from the chair of truth, that I will go to the council which shall be convened to settle the differences, notwithstanding my age and infirmities, and wherever it assembles; if I have no galley, I will dare the sea in a boat; and if I have no horses, I will go on foot, with my staff in my hand." In order to give more force to his words, he read publicly a letter which he addressed to Benedict to urge him to renounce with him the sovereign pontificate, and both to submit to a new election.

Benedict, who was at Marseilles, received the deputies with great honours; he appeared disposed to follow the example of Gregory, and even consented to an interview with his rival in the city of Savona. Gregory then cast aside the mask of hypocrisy which he had worn for eighty years; this humble and simple man changed in an instant his character and language, and showed himself proud and haughty, covered himself with robes of purple and gold, surrounded himself with all the pomp of courts, and caused himself to be adored as a god. When the French ambassadors came to offer him all kinds of guarantees and sureties on the part of the king, that he might go to Savona, as he had solemnly engaged to do, he replied to them with hauteur that he had no promise to fulfil, or condition to comply with. He dismissed the ambassadors, and ordered the cardinals never again to speak to him of abdicating, if they did not wish to incur his displeasure.

As soon as Benedict was informed of what had taken place at Rome, his hopes and audacity increased; he hastened to publish a bull of excommunication against the national council, which had decreed the withdrawal of the French from his obedience; he anathematised in general all who had taken part in this salutary measure, mere laymen, cardinals, patriarchs, archbishops, kings, or emperors; he declared that if, at the expiration of twenty days after the publication of the sentence, the excommunicated persisted in their resolution, the ecclesiastics should be deprived of their benefices, and the territories or domains of secular princes placed under interdict. He freed vassals from their oaths of fidelity, he confiscated all the fiefs, goods, moveables, or immoveables of the excommunicated, enveloping, in the same sentence of excommunication and interdiction, kingdoms, republics, cities, castles, universities, colleges, churches, and communities, which were favourable to those who had already withdrawn from obedience to him. Then, to show how ardently he desired the reunion of the church, he went immediately to Savona and informed his competitor that he was waiting at the appointed place, to confer upon the best mode of putting an end to the schism.

Several cotemporary historians affirm that the two popes had agreed neither of them to withdraw, whilst still appearing to desire it, and thus to make all Europe the dupe of their knavery. Gregory, in fact, went as far as Lucca, received the nuncios of his competitor with distinction, and replied to them in a public audience, that he had the same intention as their master, and that he only waited for his abdication to renounce the tiara himself, and put an end to the schism. This reply gave great joy to the cardinals of both parties, but it was of short duration.

"These two popes," says Theodoric of Niem, "were like two champions who present themselves in a listed field to combat to the death, after having secretly agreed not to inflict a wound; they impudently amuse themselves with the spectators, and the combat having finished, they divide the prize of the tourney, congratulating themselves in the success of their trick." The same historian adds, "If one was desirous of recounting all the knaveries, iniquities, and crimes of Gregory the Twelfth and Benedict the Thirteenth, it would be necessary for him to add three lives to the duration of his own; he would then run the risk of failing in paper and ink. These two wretches have cauterised consciences; they fill Christendom with vice, pillage, and murder; through their deplorable influence the Christian world is abandoned to frightful calamities; fear of God, modesty, pity, equity, and all the virtues have been banished from among men, great and small, from the king to the serf; impiety, avarice, and licentiousness reign with them over the faithful. There is nothing sound or whole in the universal church; all its body is covered with an impure leprosy, from the sole of the feet to the crown of the head." The farce played, the two popes retired, each to the country of their jurisdiction, and committed new brigandages.

Gregory confiscated the property of the Italian ecclesiastics, who were suspected of a desire to put an end to the schism; he sold castles and ecclesiastical domains, created new magistrates, removed the old, and imposed extraordinary imposts on the clergy for the maintenance of his numerous soldiery. Notwithstanding the incessant marks of submission by his priests, he had no regard for them, and constantly threatened them with his anathemas, whenever they ventured to address any remonstrances to him in regard to his withdrawal. Two of his cardinals having reminded him of the oath he had taken at the time of his exaltation, he made this reply to them: "Are you ignorant that popes have the power to take oaths and then perjure themselves if they wish to, since they are above every thing in this world?" A preacher of the order of the Carmelites having dared to maintain a contrary doctrine, was arrested by order of the pontiff, and put to the torture as a heretic.

To prevent a recurrence of such attacks upon his authority, Gregory published a bull prohibiting any ecclesiastic from delivering any sermon or public discourse, until it had been submitted to a censor. This arbitrary act excited opposition in all quarters, and the cardinals came in a body to entreat the holy father to retract this bull of iniquity. His reply was, that he would immediately frame a new college, as he was tired of their murmurs, and, in fact, he elevated to the cardinalate four priests, his creatures, who were steeped in debauchery.

All the cardinals then abandoned his court, and went to their estates. Leonard Aretin, who was at Lucca, relates this circumstance at length, in a letter addressed to his friend Petrillo; it is as follows: "We have well divined that the clouds, which were gathering on the horizon, would break in a terrible storm. The cardinals, who have been, for a long time, irritated at the insolence, perfidy, and pride of the pope, have at last lost their patience, and abandoned that vicious and obstinate old man. I praise your prudence in having foreseen the tempest and retired to Naples, and I blame myself for having dared it, by remaining here.

"You know the mystification to which these two popes have subjected their partizans in regard to the place which should be fixed on for their interview. Gregory affirmed that all cities were equally agreeable to him, provided they were not situated on the sea shore. Benedict found them all to his taste, provided they were not in the interior. It might have been supposed that one was an aquatic animal which had a horror of dry land, and the other a terrestrial animal which dreaded the water. Every body murmured at this conduct, and no one could see without indignation two men, more than septuagenarians, sacrificing religion and the church to reign for a few days longer over the consciences of the simple. The cardinals of Gregory having dared to address remonstrances to him on this subject, he determined to frame a new court for himself, and convened the sacred college in consistory to ratify the promotions of his creatures. Several members resisted, and wished to leave the assembly. The pontiff then descended from his throne, and placing himself before the door of the saloon, threatened them with his wrath if they should dare to leave the consistory without his orders. After this he gave a signal to armed men to surround the council hall. The prelates, filled with indignation, regarded each other in astonishment without speaking; at last the cardinal Raynald, of Saint Vit, broke the silence, and demanded from Gregory what he wished them to do. 'I intend,' he replied, 'to provide for the safety of the church by making an entire reformation of the sacred college.'—'No,' replied the former, 'it is its ruin you desire.' Then advancing resolutely into the midst of the assembly, 'No,' he added, in a firm and strong voice: 'it is much better to suffer all kinds of torture than the indignities of this execrable pope!' This sally, as you might suppose, my dear Petrillo, excited great agitation in the council. Some, dreading the vengeance of Gregory, exclaimed, that they ought to obey him: others, transported with rage, heaped curses and reproaches on him; others contented themselves with groans and tears.

"I myself saw the venerable cardinal Colonna cast himself on his knees before the pontiff and beseech him, with joined hands, to desist from such a measure; but instead of allowing himself to be softened by tears and prayers, Gregory became still more insolent. He prohibited the cardinals from leaving the city of Lucca under penalty of being declared heretics, and as such to be burned: he then drove them from the consistory with blows of halberds. One of our cardinals, the bishop of Liege, a German, escaped in the disguise of a porter, and retired to a small town in the territory of Florence. As soon as Gregory was informed of this flight, he sent a troop of horse in pursuit of the prelate, with orders to bring him back, dead or alive. Fortunately for the bishop, the garrison of the town in which he had taken refuge defended him, and repulsed the soldiers of the pope: several were slain, and the rest forced to fall back on Lucca. From this resulted a quarrel between the governor and the holy father, and, favoured by the confusion, the cardinals escaped to Pisa, where they are now in safety."

As soon as the members of the sacred college were established in this last residence, they published the following manifesto against Gregory: "We have left the court of that accursed pope because he desired to murder several of us, and because we knew that he was making, in his palace, irons to chain us, and instruments of torture to be applied to us, as Urban the Sixth did to some of our predecessors. For our own safety, and that of the church, we have removed our persons beyond the reach of the cruelty of this schismatic pope, and we protest before all Christendom against his acts of violence. We also protest against his prohibition of our assembling in any place without his authority; because such an order overthrows the institution of our college, which has a right to assemble to judge of the principles of the faith, heresies, and schisms. We also protest against the prohibition of communion with the cardinals or deputies of Benedict the Thirteenth, or with the ambassadors of the court of France; because we are compelled by our oath to take all measures which shall be necessary to restore union to the church. Finally, we appeal from his decretals and anathemas, to a general council, which, according to the custom of the church, shall judge his actions and ours."

This declaration was made known to Gregory in a public consistory, whilst he was giving to the cardinals of the last promotion the rings and other marks of their dignity. During the sitting, the holy father fulminated a terrible anathema against the signers of the protest, declaring them to be stripped of their dignities, deprived of their benefices, and interdicted from all sacerdotal functions. The faithful, who were obedient to him, were prohibited from communing with them, or giving them an asylum, under penalty of incurring a like excommunication; and on the next day he sent to the different princes of his communion, a bull, in which he exposed the treason of his cardinals, who, according to his story, wished to depose him in order to recognise Peter de Luna.

They replied to the libellous calumniator by causing to be affixed to the pontifical palace and the cathedral of Lucca, the following act, which has been transmitted to us by Theodoric de Niem: "Anathema on Gregory the coward, the drunkard, and the knave; the man of blood, the illustrious robber, the schismatic, the heretic, the precursor of antichrist! Anathema upon him! He has mounted the chair of the apostle like a thief, to set fire to the four corners of the house of God, and to pull down its columns! Anathema upon him, for he is associated in an infernal conspiracy with the infamous Benedict, a worthy co-partner in his work of violence and iniquity. Not content with what they have already done, these two wretches still wish to bend beneath their tyranny, prelates, princes, kings, and people, and to take from them the very garments which cover them. But we are about to arrest the evil, and undeceive the nations, by opening their eyes, and teaching them that the popes are insatiable and cruel impostors, who, in the name of God, impudently make sport of men, and seek to render their reign eternal by stifling the light of knowledge.

"You, Gregory! We will unveil all your turpitudes and your incestuous amour with your own sister. We will cite you before our tribunal at Pisa to depose you from the Holy See, which you have usurped and profaned, and to degrade you from every dignity. If you shall refuse to appear before us, we shall none the less proceed with your condemnation.

"We have already deposed your chamberlains, those purveyors of your hideous lubricity; we have excommunicated Gabriel, your eldest son, who is also your minion; the archbishop of Ragusa, your prothonotary, who has filled your bald head with the fumes of pride; and, finally, your legate, that young monk, your partner in bestiality!"

Whilst they were thus proceeding in Italy against Gregory, the king of France caused Benedict the Thirteenth, who was still at Genoa, to be notified by his ambassadors, that if the union was not concluded before the festival of the Ascension, he should prohibit his re-entering his kingdom or even Provence. The pontiff sent at once to Charles, several of his confidential friends, with a bull, containing these propositions: "The sovereign father of the faithful, declares ecclesiastics, lords, princes, kings, and people, whose opinions are contrary to his, excommunicated; he anathematizes those who retract from the obedience due to him, and who refuse him the levies of pence or the collation of benefices; finally, if in twenty days France is not entirely subjected to him, he will pronounce a general interdict upon all its territories, will suspend all the beneficiaries, and will free the faithful from their oaths of allegiance to the king and princes; he will, moreover, give the crown to a monarch who will be devoted and submissive to him."

As soon as the envoys of the pontiff had fulfilled their mission, they left Paris, without waiting for the decision of the council, which they supposed would be unfavourable to them, as was the case. The French ecclesiastics and the members of the university, declared by their organ, John of Courtecuisse, that Benedict was an obstinate schismatic and heretic, a disturber of the peace of church and state, and as such, could no longer be regarded as pope or cardinal; that they ought to refuse obedience to him, place him under the ban of the kingdom, and punish those who gave him council, aid, succour, protection, or asylum. His bulls were torn by the hands of the executioner, and the priests, who had the audacity to carry it, were condemned to an ignominious punishment, of which the monk of St. Denis has left us a description.

"The horsemen of the pope's stable were caught on their route," says the chronicle, "and, that their punishment should render the partizans of Peter de Luna more circumspect in future, they placed paper mitres on Sancho Lopez and his colleagues, clothed them in a dalmatic of black cloth, on which were the arms of Benedict the Thirteenth, covered with insulting placards; and in this condition they were led about in a tumbril filled with filth and excrements, as far as the court of the palace; they caused them to mount a scaffold, and in the presence of an immense crowd the executioner buffeted them, and spit in their faces, as a mark of contempt."

At the request of the university, King Charles addressed a letter to the two colleges of cardinals, to exhort them to meet and labour efficaciously for the extinction of the schism. Benedict, finding himself rejected by the French, and hunted by King Ladislaus, was compelled to quit Genoa, remount his galleys and keep the sea for two months without daring to land. Finally, he disembarked in Catalonia, and went to Perpignan, a frontier city of France and Arragon, to abide in safety the end of the storm.

After having regularly cited the two popes before their tribunal, the cardinals of both parties assembled in the cathedral of Pisa; a crier, standing on the threshold of the church, summoned Benedict and Gregory in a loud voice, and as they did not appear, nor any one for them, the two rivals were, after the third call, declared to be contumacious; the patriarch of Alexandria then mounted the pulpit of the church, and pronounced the following sentence:—"In the name of Jesus Christ, the sacred universal council, assembled under the guidance of the Holy Spirit, after having examined the accusations against Peter de Luna and Angelo Corario, declare that these two infamous men are guilty of enormous iniquities and excesses; that they should be cut off for ever from the church, and rejected from the bosom of God. Consequently, they are, as such, deposed from every sacerdotal function, and prohibited from styling themselves sovereign pontiffs. The council declares the Holy See vacant, and that the lawful ecclesiastics shall proceed to the regular election of a pope, and those who shall refuse to submit to this sentence shall be handed over to secular justice, as the divine precepts and sacred canons command.

"The council, moreover, erases and annuls the procedures, decretals, excommunications, and interdicts fulminated against clergy and laity, by the two popes; they absolve from all their oaths, Christians who have ranged themselves under their rule, prohibiting them expressly from obeying the two rivals, and from giving them counsel and an asylum, under the penalty of anathema, and other censures, pronounced by the holy fathers.—Finally, the council erases the promotions to the cardinalate, or rather the profanations committed by Angelo Corario, since the 3d of May, 1408, and by Peter de Luna, since the 15th of June, in the same year."

Immediately afterwards the cardinals went into conclave, to choose a pope, and signed the following engagement:—"We, the members of the sacred college, bishops, priests, and deacons, assembled at Pisa, for the extinction of the schism, engage, by oath on the sacred body of Christ, to continue the council, even after the election of a sovereign pontiff, and not to permit it to be dissolved before having made a lawful, reasonable, and sufficient reform in the church, as well for its chief as its other members." On the same evening, twenty-four cardinals assembled in the episcopal palace of Pisa, and ten days afterwards they proclaimed as chief of the universal church, Peter Philargi or Philaret, of Candia.

ALEXANDER THE FIFTH, THE TWO HUNDRED AND ELEVENTH POPE, AT ROME.

BENEDICT THE THIRTEENTH, AT AVIGNON.

GREGORY THE TWELFTH, BECOME ANTI-POPE.

[A. D. 1409.]

History of Peter Philargi before his election—Louis of Anjou recognised by him as king of Sicily—Weakness of Alexander's government—His bulls—He re-establishes the authority of the Holy See in Rome—His journey to Bologna—France refuses him the tenths—Cardinal Balthasar Cossa administers poison to him—His obsequies.

SEVERAL cotemporary historians, among others the monk of St. Denis, Theodorico of Niem, Monstrelet, Philip of Bergamo, and Platina, affirm that Peter Philargi, surnamed the cardinal of Milan, was born in the isle of Candia or Crete; other chroniclers maintain that he was of Novarro or Bologna, and several relate that at his death the holy father declared he was a Milanese, and originally from a city called Candia, situated in the territory of Pavia. Although there are these different versions, his election is none the less one of the most extraordinary examples of the pranks of fortune; and it appears as if Divine Providence was pleased to draw this pope from the most profound abyss of baseness, to elevate him slowly and by degrees to the culminating point of greatness and glory.

In his earliest infancy, Peter Philargi had been abandoned on the high road, so that he afterwards avowed that he would be much embarrassed in enriching and favouring his relatives as his predecessors had done, since he had known neither father nor mother, nor any one in the world attached to him by ties of blood. He wandered through the streets of Candia, imploring alms from door to door, when an Italian Cordelier accidentally met him. Touched by the state of the child, whose intelligent and suffering physiognomy announced intelligence beyond his years, the monk took him to his monastery to serve in the church. His protector taught him Latin and the holy scriptures, and induced him to make such rapid progress in his studies, that they gave him the habit as soon as he attained his fifteenth year; he was then sent to the universities of Oxford and Paris, where he received the cap of a doctor.

On his return to Italy, the young Cordelier was invited to the court of John Galeas, the tyrant of Milan, to occupy the post of councillor. This prince, charged him some years afterwards, with an important mission, of which he acquitted himself to the entire satisfaction of his master and that of the emperor Wenceslaus, who elevated him to the dignity of a prince of the empire. Through the influence of Galeas, he then obtained the bishopric of Placenza, and in succession those of Vicenza, Novarro and Milan.

Alexander was affable and liberal to every one; but, according to Theodoric of Niem, he was unfortunate in allowing his scandalous bestialities to be too publicly known. He also loved good cheer and rich wines, and was intoxicated regularly every night; so that his familiar friends allowed no one to approach him in his moments of revelling. They had the better cause to do so, since the holy father placed no bounds to his largesses, and gave away to his last crown, saying, "I have been a rich bishop, a poor cardinal, and I wish to be a mendicant pope."

Notwithstanding these faults, Alexander attracted to himself the love of the Romans. Of a frank and loyal character, he constantly refused to imitate the example of his predecessors; and, as he was incapable of wearing a mask of hypocrisy in the different acts of his government which required deceit, he was almost always represented by the officers of his court, who had been initiated into the art of deceiving men by Gregory the Twelfth, or Innocent the Seventh.

The election of Alexander was received with acclamations of joy in the different Christian states, and especially in France; deputies from Florence, Sienna, and several other Italian cities, came to him at Pisa, to take the oath of obedience to him, and Charles of Anjou presented himself at the council to render his homage to the holy father. As a recompense for this mark of condescension, Alexander declared him king of Naples and Sicily, and standard bearer of the Roman church, to the great discontent of Ladislaus, his competitor.

After the exaltation of the pope, and the ceremonies of the pierced chair, the council recommenced its sessions, and published various decrees, approving and ratifying the collations, provisions, promotions, translations of prelacies as well as the dignities, consecrations, or ordinations, granted or made by the rivals or their predecessors. They also confirmed the dispensations and absolutions of reserved cases which had been made during the schism. Alexander remitted to all churches the arrearages of large and small services which they owed the apostolic churches up to the day of his promotion; he declared that he should not reserve to himself the spoils of deceased prelates, nor the revenues of vacant benefices, and that in no case should the property of the church be hereafter alienated or hypothecated by popes or cardinals.

These regulations were reduced to the shape of bulls, and sent to Christian kings and princes, that they should be executed at once in their states. The pontiff would, doubtless, have gone further in his plans of reform, if the ecclesiastics themselves, who wished to maintain the abuses which enriched them, had not stopped him by demanding the closing of the council. Nicholas Clemangis wrote on this subject—"The council of Pisa deceived the people! The cardinal and greedy men who composed it, led on by their passions and contemptible interests, prevented the reform of the clergy, which all good men wanted. This assembly of knaves at first proceeded to the election of a chief. When the pope was elected, they exacted that he should ratify the promotion and benefices which they coveted; and, as soon as they had obtained what they wanted, that is, their own advancement, they declared the peace of the church assured."

A few months after his election, Alexander undertook to overthrow the power of Robert of Bavaria, and re-establish Wenceslaus on the imperial throne. It was against his own interest, but he followed in it the inspirations of his heart, and manifested his gratitude to his former protector. Robert, on his side, in order to revenge himself on the pope, wished to prevent Germany from yielding him obedience; this attempt failed, because Alexander had been careful to appoint the elector of Nassau his hereditary legate for the city of Mayence. Thus, in defiance of the ill-will of the prince, the party of the holy father triumphed in Germany, and was reinforced by all those to whom he granted dispensations, dignities, and benefices, and even authority to contract unlawful or incestuous marriages.

Notwithstanding these apparent successes, the government of Alexander was feeble, and the holy father, kept as it were, in private confinement, dared not command, except during the sleep of those who imposed their will on him. Among his ministers the cardinal Balthasar Cossa had the first place; nothing was done without the orders of the favourite, and every one was subjected to his slightest caprices. It was at the instigation of this prelate that he issued several bulls in favour of the Minor and Mendicant Brothers, which were condemned by the university of Paris, which then erected itself into a sovereign court on all religious questions; it was also by Balthasar's counsels, that he fulminated against Ladislaus a sentence of anathema, remarkable for the history of the allegations against that prince.

"The infamous Ladislaus," said the pope in his decree of excommunication, "was nourished with the milk and substance of the Roman church, by the hands of Boniface the Ninth, who crowned him king of Naples and Sicily; since that period he has turned against the Holy See the arms which the church has placed in his hands, and compelled Innocent the Seventh to strike him with ecclesiastical thunders. He then returned, like a dog, crawling on the earth, to implore pity and pardon. His oaths of devotion and fidelity touching the compassion of our predecessor, who granted him absolution, and he has anew fallen into his former sin. When Boniface granted to him, in fief, the kingdom of Naples and its appendages, which belonged to the Roman church, he engaged, for himself and his heirs, never to enter into any league with kings, princes, or lords who were enemies to the Holy See; he also swore not to seize on the Milanese, Tuscany, the city of Beneventum, the Campagna of Rome, the Isle of Maritimo, the duchy of Spoleto, the patrimony of St. Peter, the march of Ancona, Perouse, Bologna, Rome, or on other places belonging to the church; he promised to pay yearly to the apostolic treasury eight thousand marks of gold; he pledged himself on the sacred body of Christ to defend the rights, privileges, and independence of the Holy See against all its enemies, under penalty of excommunication and deposition should he fail to do so. Not only has this renegade refused to fulfil his promises, but has even become the greatest enemy to Christian peace, the most dangerous maintainer of the schism. Under pretext of sustaining the excommunicated Angelo Corario, he has seized upon the holy city, a large number of towns, several provinces, castles, and territories which belong to us, and he exercises unheard of cruelties against those who wish to recognise us as their lawful pontiff. We accordingly cite him to appear before our supreme tribunal, to be deprived of the kingdom of Sicily, and of his other goods and rights, as guilty of having violated his oath, of having invaded the territory of our see, and of having conspired against our council."

About the same time Alexander received envoys from Sbinko, the metropolitan of Prague, who informed him of the dangers with which the Catholic faith was menaced in Bohemia, and solicited a sentence of excommunication against the heretics who infected his province. His holiness received the delegates of the archbishop with distinction, and invited them several times to dine with him, which was one of his greatest favours, "for, in his eyes, the pleasures of the table surpassed all others," says Bernardin Corio, the Milanese historian; "and he pushed gormandising to such a point, that he prohibited his cook from preparing the ragouts, which were to appear on his table, until he had commenced his repast, in order to have the pleasure of waiting for every course and prolonging his festivities." At the conclusion of one of these dinners, the holy father, who had drunk extravagantly, granted to the deputies of Sbinko the bull which they asked for, and designated four masters in theology, and two in the canon law, to second the archbishop in his pursuit after those who taught the doctrines of Wickliff, whether in public or private; he gave them full power and authority to hand them over to the secular arm if it were necessary to repress their disturbances.

The plague had been depopulating Italy for some months, and threatened to alight on the city of Pisa; the holy father immediately left his residence and retired to Prato, and thence to Pistoia, near Florence. It was there that he learned of the victory of Louis of Anjou over the troops of Ladislaus, and, in consequence of it, the evacuation of Rome by the hostile forces. Bzovius maintains that the French owed their success less to their courage than to the intrigues they had entered into with the states of Sienna, Florence, and Bologna, and several Italian princes. This crusade against Ladislaus had for leaders the cardinal Balthasar Cossa, Tanneguy du Chatel, Paul des Ursini, Malatesta, and Magnus Sforza.

"The confederates," says the historian, "first established secret communications in the place, and connected themselves with some influential citizens who were to excite a rising at a given signal. Balthasar Cossa then led straight to Rome a body of troops commanded by Paul des Ursini and Malatesta, and feigned a wish to attack two gates at once. The count of Troyes, who commanded in the holy city for Ladislaus, repulsed the assailants, who gave way before him and fled in disorder. This manœuvre determined him to make a sally, which was what the allies were waiting for. Scarcely had the Neapolitan troops passed the walls, when the tocsin of the capitol sounded to summon the people to revolt; at the same time Malatesta retraced his steps, charged the soldiers of Ladislaus vigorously, and drove them back into the city, where they were massacred by the insurgents. The count of Troyes had scarcely time to take refuge in the palace of the Colonna, from whence he escaped during the night, disguised as a monk."

Having become master of Rome, the cardinal Balthasar Cossa thought of preparing for himself the means of arriving at the pontificate; and as, for the execution of these plans, it was necessary that Alexander should not go to the pontifical city, he went to the holy father at Pisa, and induced him to pass the winter at Bologna, to wait until the agitation in Rome had entirely ceased. According to custom, the pontiff obeyed the cardinal; and, notwithstanding the snow and ice, parted with all his court for Bologna. A few days after his arrival, he received a deputation composed of the regionary prefects, ten bishops, and several Roman lords, who presented him with the keys of the holy city, beseeching him in the name of the people to come and take possession of the Vatican. The pontiff, desirous of complying with the urgent request of the ambassadors, determined, contrary to the advice of his minister, to change his former intentions, and go at once to Rome. He, at the same time, made a decree to advance the holding of the jubilee, which was a source of fortune to the inhabitants. But the cardinal Balthasar had determined that the pope should not return again to the holy city; and that he himself should receive the honours of the triumph which the Romans were preparing for Alexander. In consequence of this on the eve of his departure, which was fixed for the 3d of May, 1410, a poisoned clyster was administered to him by Daniel of Saint Sophia, his physician in ordinary, of which he died during the night.

On the next day, Daniel destroyed the evidences of the crime, by disembowelling his victim, under the pretext of embalming the body. "Then," says Andrew du Chene, "that venerable pontiff was borne into the hall, in which the consistory assembled, and remained exposed with his face uncovered, his feet naked, and the rest of the body clothed in the sacerdotal garments. His arms were placed on the four corners of his coffin; and during nine days the service for the dead was celebrated nine times for him in the presence of the cardinals, patriarchs, bishops, abbots, doctors, and numerous clergy, who formed his court. On the tenth day, the cardinals of Thury, Viviers, and Malta, with Cossa (his assassin) bore him upon their shoulders to the cloister of the Cordeliers, where he was buried in the sanctuary of the church."

No important event occurred during this reign, which lasted less than a year; and, although the cardinals had appointed a third pope, the schism none the less continued, and the two popes, Benedict the Thirteenth and Gregory the Twelfth, exhibited no less obstinacy in their pretensions.

JOHN THE TWENTY-THIRD, THE TWO HUNDRED AND TWELFTH POPE, AT ROME.

BENEDICT THE THIRTEENTH, AT AVIGNON.

GREGORY THE TWELFTH, ANTI-POPE.

[A. D. 1410.]

The cardinal Balthasar Cossa seizes the tiara—His history before his pontificate—He makes his entry into Rome—Gives the imperial crown to Sigismund—Demands subsidies from France—Opposition of the university to the levy of tenths—Victory of Louis of Anjou over Ladislaus—Treaty between the holy father and the king of Naples—Council of Rome—Singular adventure of an owl—Bull against the followers of Wickliff—Exactions of John the Twenty-third—Conduct of Benedict the Thirteenth in Spain—History of the inquisition of Spain—The holy office and its familiars—Agreement between Benedict the Thirteenth and the Jews—Ladislaus seizes Rome—Flight of the pope and cardinals—Negotiations between John the Twenty-third and Sigismund—Ladislaus is poisoned by one of his mistresses at the instigation of the pope—Council of Constance—Intrigues of the pope—Atrocious accusations against John the Twenty-third—Arrest and deposition of the pope—Gregory the Twelfth solemnly withdraws his claims on the papacy—Decree against Benedict the Thirteenth—Punishment of John Huss and Jerome of Prague—Election of a fourth pontiff.

DURING the nine days which preceded the assembling of the conclave, the cardinals were engaged in their usual intrigues of buying and selling votes. More skilful than his colleagues, Balthasar Cossa formed a powerful party for himself among the people of Bologna, by distributing grain and money. He also attached to his interests Louis the Third, duke of Anjou, by promising him his aid in the conquest of Naples; he then encompassed Bologna with free companies, whose presence he knew was a cause of terror to his colleagues.

This done, he convened the conclave for the 14th of May, 1410; he presented himself in the costume of a corsair, clad in a coat of mail, with a sword by his side, and took his place among the cardinals, threatening them with his displeasure, if they dared appoint a pope who was not agreeable to him. All the prelates, chilled by fear, listened in silence to the blasphemies of this abominable assassin; at last one of them proposed to elevate the cardinal of Malta to the sovereign pontificate.—"No, I reject him," exclaimed Balthasar;

other cardinals nominated, successively, the bishop of Palestrina, the metropolitan of Ravenna, and the archbishop of Bordeaux. He rejected them all. At last the members of the conclave, alarmed and trembling, and thinking only of their personal safety, besought him to designate the cardinal whom he would wish to appoint pope.—"Well, then I give myself the pontifical mantle," he replied to them, "and I will cover with it the only cardinal who is worthy to wear it." He put it on at once, and stretching out his arm toward the tiara, exclaimed, "I am pope." He then went to the cathedral for the ceremony of the pierced chair, and was crowned by the name of John the Twenty-third.

Theodoric of Niem says, positively, "that the holy father was an intruder, that he broke the pontifical gate with a golden axe, and had closed the jaws of the Cerberuses, who guarded the threshold, by casting to them the remains of his festivals, to prevent their barking at him."

Balthasar of Cossa, or Cuisse, was born of a noble Neapolitan family; his parents, not withstanding the martial disposition he had evinced from his infancy, had caused him to enter a monastery; he did not stay there long. After his escape from the convent, he joined a band of pirates, who ravaged the shores of lower Italy during the wars between Louis of Anjou and Ladislaus. He soon became the leader of these corsairs, and was distinguished for frightful atrocities; destitute of faith, shame, and remorse; despising all laws human and divine; he possessed in the highest degree those qualities, which in a time of war make great captains, and in time of peace great villains.

When the victories of Ladislaus had restored quiet to the kingdoms of Naples and Sicily, he was forced to renounce his trade of a corsair. He then thought of becoming a priest, and went to the university of Bologna, where he bought a doctor's cap. Boniface the Ninth sold him the archdeaconate of that city. He tired of Bologna, and went to the court of Rome, where he was soon raised to the cardinalate and the post of secret chamberlain, as a reward for his infamous compliance with the desires of Boniface. His new functions gave him immense influence, by which he profited to gather back the large sums he had spent in the brothels of Bologna. He caused himself to be appointed collector general of the Holy See, sent collectors through all Europe, and levied contributions on the ecclesiastics of Germany, Denmark, Sweden, and Norway. Under the threat of removing them into provinces remote from their churches, he constrained them to buy from him indulgences, absolutions, relics, benefices, annates; and, in a word, the chamberlain knew so well how to use all resorts of sacerdotal knavery, that in less than two years he found himself richer than the pope, and able to purchase impunity for his crimes. These he did not hesitate to commit, for they recounted at Rome a great number of young nuns whom he had deflowered, by introducing himself by night into their cells; they also relate that he carried on an incestuous commerce with the wife of his brother.

The noise of his debaucheries became so loud, that Boniface himself, that shameless wretch, was obliged to send him away from his court; he gave him a foreign mission, and instructed him to bring back the people of Bologna, who had revolted against the Holy See, to their duty. The cardinal legate placed himself at the head of the pontifical troops, defeated the Visconti, who came to the aid of the insurgents, and seized the city; he then found himself absolute master, able to give free course to his unbridled passions. There was soon not a youth or young girl, no matter what their rank, or the nobility of their family, who could believe themselves beyond the reach of this infamous priest. Fathers and mothers, who dared dispute for their children with the purveyors of the cardinal, were plunged into the dungeons of the inquisition; and we are even assured that this monster, by a refinement of lubricity, abused the children in the presence of their parents, and whilst his victims were writhing beneath the hot pinchers of the executioners.

After the death of Boniface, the protector of Balthasar Cossa, the Bolognese conceived hopes of being delivered from their tyrant, and sent ambassadors to Innocent the Seventh, to offer him enormous sums to procure the recall of the legate. Unfortunately, Balthasar was informed of the negotiation; he immediately sent to Rome double the sum proposed to the holy father, and overthrew their negotiations. The principal citizens, whom he suspected of having prepared this plot, were handed over to the tribunal of the inquisition, their property confiscated, and themselves beheaded by his order. The reign of Innocent the Seventh passed, and brought no relief to the unhappy Bolognese. At last, during the pontificate of Gregory the Twelfth, some courageous citizens dared again to demand his expulsion. Gregory fulminated a sentence of anathema against the guilty legate, and revoked his functions; but the latter, instead of submitting to the orders of the holy father, entered into intrigues, distributed money to the other cardinals, detached them from his party, and determined them to meet in council to choose a new pope. The Florentines, gained by his promises, authorised a synod to be held in the city of Pisa, and the result of this meeting was, the deposition of Gregory and the election of Peter Philargi. We have seen how the cardinal Balthasar exercised sovereign authority under this new pope, and how he made way with Alexander the Fifth, in order to seize the tiara.

On the day succeeding his election, the holy father, out of gratitude for the service which the physician Daniel had done him, poisoned him with wine of Cyprus. His emissaries then went to Rome, and introduced a troop of banditti into the city, who broke the statues of Gregory, tore down his portraits in the churches, and replaced his arms with those of John the Twenty-third. The senators, intimidated by these demonstrations, sent a deputation to Pisa to take the oath of fidelity and obedience to Balthasar, and to beseech him to come and take possession of the Vatican. The wary pontiff at first appeared to turn a deaf ear to their offers; he then feigned compliance with their solicitations, and announced that he consented to return to Rome.

Eight days afterwards John the Twenty-third made his entrance into the holy city, accompanied by his cardinals, and followed by a formidable army. On the day of his arrival, he celebrated divine service in the church of St. Peter, and solemnly blessed the banner of the church, which he confided to the custody of Louis of Anjou; he also blessed the standard of the senate and the people, and gave it to Paul des Ursini, naming him grand standard bearer and generalissimo of the troops of the Holy See. On the same night he gave a magnificent feast, at which was displayed all the luxuriousness of the Neros and Caligulas, and the next day, or:

awakening, in order doubtless to resemble those tyrants more nearly, he ordered several lords and magistrates, whom he suspected of favouring his competitor Gregory, to be beheaded. These bloody executions did not, however, suspend the public rejoicings, and the holy father continued for an entire month to give his hosts the spectacle of his disgusting orgies. He had, however, to repulse an effort of Ladislaus, who, informed of the general discontent, had conceived the hope of retaking Rome by a bold stroke, and under favour of the night, had disembarked at Ostia with five thousand horse, and three thousand footmen. Already did the prince perceive the walls of the holy city, when Paul des Ursini suddenly debouched from a defile at the head of fifteen hundred horsemen, took his troops on the flank, and cut them to pieces. The king had been sold by his confessor, and his plan given up to his enemies.

This victory assured to John the Twenty-third a great preponderance in Italy and the other kingdoms; he was recognised as the lawful pope in France, England, and, shortly, in Germany, where the emperor Robert died, leaving the field open to ambition. John sent his nuncios to the electors, to urge them to name, as king of the Romans, the brother of Wenceslaus, Sigismund of Luxemburg, already sovereign of Hungary, whom he affirmed to be the only one capable of raising the power of the church and the empire. The real motive which induced the holy father to favour this election, was the desire of strengthening himself by the assistance of a powerful sovereign, who was a personal enemy to Ladislaus. His policy succeeded admirably; Hungarian ambassadors came immediately to Italy to renew the oath of obedience before the confessional of St. Peter, and to solicit, at the same time, the succour of the temporal and spiritual arms of the church against the enemies of Sigismund and, especially, the Venetians. Balthasar undertook to fulminate the most terrible anathemas against Venice; on condition, however, that the king of Hungary would restore the domains captured by his predecessors, and pay him the rent which had fallen into disuse during the late troubles. He then published a bull, conferring the legation of the kingdom on Branda of Castiglione, bishop of Placenza, with full powers to execute the conditions of the treaty. He then sent into France the metropolitan of Pisa and the bishop of Senlis, in the capacity of nuncios, and authorised them to levy tenths on ecclesiastical benefices, and sieze the inheritance of bishops and archbishops who had died since his exaltation.

Before, however, putting this last plan in execution, he sought to render the doctors of the university favourable to him, and granted them great privileges. But his measures had not the expected result; the university rejected the pretensions of the holy father, and, in a solemn assembly, came to the following conclusions: "There shall not be granted in France, any subsidy to a pope, and if he desires to constrain the citizens, by temporal force or by spiritual censures, to pay him any tribute, his collectors, legates, and self, shall be declared enemies of the king, and punished as such in their property and persons."

This decision would have discouraged any other person than John the Twenty-third, but a priest does not so readily renounce his designs; he only changed his batteries. Not being able to rob the people; under a pretence of tithes, he addressed to King Charles and the university, letters, beseeching them to grant him aid; in men and money, so that he could resist the enemies of the church, who had united, he said, with the impious Ladislaus, to replace the anti-pope, Gregory the Twelfth, on the Holy See. He also addressed bulls to the bishops of the kingdom and the parliament of Paris, affirming, in the name of Christ, that if they did not send him money, it would be impossible to save religion from the abyss into which the schism had precipitated it.—John lied with so persuasive an unction that the lords, prelates, parliament, and the university itself, consented to grant him some aid.

His holiness was more successful in Portugal, Provence, Savoy, Achaia, Macedonia, and the islands of the Egean sea, which were still in the power of the Christians; the princes who governed those countries authorised him to levy tenths on the clergy, and to pillage the faithful, which put him in a condition to prosecute his plans against Ladislaus. He was also well seconded by Louis of Anjou, who was anxious to place on his head the double crown of Naples and Sicily. The two allies assembled their forces, and marched against the king of Naples, whom they met on the shores of the Gariglian.

During the night, the army of the confederates crossed the river, some by swimming, and some on bridges of boats, and fell on the troops of Ladislaus at day-break. "The attack commenced on both sides," says the chronicle of the monk of Saint Denis, "with terrible cries; at the moment the sky was darkened by a shower of darts, which carried death every where. The combatants then closed and attacked each other with swords, &c., resembling wild beasts, rather than men; it was a frightful struggle, in which were seen but swords, lances, and axes, which rose and fell with the rapidity of light. The skill of war was forgotten; soldiers and leaders only thought of murdering each other—at last numbers triumphed; the bands of Ladislaus were cut to pieces, and he himself only escaped from falling into the hands of the conqueror, by taking refuge in the neighbouring castle, called Roche Sèche, where he had three thousand men in reserve. When the carnage had ceased, the pillage commenced, and the unskilful Louis of Anjou, instead of pursuing the wreck of the Sicilian army, and profiting by the victory he had gained, slept, in the intoxication of success, and returned in triumph to Rome, carrying in his train, the prisoners and standards taken from Ladislaus. He was received, on his entrance to the holy city, by the pontiff, surrounded by his cardinals; the porch of the church of St. Peter was decorated as for a conqueror, and flags, still soiled with blood, were entwined about the high altar."

Balthasar then renewed the anathemas pronounced against the conquered prince, excommunicated his descendents to the third generation, declared them deprived of the thrones of Naples and Jerusalem, and solemnly crowned the conqueror. But whilst they were celebrating, with feasts, the success of the French prince, his competitor was rallying the remains of his army and levying new troops, so that he was soon ready to take the field and recommence hostilities, whilst Louis of Anjou, who had permitted his army to disorganize itself, found it impossible to struggle against Ladislaus, and was obliged to return to France. The pope, who found himself exposed, by this precipitate departure, to cruel reprisals, thought of his personal safety, and hastened to send secret agents to Ladislaus to negotiate peace. The prince, who still thought himself defeated, listened joyfully to the proposals of the pope, and concluded a treaty, the conditions of which were equally disgraceful to both parties. Balthasar recognised Ladislaus as the lawful king of Naples, engaged to place him in possession of Sicily, and to furnish him with troops; he appointed him grand standard bearer of the Roman church, and attached to this title a pension of two hundred thousand ducats, hypothecated on the cities of Ascoli, Viterba, Perouse, and Beneventum; and, finally, he entirely remitted to him the rental of forty thousand ducats which Naples had owed, for ten years, to the Holy See. On his side, Ladislaus engaged to recognise John the Twenty-third as the sole lawful sovereign of the church, he swore to constrain Gregory the Twelfth to renounce the pontificate, by giving him, in exchange, a pension of fifty thousand ducats, the government of the March of Ancona, and three cardinals' hats for his relatives.

In consequence of this singular treaty the prince signed the following declaration: "After having doubted for some time the regularity of the promotion of Balthasar Cossa to the apostolic chair, we have sought the light of truth, and it has pleased God to inform us, that John the Twenty-third has been canonically chosen. On this account we take an oath of obedience and fidelity to him in our own name and that of our subjects."

During the conclusion of this bargain between the altar and the throne, Gregory was at Gaeta, under the protection of the prince who was selling him to his enemy. Though a prisoner, the holy father did not wish to yield; and as soon as he was informed of this great treason, he assembled his court to determine on the best mode of escaping from the peril. It was immediately decided that he should, with his cardinals, embark for the March of Ancona, and claim the assistance of Charles Malatesta, duke of that province. Gregory took up his residence at Rimini, from whence, in accordance with the custom of the popes, he thundered forth anathemas on all his competitors and their adherents.

After his treaty with the king of Naples, John the Twenty-third governed Rome as an absolute despot, bearing down the citizens by his exactions, and sparing neither his cardinals nor the officers of his court; for Theodoric of Niem relates, that he invited the ecclesiastics of his party to festivals, in order to make an appeal to their purse under the name of the Collection for the Communion. "Behold," adds this author, "how the holy father accomplished it. He spread before his guests generous wines, and when intoxication came on, he called in his chamberlain, who presented empty urns in which each placed his offering. Those who declined assisting at the orgies of Balthasar Cossa, none the less escaped his cupidity. The officers of the apostolic chamber came on the next day to present to them quittances for sums borrowed from the holy father; those who said they owed nothing were immediately arrested, conducted to the dungeons of the Vatican, and tortured by the inquisitors, who forced them, according to the quaint expression of John, 'to untie their purse.'"

He also levied imposts on wine, grain, and salt, and even the work of artisans: finally, following the example of the king of France, he altered the money, and entirely ruined the commerce of Lower Italy. All the wealth which he wrested from the people was divided among his concubines and minions, or swallowed up in useless or ridiculous works. It was thus that he spent prodigious sums in building the inner wall of the burgh of St. Peter, and in piercing a hidden way between the passages of the walls, by which to introduce, secretly, into his palace the victims of his debauchery or his tyranny.

Notwithstanding the apparent peace between the pontiff and the king of Naples, these two ambitious men carried on, none the less, a concealed war, as was easy to be seen on the occasion of the council which had been convened at the Vatican to confirm the proceedings of the synod of Pisa. The prince prohibited John from retarding the period of that assembly; and on his refusal to yield to his wishes, he occupied the environs of Rome with his troops, and prevented stranger prelates from entering the holy city. The result was, that this meeting was very small, though the holy father proudly gave it the name of an œcumenical council.

Clemangis relates a strange incident which happened very mal à propos during the deliberations of this council. "At the opening of the first session, after the celebration of the mass of the Holy Spirit, an owl flew suddenly from a corner of the church and lighted upon the drapery of the pontifical throne, from whence it steadily regarded John the Twenty-third. All the prelates manifested their astonishment that this bird, an enemy to light, should leave its retreat in full day. Some drew from it baneful presages; others could not avoid laughing, and said that the Holy Spirit had taken a strange form in which to descend among them. The pope alone, swayed by a superstitious fear, could not sustain the fixed, immoveable stare of the owl: he descended from his throne, and left the church; the assistants followed his example, and left the field free to the bird of Minerva. On the next day the same scene was renewed. Scarcely had the prothonotary commenced reading the programme of the council, than the owl took its flight, and after having made several turns around the nave, came as before, to seat itself upon the pontifical dais. John, more master of himself than before, remained calm, and ordered the fathers to kill the animal which interrupted their holy deliberations. Immediately cardinals, bishops, abbots commenced a pursuit of the owl, casting their crosses and bonnets at it, chased it every where, and caused it to fall palpitating on the high altar, where it was killed by a cardinal."

Order being restored to the assembly, the business of the session was recommenced; they were first engaged in regulating the precepts which commanded reformers, whose doctrines were contrary to the belief of the Roman church, and tended to overthrow the pontifical authority, to be handed over to the executioners.

The following was the bull for this purpose: "Since then there have risen up audacious spirits, infamous teachers, who dare to condemn the sovereign power which the vicar of Christ has received from God himself, we denounce them to the faithful as corrupters of the faith, who wish to crush religion beneath the ruins of the church, and we rank among these the commentators on the writings of the abominable John Wickliff, that infamous heretic, who calls the popes mere bishops, who accuses them of having destroyed Christian doctrines and worship, and evangelical morality, and having subjected the faithful to the practices and pomps of paganism. This philosophical rhetorician, having breathed his spirit of corruption into all the schools of Christendom, and into the universities, we have determined to follow the advice of the apostle, and exterminate the heretics to the last one, since a morsel of leaven suffices to corrupt the whole lump. Before, however, pronouncing a terrible sentence upon the guilty, we wished to illumine our mind by the lights of our cardinals, bishops, and orthodox doctors, and it is after a solemn deliberation, that we have condemned the works of the English Wickliff, his Dialogue, Trialogue, and other small works as favouring heresy; in consequence of our decision, they will be publicly burned in all the kingdoms of Christendom, and the pupils of the excommunicated shall be delivered over to the holy tribunal of the inquisition to be tortured; for Christ has said, 'If any one remains not in me, he shall be cut off as a vine branch, he shall be dried, cast into the fire and burned.'"

It was the first bull issued by the popes against the reformed doctrines, which had already sprung up under the name of Huss, from that of John Huss, the successor of Wickliff, and which were soon to separate the Christians of the west into two powerful sects, the Protestants and Catholics.

Although John the Twenty-third appeared to triumph in Rome, his competitors none the less exercised sovereign authority at their residences; Gregory the Twelfth fulminated his anathemas in the March of Ancona, and Benedict the Twelfth strengthened himself in the kingdom of Arragon, by confirming the usurpation of Frederick, count of Urgel, and transmitting to him the rights of the legitimate sovereigns of that kingdom over Sicily, Sardinia, and the island of Corsica. Gregory, however, imposed, as a condition, on that prince, that he should furnish to him every year three armed galleys, an hundred thousand ducats, and troops enough for his defence.

Peter de Luna, tired of inaction, wished, as employment, to convert the Jews of Arragon, and proposed public conferences at Tortosa, to confound, as he said, all the Hebrew doctors. The learned Rabbi Solomon, the celebrated Ben Virga, and Vidal, as well as several Israelites of profound knowledge went to this assembly. Benedict received them with great kindness and spoke thus to them:—"Honourable Hebrews, remains of a nation once cherished by Jehovah, and now rejected from the bosom of God, children of David, welcome to the temple of Christ, and profess courageously before us the faith of Moses." He then read them a long discourse, commencing with these words of Isaiah:—"Come, let us argue our rights boldly, but if you are rebellious you shall be consumed by the sword."

When he had finished his discourse, the Rabbi Vidal, undismayed by the threatening text of the prophet, spoke and replied to all the arguments of the pontiff with a power of logic and elegance of dialectics which were the admiration of the assistants. According to the account of the Jewish historian, Abunstioc, his coreligionists had the advantage in this theological quarrel. On the other hand, if we are to believe the assertions of Surita, author of the annals of Arragon, and the chronicler Nicholas Antoninus, the pope obtained prodigious success, and converted Jews by thousands. This last opinion is not very admissible, since it was at the same period that Benedict published his constitutions against the Israelites, closed their synagogues, prohibited them from exercising any business, or lending money, and handed them over to the tribunals of the inquisition, that terrible institution, which covered the soil of Spain, Castile, Navarre, Portugal, and Arragon, from the commencement of the fourteenth century, and which yearly renewed human sacrifices in honour of the divinity.

The schism had much influence over the Dominicans and familiars of the holy office; since some recognised Benedict, others Gregory the Twelfth, or John the Twenty-third; but the people of Spain gained nothing from the disputes. Instead of one chief inquisitor, they had three; and as fortune favoured this or that party, he who triumphed, wishing to signalise himself over his predecessor by the magnificence of the auto-da-fé, augmented the number of victims who were handed over to the flames.

Before the arrival of Benedict, extraordinary tribunals had been established by his competitors in the provinces of Algarves and Valencia, to multiply and facilitate the researches of the inquisitors; the pope suspended them from their functions, not from a motive of humanity, but only because they were devoted to his enemies, and instituted new tribunals. His bull pointed out the general rules the inquisitors were to follow in the exercise of their dreadful ministry, and what were the crimes they were to punish.

"By our sovereign authority, and in the name of him who has conferred on us absolute power on earth and in heaven, we declare," said the holy father, "tainted with heresy, and we hand over to the tribunals of the inquisition:

"Those who in their blasphemies shall have enunciated heterodox principles on the omnipotence or attributes of the divine Trinity, even when made in a burst of passion or the delirium of drunkenness.

"Those who are addicted to black magic, divinations, enchantments, or witchcrafts, or who in their operations use words derogatory to religion.

"Those who make agreements with the spirits of darkness to obtain favours from them, or who swear obedience, faith, and adoration, on a book called the Clavicle of Solomon.

"Those who, after having been excommunicated, remain an entire year without purchasing absolution, or satisfying the penance which had been imposed on them.

"Those who admit the orthodox faith, but who refuse blind obedience to the pope, and who do not recognise him as vicar of Christ, and supreme chief of the faithful.

"The receivers, favourers, and adherents of heretics and schismatics.

"Those who condemn the sacred institution of the tribunal of the inquisition, or who place obstacles in the way of its justice.

"All sovereigns, princes, or governors of kingdoms, provinces, and cities, who will not undertake the defence of the church when required to do so by the inquisitors.

"Lawyers who favour heresies, by aiding schismatics with their advice, and who seek to deliver them from the justice of the inquisitors.

"All persons who give ecclesiastical burial to excommunicated persons; since the dead, denounced as heretics, cannot be submitted to the punishment they have deserved, their memory should be branded, their bones exhumed, and burned, and their property confiscated to the Holy See.

"Finally, all writers, whose works contain propositions contrary to the faith or obedience due to the pope, or who set forth principles whose consequences can lead to heresy."

Although this decree subjected to the jurisdiction of the inquisitors all persons guilty of the crimes comprised in these categories, it nevertheless excepted popes, legates, nuncios, and officers of the Holy See; even though they were recognised heretics, the inquisitors could not pursue them without a special order from the pontifical court. The same prerogative extended to the chiefs of some dioceses, but not to princes, who were all within the jurisdiction of the holy inquisition, and could be burned like the meanest of their subjects.

Whilst Benedict was desolating Spain with his legions of inquisitors, John the Twenty-third was pursuing his infamous career in Italy. He finally became so execrated by the Romans, that Ladislaus determined to profit by the hatred of which he was the object, to overthrow his authority, and seize on the holy city. For this purpose he organised a conspiracy, and bribed several companies of soldiers, a kind of people who are ever ready to sell themselves. When every thing was ready, the prince appeared before Rome with some chosen troops, penetrated the enclosure of the church of the Holy Cross of Jerusalem, through an opening which had been pierced in the ramparts, and threw himself, with his troops, into the streets. A frightful massacre then commenced; all the bishops, priests, and monks, who fell into the hands of the soldiers were mercilessly massacred, nuns were violated, churches pillaged, convents burned, and the rage of the stormers only ceased when they had nothing more to destroy.

Ladislaus then went to the Vatican to arrest the pope, who, fortunately for himself, had escaped with his cardinals at the commencement of the action. The conqueror was obliged to keep within bounds in the pillage of the pontifical palace; but he laid violent hands on the sacred ornaments of the chapel, the jewels, the relics of saints which were enclosed in boxes of massive gold or silver, and adorned with precious stones.

The profanations did not stop there; by the orders of the king of Naples, the soldiers transformed the church of St. Peter into a barrack, fed their horses on the altar of the apostle, and of each of the chapels of this magnificent church made places of debauchery. The arms and statues of John the Twenty-third were broken, his banners torn down, and after fifteen days of obstinate strife, Ladislaus drove out all the partizans of the pope, and remained the absolute master of Rome. The citizens were oppressed by the new tyrant, as they had been by John the Twenty-third. "So much," says an ancient author, "that it really appeared that popes and kings took pleasure in showing to the people that their institution is nothing less than divine, and that it would be better to slay them all."

Whilst surveying the levy of forced impositions which he had inflicted on the holy city, Ladislaus did not lose sight of the advantages he could draw from his position. Like a skilful politician, he resolved to give no relaxation for repose to the enemy whom he had overthrown, and he sent in pursuit of John a troop of horse, who drove him successively from Sutri, Viterba, Monte Fiascone, and Siena. Pressed by the danger, the holy father wished to place himself under the protection of a powerful city which could resist his enemy, and addressed the Florentines for permission to take refuge among them; his demand having been rejected, he fell back on Bologna, where he had still a great preponderance.

Finding himself, however, tracked like a wild beast, and fearful of being besieged in his last asylum, John determined to treat with the emperor Sigismund, in order, by his aid, to re-seize his authority over all Italy. The ambassadors charged with this important mission, were the cardinals Chalant and Zabarellus, and the celebrated Greek monk Manuel Chrysoloras, the regenerator of polite literature in the west. They were instructed to discuss with Sigismund the period for holding a general council, and to oppose, with all their might, the choice of a city which was a dependency on the empire for this meeting. The emperor fixed upon Constance, a city of the duchy of Suabia; and his will on the subject was so formally expressed to the deputies that they were obliged to submit to it.

John, on being informed of the result of the negotiation, cursed the fatality which constrained him to convene a council in a foreign country, and deliver himself bound hand and foot to a prince who had been hitherto his enemy. Still, as he could do nothing but submit, he dissimulated his discontent, and solicited a private interview with the emperor. Sigismund consented to his request, and came to receive him at Lodi; but all the eloquence of John could not change the determination of the prince, and he was obliged to accede to Constance as the place for holding the synod.

These preliminaries being arranged, the pope left the emperor, and returned to Bologna with Francis Gonzaga, one of his partizans. He was scarcely installed when he learned that Ladislaus was hastening, at the head of a considerable army, to besiege him in his residence. The cardinals were at once seized with a panic, and deserted the pontifical court to the last man. John alone waited for his enemy unalarmed; the reason was simple—he had taken measures to have him poisoned by one of his mistresses.

Monstrelet, a cotemporary chronicler, thus relates the death of the king of Naples:—"This prince could not live many years, because he was too much abandoned to debauchery, and because he had created too much hatred by his cruelties; thus he died, poisoned in an infamous manner. One of his mistresses, the daughter of a physician, bribed by John the Twenty-third, became the instrument of the vengeance of the pope.

Ladislaus being dead, the holy father quitted Bologna, and went to the council of Constance; he had first, however, strengthened himself with assistance in case of reverse, and made a treaty of alliance with the duke of Austria, whom he appointed captain-general of the troops of the Roman church, adding to his title a pension of six thousand florins, on the apostolic treasury: he had also purchased the protection of Bouchard, marquis of Baden, and of John, count of Nassau, elector of Mayence, paying him therefor, sixteen thousand florins of gold. Although he had taken all the precautions which prudence commanded, John still dreaded the consequences of a council which might depose him, and resolved to dissolve it, under some pretext, as soon as the fathers had assembled.

Several writers, who accompanied the holy father in his journey, relate divers incidents which show how much his mind was tormented, and what was his disquietude as to the result of the conferences. "Whilst we were on the mountain of Arlberg, in the Tyrol, says Theodoric of Niem, the pope fell from his horse, and we hastened to raise him up, asking him if he were wounded.—'Not by all the devils,' he exclaimed, 'but this fall is a sinister prestige, and indicates to me that I had better have remained at Bologna,' and looking at the city of Constance in the valley, he added, 'I really believe that is the ditch in which they trap foxes.'"

At length, on the 18th of October, 1414, he entered the city, and found assembled there the ambassadors of all the kings of Europe, lords, princes, a crowd of bishops, the legates of Gregory the Twelfth and Benedict the Thirteenth, and deputations from all the trades. According to the details which have been preserved to us in the manuscript of Breslau, the assembly numbered four patriarchs, twenty-eight cardinals, thirty metropolitans, two hundred and six bishops, three hundred titular bishops, two hundred and three abbots, eighteen auditors of the sacred palace, four hundred and forty doctors in theology and law, twenty-seven prothonotaries, two hundred and forty writers of bulls, one hundred and twenty-three procurators of the pope, a crowd of attendants of various kinds, twenty-seven ambassadors of kings, dukes or counts, and, finally, a great number of deputies from bishops, cities, and universities.

In his opening discourse, Sigismund informed the fathers, that he had convened them to take, with their assistance, proper measures to restore peace to the church, by putting an end to the schism, and that he consequently thought it advantageous to the cause, to hold a meeting, at which John the Twenty-third himself should be refused admission, in order that the debates should not be constrained. The wary pope, who knew the venality of those who were to judge him, made no objection, and feigned even to wish to remain a stranger to their deliberations; but his agents manœuvred with so much skill, and knew so well how to use presents, threats, and promises, that the influential members of the assembly embraced his side and made him master of the council.

All was going as he wished, when, unforfortunately the opponents got wind of what was occurring; the emperor, to defeat his skilful combinations, decided that the votes should be received by nations, and not individually; then, without leaving to the pontiff longer time to form new intrigues, he put the vote on the proposition, declaring the Holy See vacant; this was carried. During the same sitting they presented to his holiness a formula of cession thus drawn:—"I, John the Twenty-third, declare, pledge myself, and swear to God and this sacred council, to give freely, and of my own free will, peace to the church, by my pure and simple withdrawal from the pontificate, which I promise to execute as soon as Benedict the Thirteenth and Gregory the Twelfth shall have renounced their pretended rights, or shall have died." After many difficulties the holy father consented to read it aloud in the assembly; when he arrived at the words, "I swear," he went down on his knees, and laying his hand on a crucifix, swore to observe the conditions indicated in the formula of cession.

The emperor immediately raised him, and urged the fathers to proceed to the election of a new pope; but at this proposal, John descended from his seat, declared that there was an end to concessions, and threatened to quit Constance if the prince persisted in his criminal plans. In reply, Sigismund ordered his officers to place guards at all the gates of the city, and signified to the pontiff, that he must subscribe his abdication at once and without any restriction. John formally refused to obey him, called him a fool, drunkard, barbarian, scoundrel, beggar, and threatened him with ecclesiastical thunders. Sigismund, not daring to use him roughly, contented himself with causing him to be conducted to his palace, and gave orders not to lose sight of him. John, however, found the means of deceiving the vigilance of his enemy, and one night on the eve of a grand fête, having made the soldiers who guarded him drunk, he disguised himself as a groom, and sallying forth on a sorry horse, covered with a stout linen cassock, and having a cross bow suspended to his saddle, he reached, without difficulty, the city of Schaffhausen, where the duke of Austria, who had aided his flight, came to meet him.

From this residence, John wrote to his officers to come to him under penalty of excommunication. He also addressed a letter to King Charles, the duke of Orleans, and the university of Paris, to explain his conduct, and render the emperor and the council suspected by the court of France. He even pushed his impudence so far as to write to Sigismund that he had not retired from the council from fear, but only on account of his health, that he might breathe a purer air than that of Constance. As he did not consider himself sufficiently safe at Schaffhausen, he went to Lauffenburg, on the Rhine, taking care, before his departure, to draw up, through a notary and in the presence of witnesses, a protest, by which all the acts which he had signed in council were declared null and void, as having been wrested from him by violence.

Eight days had scarcely passed when the holy father abandoned this last residence. On receiving the news that the emperor was making preparations to attack the duke of Austria, his ally, he retired to Friburg in the Brisgau, a place reputed impregnable. From thence John could, in his turn, impose conditions on his foes; he sent to the fathers of the council a declaration, purporting that he was ready to return to Constance, if the ambassadors of all the powers and the princes pledged themselves to give him a safe conduct, and make no attempt on his liberty, whatever might be convenient for him to do; and that, in case they should deprive him of the Holy See, they should preserve to him the title of perpetual legate of Italy; with the enjoyment, during his life, of the province of Bologna, the county of Avignon, and a pension of thirty thousand florins of gold hypothecated on the cities of Venice, Florence, and Genoa; and, besides, that he should not be dependent on any power in the world, and be responsible to no one for his actions.

These overtures gave the fathers some hopes of being able to make arrangements with him, and they hastened to send deputies to him at Friburg. This shameless pope gave them an audience in his bed chamber, being still in bed and in a position most indecent. The pious prelates remained, however, near him, and appeared even to take pleasure in listening to his obscene recitals, so anxious were they to succeed in their negotiations. They then gave him an account of all that had occurred in the council during his absence, and the hope the fathers expressed to see him among them. Their harangue being terminated, John made this reply: "No, I will not place myself within the jaws of the wolf; return to that accursed council, an impure mixture of kings, cobblers, and courtizans; to them who sent you, that I excommunicate them, and will never grant them truce nor repose."

The deputies, confused and abashed, returned to Constance, and announced to their colleagues the bad success of their efforts. They then continued the sittings and the informations against John, in order to proceed at once to his deposition.

John Gerson, the chancellor of Paris, having been appointed a prosecutor in this matter, read, in full audience, charges of an atrocious character, all sustained by material and irrefutable proof. He declared that it was formally demonstrated that John the Twenty-third had reached the pontificate by causing his predecessor to be poisoned by his physician, Daniel of Saint Sophia; and, that he had then poisoned this latter with wine of cyprus, to avoid having cause to dread the indiscretions of an accomplice; that he had violated three hundred young nuns of different convents; that he had carried on incestuous relations with the wife of his brother; that he was addicted to the unnatural crime; that he had abused a whole family, consisting of the mother, son, and three young sisters, of whom the oldest was scarcely twelve years old; that he had trafficked in bishoprics, holy orders, indulgences, taxes, graces, and even in ex-communications! Finally, that he had put thousands of innocent persons in Bologna and Rome to the torture.

In consequence of these facts, the fathers rendered the following sentence: "The general council of Constance, after having invoked the name of Christ and examined the accusations brought against John the Twenty-third, and established on irrefragable proof, pronounces, decrees, and declares, that Balthasar Coscia is the oppressor of the poor, the persecutor of the just, the support of knaves, the idol of simoniacs, the slave of the flesh, a sink of vices, a man destitute of every virtue, a mirror of infamy, a devil incarnate; as such, it deposes him from the pontificate, prohibiting all Christians from obeying him and calling him pope. The council further reserves to itself the punishment of his crimes in accordance with the laws of secular justice; and his pursuit as an obstinate and hardened, noxious and incorrigible sinner, whose conduct is abominable, and morals infamous; as a simoniac, ravisher, incendiary, disturber of the peace and union of the church; as a traitor, murderer, sodomite, poisoner, committer of incest, and corrupter of young nuns and monks!!" The decree of the fathers contained fifty-four articles, which the bishop of Posnania read in public, and twenty other secret ones, so frightful were the crimes which they announced! And yet the monster who had committed them was entitled sovereign pontiff, chief of the church, father of the faithful, successor of the apostle, vicar of God on earth! He was declared to be infallible, and his decrees were received as if they had emanated from the Divinity itself!! Such are the doctrines of these depraved, ambitious, and cruel men, who endeavour to bring the art of duping the people to perfection, and who coin money on the steps of the altar and the throne.

All the turpitude of John the Twenty-third having been discovered, the duke of Austria dared no longer support him, and to make his peace with Sigismund, he betrayed the pope and caused him to be arrested in the town of Ratoffzell.

Having no longer any hope of escaping from his enemies, or of reconquering the Holy See, John determined to submit. After having listened to the decree which announced his withdrawal, he affixed his signature to it and approved of all its contents. He was then transferred to the fortress of Gattleben; he was despoiled of his pontifical ornaments, his domestics and pages were taken from him; a cook only being left him.

The assembly was then engaged in the condemnation of the celebrated John Huss, and his disciple Jerome of Prague; those bold innovators, who, sustained solely by the ascendancy which genius exercises over the masses, had dared to attack the sovereign pontiffs, and preach religious reforms. John Huss was accused of a want of respect and submission to the Holy See, in a discourse which was produced on his examination, and which was as follows: "People, listen to my words, which are the words of God! Learn to know those popes who arrogate to themselves supreme authority over all the earth. Know that they are all knaves, despoilers, heretics, simoniacs, and assassins! Know that their true place is not in the church of Christ, but in hell with the devils! Extirpate with fire and sword all those ulcers which eat your flesh, and corrupt your blood. Renounce your superstitions which, like the leprosy of Job, attach you to a dunghill. Why do you adore a virgin who was the mother of seven children? Why do you invoke in your prayers idle monks, dead in the odour of sanctity? Will your eyes then remain for ever closed to the light, and refuse to see the infamies of those shameless priests, of those popes who deflower your daughters, blast your children, steal your gold, and send you to the scaffold when you dare to complain? . . ."

This intrepid reformer, far from recoiling from an examination of his doctrines, had himself, solicited a safe conduct from Sigismund, to defend his opinions before the fathers, and had gone to Constance; but by an act of meanness, worthy of a king, he had been arrested in contempt of conventions; and when the unfortunate man appeared before the council, it was as a criminal.

John Huss, sprung from the ranks of the people, owed to his eloquence and his immense erudition, the influence which he had over the minds of men, and which had led to the conversion of a great number of proselytes in his own country, Bohemia. He was large, well made, of a majestic carriage, with a grave and melancholy air, and a sonorous voice; to these external qualities which charmed the eye, he added an energy and force of character which ruled the mind. He was led before the assembly, ironed hand and foot, and was then mounted on an elevated platform, that he might be seen from all parts of the hall. When he appeared, murmurs of approbation were heard from several benches, and troubled the joy of the triumph of his enemies: these manifestations were of short duration, for a bull was almost immediately read, which prohibited every person from giving tokens of approval or disapprobation during the debate, under the penalty of anathema, fine and banishment.

Henry of Pisa, the attorney of the council, then rose and read a long requisition, in which John Huss was called heretical, seditious and captious. It concluded with the recommendation, that the fathers should condemn his works and their author to the flames.

The following are some of the articles pointed out by the public prosecutor: "The popes," said the reformer, "have forged falsehoods on falsehoods to build up the scaffolding of their religious ceremonies; let them then point out a single passage in the gospels, which proves that Jesus Christ invented mass."

"A priest in a state of mortal sin has not grace to administer the sacraments; since then they are the most perverse of men, it follows that few Christians have really received baptism and the eucharist.

"All auricular confession is useless when a sinner has admitted his fault, and sincerely asked pardon from God; those who maintain the contrary are knaves who wish to pervert young girls, or discover the secrets of families and the state.

"The pope has no power over Christians, because he is condemned; he is condemned because he possesses rich domains, and sumptuous palaces, which are contrary to the morality of Christ.

"All who give alms to monks will be damned, because they encourage sloth.

"We should not fear the excommunication of the pope, because antichrist has no power over the church. . . ."

John Huss was then submitted to interrogatories on different points of religious controversy; he replied to all those questions with enchanting eloquence, and remarkable logic; he retorted all the arguments of his enemies, convicted them of falsehood and imposture, demonstrated clearly the absurdity of the dogmas of Catholicism, and concluded by declaring that he would rather surrender his head to the executioner, than become the accomplice of popes and their supporters.

In vain did several fathers of the council, who shared his opinions, conjure him to abjure, to escape the punishment of fire. John remained unshakeable in his faith; he rejected even the solicitations of the emperor, who offered him honours, dignities, and wealth. Prayers and promises being unable to produce his conversion, they had recourse to threats. Gerson, the chancellor of Paris, addressed him in the name of the council, and said to him, "that he must bend or break."

"—I would rather," replied Huss, "that they should put a millstone around my neck and cast me from heaven into the sea, than deny the truth! Prepare your instruments of torture and your racks: tear out one by one all the fibres of my body; I prefer the most terrible punishments to the disgrace of being called the defender of popes and kings. Let your infernal proceedings take their course; give John Huss to the flames; but ere a century passes, there will spring from those ashes an avenger who will proclaim anew the truths which I have taught, and for which you would condemn Christ himself, should he return to earth." After this speech, his friends abandoned all hope of saving him, and left the assembly. The prosecutor then read the following sentence: "The council condemns John Huss to be degraded from the priesthood and all the orders which he has received, and it abandons him and his works to the punishment of fire."

On the next day, the martyr was led to execution, in the midst of an immense concourse of people from all countries. He was clothed in a long linen robe, on which was written the word "heretic;" his head was surmounted with a long paper cap, on which were represented devils, deaths' heads, and flames. On the scaffold, John showed all the intrepidity of an apostle of the truth. He sung sacred songs in honour of the Eternal; and with his powerful voice he bade a last adieu to his disciples. After the execution of the master, they proceeded to judgment on Jerome of Prague, his disciple, who underwent, in the following year, the punishment of fire.

That could not, however, arrest the mission of these defenders of the people: what was material of them was burned, but their doctrines remained. The scaffold had devoured two victims, but the executioners lighted a violent fire which broke out five years afterwards, and which the blood of two hundred thousand Catholics could not extinguish. All Bohemia flew to arms; formidable bands were organised under John Ziska, one of the most ardent supporters of the heresy, which fell upon Germany, pillaged the churches, massacred the priests, monks, and nuns, annihilated the greater part of the armies which were sent against them, and did not return to their country until they had taken a terrible vengeance on the assassins of John Huss and Jerome of Prague.

Thus the council accomplished two things; a great iniquity and an act of justice, the deposition of John the Twenty-third. The representatives of Gregory the Twelfth made in his name a solemn abdication, which was afterwards ratified by Angelo Corario himself. There remained still, to extinguish the schism, to obtain from Benedict the Thirteenth a renunciation of the pontificate, and they foresaw that his obstinacy might be a rock, on which all the efforts of the synod of Constance might break. The emperor decided to go himself to Peniscola, to confer with him on the subject; the king of Arragon joined his entreaties to those of Sigismund; but their prayers and their threats were alike useless. Benedict replied to them, that the schism was at an end, since his two rivals had voluntarily and freely renounced the pontificate; that he was consequently the sole legitimate chief of the universal church, and that he would never consent to cover himself with eternal disgrace by abdicating. The conferences were broken off and the two monarchs left the fortress of Peniscola.

Notwithstanding the refusal of Benedict to submit to the council of Constance, the fathers went on and rendered a sentence of deposition against him. It was then decided that they should proceed at once to the election of a new pope, and the cardinals entered the chamber of conclave by the light of torches, all the windows having been walled up, the doors were locked, two German princes and the grand master of Rhodes, were charged to keep watch day and night, around the conclave, and the inspection of the food destined for the cardinals, was submitted to several bishops or doctors, in order to prevent any letter being concealed in the plates or cups. Three times a day the emperor came at the head of his clergy and sang the Veni Creator.

At length, on the third day, the cardinals proclaimed Otho Colonna, cardinal deacon of St. George, of the Veil of Gold, sovereign pontiff, and he was enthroned by the name of Martin the Fifth.

MARTIN THE FIFTH, THE TWO HUNDRED AND THIRTEENTH POPE, AT ROME.

BENEDICT THE THIRTEENTH AND CLEMENT THE EIGHTH, ANTI-POPES.

MARTIN the Fifth was a Roman, and born of the most noble and ancient family of the Colonna, which had already given so many bad pontiffs to the people. He was the son of Agapet Colonna, called the Roman prince, and had been created a cardinal by Urban the Sixth. Platinus accords to him great qualities, an extreme amenity of character, and a remarkable skill in the conduct and management of state affairs. Leonard Aretin, who was secretary of the apostolic chamber, maintains, on the contrary, that the holy father was notoriously incompetent, and that he had a violent, despotic, and vindictive character. Windeck, the counsellor of Sigismund, reconciles these two contradictory statements, by saying, "Cardinal Otho Colonna was poor and good, but Pope Martin the Fifth became avaricious and cruel."

The news of the election of Martin the Fifth was received in all parts of the Christian world with extraordinary joy. Nations which had been divided in belief for fifty years, all submitted to the pope: the cardinals of Benedict the Thirteenth, themselves abandoned that obstinate old man, to go to Constance; and, to increase their happiness, the fathers of the council learned that Gregory the Twelfth had died from a burst of passion. Martin resolved to take advantage of the circumstances, and not allow the general enthusiasm to cool before he had made a party for his temporal interests. He sent to Spain the cardinal of Pisa, Alcan Adamar, to induce the king of Arragon to constrain Benedict, by secular penalties, to submit to the decisions of the assembly of Constance. The legate was also charged to fulminate bulls of anathema against the anti-pope and the two Spanish cardinals who remained faithful to him.

Like a skilful prince Alphonso sought to sell his pope for a good price, and pledged himself to deliver him up to the agents of Martin, on condition that the holy father would cede to him, in perpetuity, the tithe on ecclesiastical property in his kingdom, and the right of disposing of the benefices of Sardinia and Sicily, without being compelled to render any account to the Holy See; and would also grant him some of the domains of the knights of Rhodes, among others Moriscar and Peniscola, as well as power to appoint the grand masters of the order. Martin refused to agree to these proposals, which tended to diminish considerably his revenues, and considering also, that Benedict, enfeebled by age and infirmities, could not live long, replied to the king of Arragon, that he would not purchase his protection, and that he would leave it to the judgment of God, whether Benedict or he should remain pope.

This determination drew upon him the hatred of the Spaniards, who were still at the council. A formidable party was formed against him; several cardinals wished even to depose him, and published violent satires against his election. Among all these productions, the "Mass of Simony" was unquestionably the most lively and cutting critique which had yet been written against the papacy. The following are some extracts from it:--

"A young priest went on a pilgrimage to visit St. Peter's, at Rome; when he arrived in the holy city, he perceived a splendid palace, which was more elevated than the highest churches, and which workmen were constantly endeavouring to raise higher. Having inquired the name of the master of this magnificent edifice, he was told, it is Simon the Robber, the only god now adored in the church; come, officiate at his altar. He was then conducted into a cavern, in which he saw heaps of gold and silver, and on an altar three young naked females crowned with myrtle, and holding in their hands cups and garlands of flowers.—Then the divine sacrifice commenced, and he pronounced the following words:—

INTROIT.—In the name of licentiousness, pride, and avarice, I will not love, serve, or adore any, save the god of gold, which alone procures for us all enjoyment on this earth.

COLLECT.—I will employ every moment of my life in seeking new modes of oppressing the people, since it is just that stupid men, who believe our lies, should be despoiled.

LECTURE.—It is written in the Apocalypse, the angel who had the seven horns appeared in the west, mounted upon a pale courser; he went before a kind of monster, half man, half woman, which had no clothing on, and was covered about the head with only a tiara with a triple crown. This apparition was seated on a beast which had the form of an immense dragon, and whose folds were covered with a scarlet nap; in each hand it held an urn, filled with the oil of fornication, which it poured out on its way.

CONFITEOR.—I confess that I love only gold, and that I am capable of committing every crime, in thought and deed, to rob men. Amen!"

This satire was handed to Martin by the ambassadors of the king of Arragon, in full audience; he then saw that it was necessary for him to break up at once, the assembly of Constance, if he did not wish to expose himself to the fate of John the Twenty-third. Before taking this extreme measure, he wished, however, to alarm the weaker minds by some terrible execution, and continued, against several disciples of John Huss, the proceedings which had been interrupted by the judgment of John the Twenty-third, and made a magnificent auto-da-fe.

A few days afterwards, the holy father announced, officially, his intention of leaving Constance: in vain did the emperor beseech him to prolong his sojourn until he had settled the differences which existed between the altar and the throne, as he had engaged to do; in vain did he offer him the cities of Strasburg, Basle, or Mayence for his residence; all his entreaties were useless, the pope remained immovable in his resolution, and, to put an end to the solicitations, he fulminated a bull, which prohibited all Christians from appealing from his decisions, or even discussing its motives; maintaining that a pope was the absolute judge of his own actions, in all circumstances, and that he could annul the promises which he had previously made. He consequently fixed, irrevocably, his departure from Constance, and used as a pretext, that the patrimony of the church was exposed to pillage in the absence of the pastor; that the capital of Christendom was exposed to the scourges of war, famine, and pestilence; and that besides, his title as successor of Saint Peter made it his duty to take possession of the throne of the apostles. On the next day he declared the council dissolved, and gave orders to the cardinals and officers of the Holy See to take the road to Geneva, where he had resolved to hold his court until the moment of his final departure for Rome.

Martin left the city of Constance on the 16th of May, 1418; his train, say Reichaubaal, surpassed in magnificence, all that had been before seen. The procession was opened by twelve counts of the empire, mounted on white horses, richly caparisoned and covered with scarlet housings; they were followed by twelve pages, carrying, on the ends of long pikes, cardinals' hats; after them came four priests, sustaining a dais, beneath which was a bishop, who carried the holy sacrament; then came twelve cardinals in their rich scarlet costume, mounted on mules entirely covered with gold brocade; behind them a metropolitan, clothed in his episcopal attire, presented a second sacrament; he was also beneath a dais, which was supported by eight abbots on horseback. Fuzatius, the celebrated theologian of Westphalia, immediately preceded the holy father, and carried a cross glittering with precious stones; he was surrounded by the canons and senators of the city, who carried lighted candles in their hands. Then appeared Martin the Fifth, with his tiara on his head, mounted upon a horse, of which the housings were of purple and gold; four princes and four dukes carried above him a dais adorned with fringe of gold; the emperor walked on foot, holding the right side of the reins, and having at his side, Louis, duke of Bavaria, who held one of the tassels of the housing of the horse; the elector of Brandenburg held the reins on the left side, and Frederick of Austria carried the tassel of the housing; four princes walked on foot on each side and sustained, with golden cords, the middle and extremities of the housing; behind the pope, came his parasol bearer, then marched in squadrons, on foot and on horseback, nobles, soldiers, priests, monks, all the trades, and the seven hundred and eighteen courtizans of the council, dressed in white, and marching two and two.

As soon as the cortège, which contained more than forty thousand persons, had passed the suburbs of the city, Martin put on a travelling garment, mounted a saddle-horse, and continued his route to Gottleben, still accompanied by the emperor and the princes. At this last city, Sigismund took leave of him, and returned to Constance; the pope and his cardinals embarked on the Rhine, and descended to Scaffhausen, from thence they went to Basle, and, finally, to Geneva. After having repassed in the abbey of the Cordeliers, for two months, Martin crossed the Alps and entered Milan, where he was received with great honours; he then went towards Florence, avoiding Bologna, which had thrown off the sacerdotal yoke and declared itself independent.

Pogge and Leonard Aretin affirm, that the pontiff had no cause to congratulate himself on his reception by the most serene republic, and that the children who went to meet him, sung a satire, which terminated in these words, "Pope Martin is not worth a quatrino," (a small piece of money.) The inhabitants, however, permitted the holy father to remain in their city without prejudice to their prerogatives, and until he had found another residence.

During his sojourn at Florence, the holy father entered into negotiations with the lords who had augmented their domains at the expense of the church, and obtained from several of them restitution of the cities which they had usurped. He had also the satisfaction of receiving a solemn embassy from the emperor of the east, which came to implore his protection, and even offered to reduce all his subjects to obedience to the see of Rome, by causing them to abjure the schism, if he would grant him some aid in men or money. The pope appeared at first to take much interest in the Greek deputies, and even named a cardinal legate to treat of the reunion of the two churches; but that was all; for the good intentions of Martin were not followed by any result, and the ambassadors had to return to Constantinople as they came.

A few days afterwards the holy father learned, that John the Twenty-third, who had been detained for three years in the fortress of Heidelberg, had escaped from prison by paying the elector Palatine thirty thousand crowns in gold, and had gone to Genoa to the doge, Thomas Fregosus, to rally around him his old partizans. His alarm was the greater as he knew Balthasar to be a man of action and capable of kindling a civil war to recover his power. But as the anti-pope had no money, no one was willing to enrol under his banner, and his efforts completely failed. John the Twenty-third then changed his tactics and made a singular movement; he came to cast himself at the feet of his competitor, and recognised him as the lawful pope, to the great astonishment of the cardinals, who could not explain so imprudent a step. Martin received him with every appearance of joy, made him magnificent presents, created him at once cardinal bishop of Frascati, and assigned to him considerable pensions on the treasury of Saint Peter. Two months afterwards Balthasar Cossa died poisoned.

Martin, freed from his fearful adversary, had no longer any inducement to keep up with those who refused him obedience, and commenced fulminating anathemas against the malcontents. Still further, joining cowardice to meanness, he wished to excommunicate Florence as soon as he saw his affairs settled at Rome, and would doubtless have executed this project, if Leonard Aretin had not remonstrated with him energetically against it. "Whence arises, most holy father," he said to Martin, "your great resentment against Florence? Is it because you were received there at a time when all the cities of the Holy See were in the power of your enemies? Have you forgotten that it is to the protection you received within its walls, that you owe the submission of Bologna, Anagni, and even Rome? Is it not to the solicitation of the most serene republic, that Braccio, your most implacable foe, has consented to restore to you the domains usurped from the church? Do you not owe it to the generosity of Florence that you have received the ambassadors of princes in this very palace? Is it not here that the most important acts of your pontificate have taken place, the reunion of the three obediences, and the submission of John the Twenty-third? Finally, have not those very Florentines, whom you wish to excommunicate, defended your august person against your enemies, and is it not to them you owe your tiara? If you excommunicate them, holy father, I predict your speedy ruin, for God will know how to punish a monster of ingratitude."

Martin, intimidated by the language of his secretary, dared not proceed farther, and instead of lanching an interdict against the republic, he even thanked, in his audience of leave, the magistrates of Florence for the good offices he had received from them. "And to recompense you," said he, "for the expenses which our sojourn has occasioned you, we will erect your church into a metropolis." This strange compensation, which was not to the taste of the inhabitants, freed him from restoring the enormous sums he had borrowed from them, which was an important thing for his holiness.

At last the pope freed them from his presence and took the route to Rome; he was received in the apostolic city as a father long expected by his children. In fact the priests greatly needed his presence to raise them from the abject state into which they had fallen; the churches were devastated, the monasteries in ruins, and the faithful brought no more offerings to the madonna and the saints for miracles. Martin applied himself to repair the disasters caused by the last wars; he restored the churches, constructed new monasteries, and did so well, that in less than a year Rome appeared more resplendent than it had ever done before. The holy father was then engaged in re-establishing the rule of his see over the cities which had freed themselves from the tyranny of the popes; but before attacking the republics of Genoa, Venice and Florence, he judged it prudent to commence with Lower Italy.

His plans were favoured by the disorders in Naples, consequent on the expulsion of the cruel duke of Bourbon, husband of Joanna the Second, the sister of Ladislaus. The holy father called Louis the Third, duke of Anjou, into Italy, invested him, by virtue of his omnipotence, with the crown of Naples, on condition that he would restore to his see its ancient rights and privileges for benefices, collations, tithes, prebends, and other perquisites. This agreement made, Louis of Anjou raised a formidable army, and prepared to conquer the kingdom ceded to him by the church.

In this extremity Queen Joanna called to her aid Alphonso, king of Arragon, and adopted him as her son and heir, in order to attach him to her cause. The prince sent numerous troops at once to Naples, which he placed under the command of a brave general, Braccio of Perouse, a personal enemy of the pope. In a short time affairs took so favourable a turn for the queen, that Braccio wrote to her, that in less than a month he should reduce the holy father to such a state of distress that he would be obliged to say masses at six deniers each for a living. Martin himself, foreseeing that he could not long resist this formidable adversary, then had recourse to perfidy; he entered into secret negotiations with Alphonso of Arragon, and induced him to dethrone the queen of Naples, as Charles de Duras had done before him to Joanna the First, promising him to sanction his usurpation and obtain from Louis of Anjou a renunciation on advantageous terms.

In consequence of these arrangements Alphonso went in person to Queen Joanna, and under the pretext of relieving her from the burthen of affairs, he seized on the sovereign authority, disposed of the employments of the state, changed the governors of the fortified towns, replaced them by his creatures, took an oath of fidelity from the troops, reformed the laws, made new ones, and even wished to abolish the ancient customs of the Neapolitans; finally, when he supposed the moment favourable, he secretly equipped a fleet in Arragon, which was to carry off Joanna and conduct her as a prisoner to Spain.

But this plot failed; the queen, who notwithstanding her debauchery, had known how to keep the love of her subjects, was warned by some of her partizans of the mysterious conspiracy organised against her liberty; in her turn she opposed craft to knavery; she retook the reins of government, re-installed a portion of the governors who had been changed by the king, shut herself up in a strong castle situated near one of the gates of the city, so that gradually her authority was anew substituted for that of Alphonso of Arragon. The prince, perceiving that his plans had been discovered, threw off the mask, attacked the seneschal John Carracciolo, one of the lovers of the queen, when he was entering the port of Capua, and even endeavoured to seize the fortress; this effort failed, because a crowd, hastening to the aid of Joanna, fell on the Arragonese troops and made great carnage among them.

To revenge themselves for this check, the Arragonese set fire to the four corners of the city, and favoured by the fire, they rushed upon the Neapolitans and massacred them by thousands; Alphonso then again assaulted the fortress in which the queen was. His soldiers could not, however, prevail over the courage of the citizens who fought under the command of the captain Sforza, and Joanna was saved. The queen, however, a few days afterwards, determined to leave the port of Capua, on hearing that Bernardo de Cabrera was coming from Catalonia with a fleet and reinforcements. Her departure took place during the night under the protection of Sforza and five thousand citizens. Alphonso thus became absolute master of Naples; he wrote at once to Martin to inform him of the success of their plans, and to claim from him the confirmation of his title as king of Naples, and the deposition of Joanna.

His holiness did not delay his reply; he declared sharply that he had never intended to fulfil the promises he had made him; that Louis of Anjou, as the heir of his father, was the lawful sovereign of the kingdom; that he had bought the investiture of it from Popes Alexander the Fifth and John the Twenty-third; that he had confirmed this act by approving the council of Constance; and, moreover, that Louis never having undertaken anything against the Holy See, he could not take away his kingdom to give it to a prince who granted his protection to the anti-pope Peter de Luna.

Such a breach of faith, outraged the sovereign of Arragon, and he resolved, in revenge, to cause Benedict to be recognised as the lawful pontiff through all Italy. But whilst he was taking his measures to overthrow Martin, the latter, by a new act of treachery, was making proposals to Joanna of Naples, to furnish her with the means of returning to her capital, if she would consent to annul the adoption of Alphonso, and substitute Louis of Anjou in his place. Before taking her determination, the queen made an exchange of prisoners with Alphonso, and got back her favourite Carracciolo; as she had then nothing more to gain, she solemnly adopted Louis of Anjou, and united her troops with those of that prince to combat their common enemy.

From that time the fortune of the Arragonese went on declining: constantly defeated in their encounters with the French, they found themselves pushed to the sea; Alphonso was soon reduced to the last extremity, and obliged to return to Spain to recruit a new army. His first act, on setting foot in his dominions, was to publish a solemn recognition of Benedict, as the successor of the apostle, and the lawful pontiff, in order to draw the rest of the peninsula into the party of Peter de Luna. This step, which placed in question the dearest interests of Martin, induced him to write to the cardinal of Pisa, his legate in Arragon, either to seize the person of the anti-pope, or to take such measures as would leave him nothing more to dread from that competitor. His orders were admirably obeyed. Benedict the Thirteenth died in the course of the same month, poisoned by a monk. This wretch was arrested, put to the torture, and condemned to be quartered; before undergoing the punishment, he avowed that he had been urged to this crime by the cardinal of Pisa, and at the instigation of the pontiff.

Maimburg himself, represents Benedict as one of the most remarkable popes who reigned during the schism; and indeed he had an admirable force of will; alone, abandoned by all the princes of his party, having only for his residence a fortress, situated on a tongue of land, beaten on three sides by the sea, he lanced his spiritual bolts from the bosom of the elementary tumult, and amidst the roar of thunder. In the midst of the convulsions of his dying agony, he preserved his presence of mind and his energy; he showed no weakness, no repentance, and caused the two cardinals who remained faithful to him, to swear to give him a successor.

In accordance with his orders, two days after his death, an Arragonese gentleman named Giles Munoz, was enthroned pope, by the name of Clement the Eighth, and consecrated by the two cardinals for the sum of three thousand florins in gold, as John Corario affirms. The new pontiff took the sacerdotal ornaments, exercised in public his trade of pope, formed a court and created cardinals, among whom he placed his nephew, in accordance with the usages of his predecessors. Alphonso caused him to be recognised in his dominions of Arragon, Valencia, Sardinia, and Sicily, and even entered into negotiations with other sovereigns, to induce them to place their kingdoms under his rule.

Alarmed at the consequences of this hostility, which might give new strength to the schism, Martin despatched to the king of Arragon, his legate Peter, Cardinal de Foix, to offer him peace, on condition that he would abandon his anti-pope. This step had no result, for Alphonso, who had already experienced the bad faith of Otho Colonna, refused to receive his ambassador; he even published edicts against Martin, and prohibited all the prelates of his kingdom, under penalty of confiscation of their goods, from receiving any bull from Rome, and from communing with the cardinal.

Unable to deceive his enemy, Martin wished to try more violent means; and, on the 15th of July, 1425, he fulminated a bull against the king of Arragon, declared him to be an enemy of religion, a supporter of the schism, and as such, deprived of all his properties and dignities. His policy succeeded the better, as Louis of Anjou and Joanna of Naples had driven the troops of Alphonso from the kingdom of Naples, which re-established his sway over Lower Italy.

This success obtained, he kindled the fire of discord in Upper Italy, and used the ambitious Philip Marie Visconti, duke of Milan, to subjugate it. At the instigation of the holy father, the latter declared war on all the Italian republics, and carried fire and blood into Florence, against which state Martin had preserved an implacable hatred, the hatred of a priest. The Florentines, who were ignorant of the hostile sentiments of his holiness towards them, sent an embassy to Rome to implore the protection of the holy father, and to remind him of the services they had formerly rendered him. Not only did he refuse to interfere as a mediator in their quarrel with the duke of Milan, but even joined insolence to ingratitude, and said to them when dismissing them, "You will see if Pope Martin is not worth a quatrino." This pleasantry of the children of Florence, was the only motive for the hatred of the holy father! It was to avenge his vanity that the representative of a God of pity covered entire provinces with disasters, and caused thousands of innocent persons to be massacred.

From Italy the conflagration extended into Germany; already, at the council of Constance, Martin had shown himself to be one of the most ardent enemies of John Huss and Jerome of Prague; afterwards, in the synod of Pavia, he stood forth the persecutor of their disciples, and had even published a terrible decree against them, in which he enjoined on the emperor, the ecclesiastical and secular princes of Germany, and the king of Poland to unite their armies to exterminate all the people of Bohemia who had embraced the doctrines of John Huss, their fellow countryman. But as his fanatical bulls and preachings were unable to influence these princes to declare war on the Hussites, he fell back on the bishop of Winchester, one of his creatures, and conferred on him the cardinalate, on condition that he would recruit an army at his own expense and invade Bohemia. The ambitious Englishman accepted the bargain which was offered him, preached a crusade, assembled, under the banner of the pope, a crowd of wretches and banditti, placed himself at their head, and entered Bohemia.

Without being alarmed by the number of their enemies, the courageous Hussites, who had to defend their altars and their hearths, assembled in arms and marched against the hordes of the cardinal. On their approach the Italians, who formed a large part of the papal army, were seized with a panic terror and fled, casting away their arms; the English endeavoured to resist, but feebly, and were soon compelled to yield the field of battle, leaving more than ten thousand dead, and all their baggage in the power of the enemy. After his defeat, the cardinal endeavoured to entrench himself in the town of Tausch to wait for re-inforcements; he was again defeated; the Bohemians attacked the place, carried it by storm, and put to death all the Italian, French, German, and English soldiers; the cardinal himself, with difficulty, escaping in disguise.

Although conquered, the pope had attained his end, which was, to kindle the fire of civil war in Germany. He wrote thus to his legate, to restore his courage: "We have heard the news of your defeat with great grief, and we are the more dismayed at it, since it will contribute not a little to increase the strength and insolence of the heretics. We cannot too much praise your zeal, my dear son. We hope that this blow of fortune will not abate your energy; that you will persevere in the holy enterprise you have commenced; and that you will immediately recruit new troops to recommence hostilities, and to wash out, in the blood of the Hussites, the opprobrium with which your name is covered. Let no consideration arrest you; spare neither money nor men. Believe that we are acting for religion, and that God has no more agreeable holocaust than the blood of his enemies! Strike with the sword, and when your arm cannot reach the guilty, employ poison; burn all the towns of Bohemia, that fire may purify this accursed land; transform the country into arid steppes, and let the dead bodies of the heretics hang from the trees in greater numbers than the leaves of the forests!"

While the cardinal legate was seeking to execute these sanguinary orders of the pope, and was re-organising a new army, the duke of Milan, on his side, was arrested in his conquests by General Carminiola, and forced to enter into negotiations with the Venetians and Florentines.

His holiness came opportunely to his aid, and sent the cardinal Nicholas Albergati to Venice, under the pretext of consulting with the belligerent parties on the means of pacifying Upper Italy, but, in reality, to give him all time to assemble new troops, and resume the offensive. A kind of treaty was concluded, by which it was agreed the duke should restore the cities of Brescia, Bergami, Cremona, and several other places on which he had seized, and that the republics should be recompensed for their commercial losses. The duke appeared to accede to all the proposals up to the moment of their execution; he then made new difficulties, which brought about a rupture, and the war recommenced with more fury than before.

From the height of the apostolic chair Martin animated all the combatants, and, favoured by the disorders, he strengthened his sway. He was soon not content with combatting the heretics; he attacked orthodox bishops, and framed accusations against Henry Chicheley, metropolitan of Canterbury, because he had opposed the abolition of a decree of the English parliament, hostile to the pretensions of the court of Rome, and had treated the holy father as an avaricious and ambitious man. ●

This prelate, dreading the consequences which might result to him from the censures of the church, hastened to write to Rome, protesting the purity of his intentions and the regularity of his conduct, and solemnly engaging to show himself, in future, one of the most zealous defenders of the privileges of the Holy See. Martin, who knew exactly the value of a priest's promise, replied to him: "It is by the efficacy of your actions, and not by your letters of excuse, that you must repair the scandal of your conduct. We have learned, that so far from repenting of what you have done, you privately solicit members of parliament to support the bill which attaints our privileges, under pretext that we only demand its revocation from avarice, and to despoil the kingdom of England. We are too skilful in the arts of policy not to have unmasked the motives which have actuated you: we order you then to proclaim loudly, that we would be guilty towards Jesus Christ if we did not claim the rights which he gave with his own mouth to our see, and which the fathers have recognised in all times. Be careful lest we discover new perfidy on your part, for our vengeance would be terrible."

Martin also reproached Wladislaus, king of Poland, with having given the bishopric of Posnania to the vice chancellor of his kingdom, in defiance of his orders. He did more; he declared the protege of the king incapable of possessing any ecclesiastical charge or benefice, and appointed the prevost of Guesna, one of his own creatures, in his place. This affair might have induced terrible consequences, if one of the rivals had not died very apropos; the holy father then consented to give his approval to the promotion of the vice chancellor, on his paying a considerable sum.

His holiness was then occupied with the difficulties which had broken out between John, king of Portugal, and some prelates of his kingdom, on the subject of imposts. This prince made the singular pretension that the state expenses should be equally borne by all his subjects, clergy or laity, and that priests no more than other men should be freed from respect to the laws of the land. His officers therefore taxed the rich domains of the clergy, and his judges took cognizance of the crimes of peculation, incest, and murder committed by priests; finally, he wished to rule alone in his kingdom, and had consequently prohibited his prelates, under penalty of death, from publishing the orders of the court of Rome without his authority. Martin could not tolerate such abuses in a Christian kingdom; so that when he learned that his letters and missives produced no effect on John the First, he sent ambassadors to him, bearing an order for him to go to Italy, or to be deposed if he refused to abase his forehead before the majesty of the tiara. At the same time he instructed the archbishop of Braga to convene a provincial synod to advise with him on the course to be taken to repress the audacity of the prince.

These measures not having succeeded better than his letters, he cast the interdict on Portugal, and called down all the curses of God on that kingdom. This done, he turned his attention towards a very important plan, which he desired to bring to a successful issue; it was to attain the expulsion of the anti-pope, Clement the Eighth. His legate, Alphonso Borgia, Cardinal de Foix, still maintained himself in Arragon, where he had been overwhelmed with outrages; but, in his turn, he took his revenge. He sowed gold, was prodigal of promises, framed intrigues, and excited a large part of the towns against Alphonso of Arragon; even the bishops and nobles soon separated from the king, and threatened to proclaim him a schismatic if he persisted in his revolt against the Holy See.

Alarmed at the developments of the sacerdotal conspiracy, he invited the cardinal to his court, and agreed with him on the articles of a secret convention, which provided that the king should labour to bring back, within the pale of the church, the anti-pope of Peniscola; and that, if Clement persisted in the schism, he would deliver him up to the pontiff to do with him as he pleased. He still further engaged, to permit the Roman collectors freely to receive the revenues, goods, and rights of the Holy See; he also bound himself to re-establish the ecclesiastics of Arragon in their former liberty, and to restore prelatures and prebends to bishops and priests who had been deprived of them; and finally, he formally engaged to put an end to the war which he had undertaken against the kingdom of Naples.

On the other side, it was agreed that the pope should give the king the body of St. Louis of Gonzaga; that the arrearages due to the apostolic chamber should be entirely remitted, and that the annual tribute should be replaced by a cloak of gold, to be sent every five years. It was agreed that the grants of vacant prelatures, cathedrals, and abbeys should belong to the king; that he should name the cardinals of his choice, and that succours of troops, by land and sea, should be afforded him to defend Sicily against the infidels; that one hundred and fifty thousand florins should be allowed him, as an indemnity for the expenses he incurred in putting an end to the schism, and that a general absolution should be granted him for all that he had done against the Holy See during the war.

Alphonso Borgia went at once to Rome to submit these articles to the pope, and to obtain a ratification of the treaty. He found his holiness in the most pacific disposition, as his affairs were taking a bad turn in Italy. Cardinal Albergati left the apostolic city to open fresh negotiations between the republics and Philip Visconti, who, for the second time, had been reduced to the greatest distress, having lost his best generals, and spent all his money. Not only was Martin unable to bend Venice or Florence, but his authority was compromised, even in some cities of his own domains, in consequence of the revolutions of which they had been the theatre. Therefore, the pope's legate was empowered with full authority to conclude a solid peace for his own territories, which permitted the pontiff to turn all his strength against Romagna and the city of Bologna, where the people had replaced the papal banner by the standard of liberty.

A treaty of alliance was signed at Ferrara, and on the next day Martin lanced anathemas against the Bolognese; still, none of his officers dared to carry the bull to the insurgents, and he was obliged to have recourse to a poor Dominican of weak mind, who was induced to undertake this dangerous mission in the hopes of achieving martyrdom. The monk, in fact, entered the place, attached the bull to the end of a pike, and elevated it above his head, crying out "Anathema on Bologna! Accursed be its inhabitants." He had not gone ten steps when a crowd fell upon him, and tore up the bull of the pope; the poor fanatic himself was only put out of the city though he ceased not to cry that he wished to undergo the punishment of the Maccabees. Martin, unable to conquer the obstinacy of the Bolognese, assembled an army, the command of which he confided to Antonio Bentivoglio, one of his generals; and after several months of strife and combats, he retook all the places which had joined the rebellious city, and Bologna itself.

All these causes induced the holy father to give his approval to the articles proposed by Alphonso, and he sent back the cardinal of Foix to Barcelona, to sign the treaty definitely. As soon as the latter had obtained the ratification of the prince, he went beneath the walls of Peniscola to inform Clement the Eighth that he must abdicate his vain title of pope. "And the good man, Giles Mugnoz," says Maimburg, "whom they had travestied into a pontiff, showed that he had never been attached to that dignity, by the joy with which he laid it down."

Thus terminated, on the 26th of July, 1429, the great western schism, which had commenced on the 21st of September, 1378, and had torn to pieces all Christian kingdoms for more than fifty years. This period in the history of the church is one of those which presents the most curious episodes—when we are permitted to go behind the scenes of the pontifical theatre, and observe the machinery which moves the theocratic decorations. All the consecrated actors put off their spiritual masks, and exhibited themselves in their terrestrial figures as ambitious, avaricious, vindictive, debauched, and cruel; solely occupied with duping men, and changing the holy water into a stream of gold.

Martin having become, by this withdrawal, the tranquil possessor of the chair of St. Peter, was occupied in regaining the preponderance he had lost, and availed himself of the assembling of a congress at Luckow in Poland, to induce Wladislaus to take a vigorous resolve against the Hussites, his most redoubtable adversaries. He addressed the following letter to the prince on this subject:—"The grand actions which you have accomplished since your baptism, my lord, and the zeal which you have shown for our holy religion, in imposing your belief on idolatrous nations, give us hopes that you will persist in the same way, and will bring back to the fold of the church the Christians of Bohemia, whom the abominable John Huss has drawn into schism. Know that the interest of the Holy See, and those of your crown, make it a duty to exterminate the Hussites. Remember that these impious persons dare proclaim principles of equality; they maintain that all Christians are brethren, and that God has not given to privileged men the right of ruling the nations; they hold that Christ came on earth to abolish slavery; they call the people to liberty, that is, to the annihilation of kings and priests! Whilst there is still time, then, turn your forces against Bohemia; burn, massacre, make deserts every where, for nothing could be more agreeable to God, or more useful to the cause of kings, than the extermination of the Hussites."

In consequence of the orders of the court of Rome, a new crusade was preached against the Bohemians, with promises of indulgences to those who should take up arms; but this expedition, which was the sixth enterprise for the extinction of Hussism, was not more fortunate than its predecessors; the Catholic army was cut to pieces, and liberty triumphed.

This bad news reached the holy father whilst he was engaged in the nomination of a legate, whom he wished to send to Basle to preside over a general council, and proceed against the heretics; the mortification and anger which he experienced were so violent, that he was struck with a fit of apoplexy. His death took place on the 20th of February, 1431, after a reign of four years.

EUGENIUS THE FOURTH, THE TWO HUNDRED AND FOURTEENTH POPE.

[A. D. 1431.]

Election of Eugenius the Fourth—His history before his pontificate—His efforts to re-establish his sway in Italy—Rome rises against him—Frightful punishment inflicted by his order on the monk Masius—Council of Basle—Policy of the court of Rome—The duke of Milan declares war on the pope—Eugenius is driven from Rome—He is protected by the queen of Naples—He wishes to transfer the council of Basle to Ferrara—The assembly is divided, and forms two councils, which anathematise reciprocally—Eugenius is deposed by the council of Basle—Amadeus, duke of Savoy, chosen pope by the name of Felix the Fifth.

BEFORE proceeding to the election of a new pontiff, the members of the sacred college, having assembled in conclave, took a solemn oath, that he among them who should be chosen to the papacy, should in future subscribe the apostolic bulls with this formula, "By consent of the cardinals." They also agreed that the pope should not give the purple to any ecclesiastic without their authority, and that he should share with them all the revenues of the church. After this the notary received their suffrages, and Gabriel Condemère, cardinal of Saint Clement, was canonically proclaimed the successor of the apostle.

This prelate was a bastard of Pope Gregory the Twelfth and a Benedictine nun; his father had elevated him successively to the diaconate, priesthood, episcopate, and finally, had given him the red hat at an age when other clergymen were only taking their lowest orders.

As soon as Eugenius the Fourth had been consecrated, he assembled the ambassadors of the principal cities of Upper Italy in a hall of the Vatican, and declared to them that he was resolved to put an end to the civil wars, and to excommunicate the princes who should oppose this wish. Philip Visconti, who found his ambition checked by this determination, alone disapproved of the pacific views of the church. To put himself in a situation to resist it, he formed a league with the inhabitants of Sienna and Lucca, speedily raised free companies, and threatened to march on Rome, and put all the inhabitants to the sword, if the pope dared to furnish aid to the republics of Venice and Florence.

The war then recommenced with new fury on both sides, and complicated the political situation; for the Romans, feeling a sort of repugnance for Eugenius, because he was not of their city, waited but an opportunity to give vent to their hatred, and cast on him the cause of their disasters. It was related that an eclipse of the sun took place on the day of the death of Martin the Fifth; and that, at the first public consistory held by Eugenius, the galleries of the church broke down, and crushed, in their fall, a great number of persons: "An evident sign," they said, "that God disapproved of the elevation of a bastard to the chair of the apostle." They became still more embittered in consequence of visits which the holy father caused to be made to the palaces of Antonio, prince of Salernum, Edward, count of Calani, and Cardinal Prospero, all three of the family of the Colonna, and relatives of Martin the Fifth. These measures were counselled by the Ursini, their enemies, who accused them of having stolen a large part of the treasures of the deceased pope.

The Colonna, furious at finding themselves the objects of odious and unjust suspicions, organised a conspiracy against Eugenius, and resolved to seize the castle of San Angelo. They had brought into their plot the monk Masius, who was to surrender to them the keys of one of the gates of which he had the custody, when, unfortunately, on the eve of the execution, the pope, informed of what was going on against him, caused the conspirators to be invested in their fortresses. The Colonna, taken by surprise, had scarcely time to escape from Rome; their magnificent palaces were pillaged, and razed to the ground; their property was all confiscated, and themselves condemned to the loss of their honours and dignities. The holy father then proceeded to the punishment of the monk Masius, and exhausted on this unfortunate man all kinds of cruelties.

This punishment produced a very different effect from that which his holiness expected. He hoped that sight of the sufferings of his victim would fill all minds with dread, and prevent a new effort at rebellion; but it so happened, that indignation exceeded fear. The people followed Eugenius to his palace, overwhelming him with hisses and curses; his guards even offered terrible threats to him, and that evening one of his domestics put poison in his food. Remedies were, however, applied in time, and the holy father escaped from this attempt at assassination.

Although they had failed once, his enemies did not abandon their project of taking revenge upon him, and a revolution was on the very point of breaking out, when the emperor Sigismund came to the holy city, to receive the imperial crown from the hands of Eugenius. His presence appeased the troubles for the moment, and the holy father was enabled to employ himself in strengthening his authority over Italy. After the ceremony of the consecration, the pontiff appointed the cardinal Juliano Cesarini as his legate to Basle, to assist at the opening of the council, which was fixed for the 23d of July, 1431.

From the very opening, the fathers who composed the assembly, discussed a proposition, tending to establish the superiority of councils over popes, and consequently to take from the successors of the apostle, their privilege of infallibility. Eugenius, alarmed at this disposition, immediately sent orders to his legate to dissolve the synod, and transfer it to Bologna, that he might preside over it in person, and at the same time wrote to the emperor to notify him of this translation. But the cardinal Juliano Cesarini refused to obey the decrees of the pontiff, and told him that he would renounce his legation, rather than render himself an accomplice in arbitrary measures towards the prelates at Basle; he was strengthened in this resistance by Sigismund, who declared that the fathers should continue to hold their assembly.

Eugenius lanced a preventive bull against the council, and declared all the decrees, procedures, or citations, framed in his absence, null. As he, however, feared to push matters to extremities, he sent two cardinals, who were devoted to him, to regulate the deliberations at Basle. This step did not succeed; the fathers exasperated at the pope, refused to receive them, and published a protest, in which Eugenius was accused of prevaricating towards the councils, who alone possessed the legislative power of the church; they even threatened the legates to use their rights to the full extent, and depose the pontiff, if the decretals and bulls of the court of Rome were not revoked within sixty days.

Thus the holy father found himself at once exposed to the hatred of the Roman people, the anger of all the prelates of Europe, and that of Philip Visconti. Too weak to resist so many enemies, he determined to temporize, and made concessions to the council. He declared in a bull, that at the request of the emperor, and by the advice of his cardinals, he consented to approve of the decisions of the fathers, in order that they might labour without trouble in extirpating heresies and reforming the morals of the ecclesiastics.

Reassured on this side, Eugenius wished to take energetic measures to resist the duke of Milan, who had assembled numerous troops under the orders of his son-in-law, Francis Sforza, and an adventurer called Nicholas Strongarm, and who was marching on Rome, ravaging the domains of the church, pillaging the castles, burning the farms, and massacring the cultivators. This time the Roman people remained deaf to his exhortations, and refused to take up arms to repulse the enemy. In his fury, the holy father lanced a bull of excommunication against the city, ordered the churches to be closed, and the priests every where to cease to perform divine service. This violent remedy, instead of appeasing the troubles, augmented the confusion; the citizens rose, rushed to the Vatican, besieged and stormed it, after having murdered all the soldiers. Eugenius had scarcely time to fly to the Tiber and save himself in a boat with a monk; he then went to Florence and installed himself in the patriarchal palace.

From that city the holy father wrote to the fathers of the council of Basle and the emperor Sigismund, to claim their interference in his quarrel with the duke of Milan, and to beseech them to constrain Visconti to restore peace to the Holy See, and the Romans to receive him in the apostolic city. The prelates, who supposed that the sentiments of Eugenius were in conformity with the one he had expressed in the last bull, interceded themselves in his favour with Sigismund and the other princes of Europe. Philip Visconti, menaced by all the powers, was obliged to reconcile himself with the pope and recall his troops to his duchy. Thanks still to the solicitations of the fathers of the council, Eugenius obtained from the queen of Naples, Joanna the Second, succours in men and money, which aided his party to triumph in Rome.

It appeared as if God wished to punish this queen for having restored the dominion of the pope over the people, for on the very day on which Eugenius took possession of the palace of the Lateran, she lost her adopted son, Louis of Anjou, and her favourite, Carracciolo; she herself died shortly after, leaving her kingdom, to René duke of Anjou.

As soon as the news of Joanna's death reached Rome, Eugenius sent word to the lords of the kingdom, that they must abstain from proceeding provisionally to the election of a sovereign, and almost immediately despatched John Viteleschi, bishop of Recanati and patriarch of Alexandria, who was regarded as a man of sense and courage, to take possession of Naples in his name. But the inhabitants, who dreaded the government of the pope more than any thing else in the world, refused to receive his legate, and determined to send a deputation to René of Anjou, to offer him the crown, beseeching him to come to Naples, to take possession of the throne. The prince listened joyfully to the ambassadors, and as he could not leave his duchy, being a prisoner on parole to Charles the Rash, duke of Burgundy, he gave them his two children and Isabella his wife, to govern the kingdom in his absence.

As soon as Isabella arrived in Naples, she took the reins of government into her own hands, and endeavoured to repress the factions, who excited disorders in the capital, and sought to induce the people to revolt. Among the fanners of the sedition, the agents of the king of Arragon, who were the most ardent and the most redoubtable, were enabled even to seize the city of Capua. This success destroyed them, for in the intoxication of their triumph, they sent to inform Alphonso, who kept the sea close to the shores of Sicily, that he could disembark in entire safety, and that the population would rise in mass on his approach to proclaim him king of Naples. On the receipt of this news, the prince advanced with his fleet to make a descent on the land of Labour, in sight of the port of Gaëta; unfortunately for him his agents had taken their measures badly; he met on his way the vessels of the Genoese, the allies of the duke of Milan, who also laid claims to the sovereignty of Naples; a terrible contest took place between the two fleets; almost all the vessels of Alphonso were sunk, that in which he was with his family, and which had cowardly kept out of the fight, was taken and conducted in triumph to Genoa, and Alphonso, with the king of Navarre and the infants of Arragon was surrendered to the duke of Milan. This reverse became in the end the cause of the fortune of the duke of Arragon; he knew so well how to captivate his conqueror, that Philip Visconti consented to set him at liberty and cede to him his claim on the kingdom of Naples, on the payment of a ransom and a tribute; he even engaged to aid him with his armies against the duke of Anjou and the pope, if this last persisted in his ridiculous pretensions over Lower Italy.

Eugenius no longer thought of disputing possession of the kingdom of Naples for his see; he had already ranged himself entirely in the party of René of Anjou, in order to procure from that prince authority to levy tithes on the faithful of his provinces, and also, which he did not yet avow, to create a protector, who might aid him in annulling the decrees of the council of Basle.

This assembly had become in fact a subject of serious alarm to the holy father. The prelates who composed it had declared themselves in permanent session, and continued to frame decrees for the reform of the church, in its supreme chief and its ministers. Among other decisions they had framed this against the abuses of simony:—"The general council, lawfully assembled and representing the universal church, orders, in the name of the Holy Spirit, in regard to that in the Roman court which concerns elections, admissions, presentations, grants, collations, gifts, postulations, institutions, installations, investitures, dignities, benefices, ecclesiastical offices, sacred orders, blessings, and grants of the pallium, that in future no recompense shall be demanded for the seal of the bulls, for annates, small services of first fruits, or under any other title or pretext whatsoever. If any one infringes this canon by exacting, giving, or promising any present or salary, he shall incur the penalty inflicted on simoniacs, be he the pope himself!"

The fathers then declared the constitution of Gregory the Tenth, in regard to pontifical elections, to be obligatory: they were also engaged with the Greek question, and received ambassadors from John Paleologus the Sixth, who came to offer, in his name, to reunite with the Latin church, if the king of the West would consent to furnish him with troops to drive back the Musselmens to the deserts of Arabia. The council decreed indulgences to all Christians who should labour for the reunion of the two churches, and ordered that they should proceed immediately to equip an armament to succour Constantinople. John Paleologus, on his side, hastened to name plenipotentiaries, to send to the council, to abjure the schism.

Eugenius, informed of the turn negotiations were taking, wished to oppose their proceeding with the armaments destined for the Greeks; he maintained that the executive power belonged to him alone; that the council of Basle was trespassing on his attributes, and that not content with taking the initiative in the regulation of ecclesiastical discipline; it was even arrogating to itself the right of absolute jurisdiction over the faithful, a right which had always belonged to the popes. He dared not, however, order the fathers to break off the conferences, and contented himself with thwarting them in the matter of the reunion with the Greeks. At his instigation, John Paleologus demanded that the council which, with his envoys, was to arrange the clauses of the reunion, should meet at a place nearer Rome than Basle, in order that the pontiff might assist at the deliberations.

In order to satisfy the desires of the prince, the bishops sent two ambassadors to his holiness, beseeching him to come in person to the assembly, or to transfer it to Avignon or a city of Savoy. Eugenius rejected this proposal, and instructed the legates to inform the fathers that he exacted that their decisions, made in the last sessions, and which touched the privileges of the papacy, should be revoked, or otherwise he would not appear among them. The prelates refused unanimously to submit to these disgraceful conditions, and decreed that the assembly should continue its deliberations in the absence of the pope, and that they would send an embassy to inform the Greek emperor, that he must accept the city of Basle as the place of the conferences, or renounce the succour they had promised him. When the deputies arrived at Constantinople, they found that Eugenius had been before hand with them, and that his agents so completely swayed the mind of Paleologus, that it was impossible to induce the weak monarch to choose any other city than Ferrara.

Eugenius availed himself of the foolish credulity of the Greek emperor, to order the fathers of the council of Basle to go to Ferrara. He hoped it would be easier for him to annul the decrees made in contempt of his authority, when he himself presided over its deliberations, as he was at peace with Philip Visconti, the Genoese, Venetians, and Florentines. Unfortunately, Alphonso of Arragon deranged all his plans; this prince, by a succession of victories, had re-conquered all the strong places of the kingdom of Naples, and even driven Queen Isabella and the legates of the Holy See from the capital, which permitted him, in his turn, to take vengeance on the treason of the pope to him. Thus he did not hesitate to increase the number of the enemies of Eugenius. He published a decree, enjoining on all the bishops of his kingdoms of Naples, Sicily, and Arragon, to go immediately to the council of Basle, to have Gabriel Condemère, the bastard of the anti-pope Gregory the Twelfth, placed on trial.

The Spanish prelates had no difficulty in inducing the council, which was already badly disposed towards the pope, to order him to come to Basle, to render an account of his conduct, and to answer for the unworthy use which he had made of the supreme authority with which he had been invested. In the letter which was sent to Rome on this occasion, the council enumerated the struggles which they had maintained against the Holy See to bring about a reform of the clergy, and to put an end to the shameful disorders which existed in the church, and which were the scandal of Christendom. The fathers cast all the evils upon Eugenius; they accused him of having encouraged simony, of having protected licentiousness, and of having shown himself to be the most corrupt of his court, instead of setting an example of the Christian virtues. They closed by ordering the cardinals to come to the city of Basle, to take with the council the measures necessary for the good of religion. Finally, after having waited the period of delay fixed in the citation, they pronounced a sentence which condemned Eugenius the Fourth as contumacious, and suspended him from sacerdotal functions.

The pontiff, on his side, was not inactive; he convoked a council at Ferrara for the 8th of January, 1438; on the appointed day, the cardinal of Saint Croix, solemnly opened it in his name, though the Greek ambassadors were absent, and scarcely twenty prelates were assembled. The cardinal emphatically declared that all the proceedings of the cabal at Basle were tinged with heresy, and erased them as destructive of the liberty of the Roman church; this decision was notified to all the powers of Europe.

Exasperated at this new insult, the prelate assembled at Basle, deposed the pope, and launched the thunders of excommunication against the synod of Ferrara. Eugenius, in his turn, fulminated anathemas against those who had had the audacity to depose him; he declared them to be deprived of their dignities and their benefices, and excommunicated the kings, lords, and people who did not arm to exterminate the fathers of the council of Basle.

Such was the situation of affairs when the plague interrupted the labours of the assembly of Ferrara, and obliged Eugenius to transfer the council to Florence. The Greek ambassadors also went to this city, and all having assembled, decreed the following constitution:

"Eugenius, supreme ruler of the universal church, to bequeath to posterity a perpetual testimony of the faith of his dear son in Jesus Christ, John Paleologus, the illustrious emperor of the Greeks, affirms, that by his influence, the faithful of the east will, in future, profess the dogmas and worship framed in this diploma.

"Let the heavens and the earth rejoice, since the walls which divided the churches of the east and west, have crumbled into the abyss; since concord is rebuilt upon the corner-stone of religion; since all the faithful of the earth are reunited in Jesus Christ, after ages of darkness and sorrow! Let the church, that divine mother, rejoice at carrying in its bosom all its reunited sons, and even those who have so long torn her by bloody divisions. Let the East and West leap with joy; let them confound their love in a spiritual embrace, and let their souls unite in infinite pleasures."

After this strange exordium it thus continues:—

"In the name of the Holy Trinity, we define that the truth of the orthodox faith consists in recognising the Holy Spirit to be identical with the Father and the Son, and that it proceeds eternally from them as from one beginning and action. We declare that the fathers and doctors who affirm that the Holy Spirit does not proceed immediately from the father, establish, notwithstanding the apparent contradiction of their words, that this procession is simultaneous, and recognise the Son to be as the Father, the cause and principle of the Holy Spirit. We, consequently, decide, that the words "Filioque," have been lawfully added to the Nicene Creed, to define that article of faith.

"We declare that the body of Jesus Christ is truly present in the consecrated host, be the bread unleavened or leavened. We recognise that the souls of true penitents, dead in the charity of God, without having confessed their faults, are admitted to contemplate the face of Christ eternally, but only after having been purified in the flames of purgatory. We confess that the duration of their punishment can be abridged by the good works of the living. We confess that the souls of the faithful who have not sinned since their baptism, or those who have been purified in their bodies by the remunerating sacraments, after having laid off their terrestrial prison, come at once to the kingdom of Christ, and see the Holy Trinity face to face, although in different degrees, according to their merits. We confess that those who are dead in a state of mortal sin, or without having been baptized, immediately descend to hell, to be burned for ever."

Such is the famous definition of the faith, of which the Greek deputies approved. A cotemporary historian, maintains, however, that the pontiff bought their consent to the admission of purgatory for the sum of five thousand ducats; that he gave ten thousand to obtain the procession of the Holy Spirit, and that he went as high as twenty thousand to have the communion under one kind admitted. Both parties signed it, and the ambassadors returned to Constantinople with the money of his holiness.

Three days after their arrival, the act for the reunion of the two churches was annulled by the oriental prelates, and the name of the pope was more execrated than ever by the Greeks.

Whilst Eugenius was lulling himself to sleep with illusions, the assembly at Basle was acting; it first declared the pontiff to be simoniacal, perjured, a dissipator of the property of the church, a dangerous administrator, and an incorrigible schismatic; it then named three members, Thomas, abbot of Donduces, John of Legovia, and Thomas of Corcellis, to form a college of twenty-nine prelates, and to proceed to the election of a pope, in accordance with former customs.—The bishops who were designated, entered into conclave on the 30th of October, 1439, and chose, as sovereign pontiff, Amadeus, duke of Savoy and abbot of the convent of Ripaille.

FELIX THE FIFTH, THE TWO HUNDRED AND FIFTEENTH POPE.

EUGENIUS, BECOME ANTI-POPE.

[A. D. 1439.]

AMADEUS, duke of Savoy, had governed his dominions with great prudence for forty years, when he took the singular fancy of becoming a hermit. He abandoned his dutchy to his two sons, and retired to the agreeable sojourn of Ripaille, on the borders of Lake Geneva, with several pages, twenty domestics, and some lords of his court. The new congregation embraced the rules of the order of Saint Maurice.

The kind of life which these brothers followed is differently spoken of; some authors affirm that the rules were extremely rigid; others establish by authentic documents, that these pious anchorites drank exquisite wines instead of water, and replaced roots, with the most delicious dishes; they even say, that by way of mortification, the brothers doubled the number of their repasts on fast days, and committed fornication or sodomy at the hours of prayer, morning, mid-day, and night.—Daniel Desmarets assures us, that the hermitage of Ripaille had become a cave of abominations, the receptacle of every vice; and that it was a thing so well known in his time, that "to perform Ripaille," signified joyous orgies with good companions and light women.

As soon as this election was known, violent parties arose on all sides; many ecclesiastics alleged the disorders of the life of Amadeus as a cause for exclusion, others argued from his state as a layman and father, as a cause of his rejection; others still protested against the nomination, because he was not a doctor in theology, and would consequently find himself a stranger to all matters which concerned the government of the church. Notwithstanding this formidable opposition, the electors, who made him pope, stood firm and silenced all scruples. If your pope is not a doctor, they said, you will not deny that he is well versed in profane knowledge, which is not less necessary for the government of the church. He has been married, beyond doubt, they added, but the fathers and councils have not excluded from the priesthood those who have espoused one wife, and his state of layman will cease as soon as he shall have received sacred orders. As for the disorders with which you reproach him, who among you can say that he is exempt from the same sins.

From that moment all opposition ceased, and ambassadors were sent to Ripaille, to offer the tiara to the duke of Savoy. The joyous abbot was at table with his monks, when they came to announce to him that he had been chosen pope. He at first refused to believe what they said. When by the protestations of the deputies, he was made to comprehend that his nomination was serious, he fell into such a fit of gaiety that it burst out into noisy laughter; his hilarity communicated itself to his fellow feasters, reached even the grave ambassadors, and the refectory soon presented one of the drollest scenes that could be imagined.

"Although he was completely drunk," says the chronicle, "they clothed him in the pontifical ornaments; one of the cardinals blessed him, placed the ring of the fisherman on his right hand, and two monks sustained his tottering steps to the church of the monastery, where he was submitted to the proof of the pierced chair, and enthroned with the usual ceremonies, by the name of Felix the Fifth."

As soon as Eugenius was informed of the election of the duke of Savoy, he fulminated the most terrible anathemas against him; confirmed the preceding excommunications launched against the fathers of the council of Basle, cursed individually each of the electors of Felix the Fifth, and especially the cardinal of Arles; declared that prelate deprived of all his offices, dignities, and benefices, and named to replace him in the archiepiscopal see, Roger, bishop of Aix, in Provence. He then addressed the following circular to all the princes in Europe:—"The sots, fools, madmen, and barbarians who have assembled riotously in the city of Basle, to adore that drunkard, that sodomite, that Cerberus, that golden calf, that Mahomet, that antichrist, called the duke of Savoy, are all anathematised by us; and we command you to exterminate them like wild beasts, who in their insatiable fury tear the entrails of their mother, and renew the schism in the church. Pursue, unceasingly, the infamous debauchee of Ripaille, who has caused himself to be made pope, that he may pursue his saturnalia in full security—curses upon the monster who has excited the dregs of the priests against the lawful chief of the church!—curses on the shameless hog who cherishes his priests with gold and silver!—curses upon that satan who causes himself to be adored in the temple of Christ!—curses, death, and damnation, upon the infamous Amadeus, duke of Savoy."

The hatred of the pontiff to his successor was so violent, that it led him to massacre his legate, Vitteleschi, one of the most venerable prelates of Italy, because he had been bold enough to propose to his holiness to enter into an arrangement with Felix the Fifth. This venerable prelate, who had rendered him such great services in his legation at Naples, was arrested by the guards of the pope, thrown into a dungeon, pitilessly tortured and beheaded.

It was not enough for the council of Basle to have conferred the dignity on Felix: they must give him the means of maintaining his dignity; and as those who dispose of the fortunes of the people usually exhibit great prodigality, if some parcels of it are to return to them, the cardinals authorised the new pontiff to levy tithes for five years on the revenues of land, and ecclesiastical, secular, and regular benefices. This decree encountered an active opposition in the states of Arragon, Hungary, Austria, and Bavaria; in Savoy, in several cities of Germany, and in the universities of Paris, Vienne, Erfurt, Cologne, and Cracow; it was, however, put in execution, thanks to the support of the sovereigns of those countries who had recognised Felix as the lawful head of the church.

Eugenius, in imitation of his competitor, did not neglect to increase his treasures; he levied contributions on Upper Italy, and the courts of France, England, and Spain; he made promotions of cardinals, and sold to his creatures, the sees of the excommunicated bishops. Thus he soon found himself in a condition to struggle against his adversary, who thought of nothing less than treating with the king of Arragon and the duke of Milan, to purchase the city of Rome, and the other places of the Holy See. As soon as he was informed of the proceedings of his rival, the Roman pontiff at once sought the friendship of those monarchs; he sent them rich presents, and even abandoned the party of René of Anjou, to please Alphonso of Arragon. He at the same time sent ambassadors to visit the emperor Frederick, to divert him from the plan he had formed of convening a general council to decide the quarrel of the two popes; Eugenius caused captious observations to be presented to him on this grave subject, objected to him that this measure was inopportune, since he had convened an œcumenical and apostolical synod at Florence, which had made decisions that he could not annul, without being guilty of heresy and rebellion towards God. All these reasonings being unable to change the determination of the emperor, Eugenius determined not to create a new and powerful enemy; he pledged himself to convene a general council in the palace of the Lateran, and to place it under the protection of Frederick; he even published a bull on this occasion, which declared the council of Florence dissolved, and transferred it to Rome. On their side, the fathers who were sitting at Basle, terminated their session, and convened a general meeting for the following year in the city of Lyons.

Such was the conclusion of those two councils, which separated from sheer weariness, and found means to terminate their debates, without making peace or accommodation, and without either of the parties being able to flatter itself seriously that it had gained the victory. Eugenius desired to return to Rome, from which he had been absent for eight years; and to cause the people to forget the evils he had drawn on the holy city, he abolished the barrier duties, reformed some abuses, and disbanded his army.

Two years passed away in profound peace, his holiness having no other care than that of regulating the march of religious solemnities, or with occupying himself with varying his orgies, and of inventing new festivals, in which he was marvellously seconded by a Spanish family called Borgia, and of which all the members, male and female, made their infamy a mark of honour. One of them, whom he had made a cardinal, and who afterwards became pope, was publicly called his minion.

During this period of peace and tranquillity, took place a very important act, the sentence of deposition against Theodoric of Meurs, and James Sotic, metropolitans of Cologne and Treves, and both electors of the empire. This new mark of audacity excited the indignation of the other electors, who held a diet at Frankford, to oppose the encroachments of the court of Rome, and decided that if Eugenius refused to revoke at once his decrees of deposition, they would abolish the taxes under which the German nation was ground down, and would recognise the superiority of councils over the Holy See, as the council of Constance had declared; that they would withdraw from his obedience, and range themselves in the party of Felix the Fifth.

This decree was announced to the pope by Æneas Sylvius, the secretary of the assembly, in person. The pope submitted to the injunctions of the diet, and revoked the sentences of deposition; but in regard to the other propositions of the electors, he asked permission to submit them to the œcumenical council, before making a definite conclusion. As the archbishops of Cologne and Treves were re-installed in their sees, the Germans were content with his promises on the subjects in litigation, and recognised him provisionally as the sole legitimate pontiff.

Eugenius had not the satisfaction of long enjoying his triumph; a few days afterwards he fell very sick and took to his bed, not to rise again. His malady increased daily, and the aid of art having been decided to be useless, his chamberlains wished to administer the last sacraments to him.

When the metropolitan of Florence presented himself with the holy oil to give him extreme unction, the dying man, who endeavoured to deceive himself with regard to his state, and to re-attach himself to life, rose on his couch, upset the chalice, and uttered horrible blasphemies, ordering them to drive the archbishop from his presence.

This burst of passion aided to weaken his strength, and on the next day he perceived the fatal term approaching; he then called his cardinals around him and made this singular address to them:—"May God pardon the faults which I have committed upon the apostolic throne, in what I have done in yielding to the guilty sentiments of pride and avarice. I admit that I have committed great crimes during my pontificate, and at this last hour they appear to me like the sombre lights which announce the abysses of hell. Let this example instruct you, and, after me, elevate to the seat of the apostle a holy priest who possesses charity and humility, who will cause probity to reign instead of robbery and murder, which for so many years have established their court in the Vatican." He could say no more; strength failed him, and he yielded up his last breath. His death took place on the 23d of February, 1447.

NICHOLAS THE FIFTH, THE TWO HUNDRED AND SIXTEENTH POPE.

[A. D. 1447.]

Election of Nicholas the Fifth—His history before his advent to the pontifical throne—Negotiations of the holy father to obtain the renunciation of the papacy by Felix—Nicholas is recognised in France, Germany, England and Spain—End of the schism—Death of Felix—Jubilee at Rome—The Greeks offer to reunite with the Latin church—Coronation of Frederick the Third, emperor of Germany—League against that prince—The taking of Constantinople by Mohammed the Second—Conspiracy against the pope—New project of a crusade against the Turks—Death of Nicholas—Judgment of historians on the pontiff.

DURING the eight days which were consumed in the funeral solemnities of Eugenius, the eighteen cardinals who were at Rome assisted regularly at the religious ceremonies; after the inhumation, the three chiefs of the order of the sacred college posted guards at the avenues leading to the castle of San Angelo, and invited their colleagues to assemble in the saloon in which its sittings were usually held; but the governor of Rome having refused to wall up the gate, the cardinals determined to form the conclave in the dormitory of the chapter of Minerva; the keys of the door were confided to the metropolitans of Ravenna, Aquileia, Sermonetta, and the bishop of Ancona. These first arrangements made, they swore in the officers of the Holy See, and the members of the sacred college took possession of the cells which were destined for them; some were hung with green serge, others with violet, and only one with white, that of the cardinal of Bologna, who wished to indicate thereby how pure his conscience was.

Several days passed in intrigues and cabals, at length Prosper Colonna having obtained ten votes on the eighth sitting, the cardinal Firmano exclaimed, "Why, my brethren, do we lose precious time in useless strife? Do you forget that Rome is divided into two factions; that the king of Arragon holds the sea with a powerful fleet, and that Pope Felix might dissolve our college at any moment? Let us then bring the conclave to a close, and give a chief to the church! The cardinal Prosper Colonna has already ten voices; let one of you rise, another will soon follow him, and we shall soon have a pontiff, whose mildness, merit, and firmness, can alone restore peace to Italy."

Notwithstanding the apostrophe of Firmano, the cardinals remained immovable. Then the cardinal of Bologna, impatient at the length of their debates, which threatened to be interminable, rose to vote, but the cardinal of Trent, holding him by his robe, forced him down again, observing to him, "That he ought not to choose a pope in a moment of ill humour, and that he ought to bring to this choice all the prudence of his mind, since he was about to confer on a man the highest dignity in the universe, that of the vicar of Christ on earth." "All that you do and say," replied the cardinal of Bologna, "is but to prevent the election of Prosper; give your voice to whom you will, and let me vote for Colonna." "Well," exclaimed the cardinal of St. Sixtus, "I swear he shall not be pope, I vote for Thomas of Sarzanus."

This sudden exclamation turned the chances; the majority gave their voices for Thomas, who was enthroned by the name of Nicholas the Fifth. Prosper Colonna, who was the first deacon, immediately opened the window of the hall of conference to announce to the people the election which had been made; but as the window was very high, the crowd did not hear exactly the name of the new pontiff, and several persons having recognised Prosper Colonna, cried out that he was pope. This error caused the people to pillage his palace, which did not save that of Thomas Sarzanus when the truth was known.

Platinus affirms, that the merit of the new pontiff was very moderate, and that he owed his elevation to the cardinalship to favour, rather than real services rendered the church. The commencement of his pontificate was signalised by an happy event for Italy, the death of the most ambitious and treacherous of the princes of that period, Philip Maria Visconti, duke of Milan, who had endeavoured, for thirty-five years, to subjugate the republics of Florence and Venice.

Profiting by this circumstance, which deprived the king of Arragon of his most powerful ally, the holy father concluded a treaty of peace with Alphonso, and obtained from him a recognition of himself as the lawful chief of the church in all his dominions. Nicholas also caused Frederick the Third to be notified of his election, by his legate the cardinal Carafal, who conducted this negotiation so well, that he induced the emperor to confirm the nomination of the holy father, without obliging him beforehand to give his approval to the proceedings of the council of Basle.

Frederick surpassed even the hopes of the legate, for he made a decree, ordering all the subjects of the empire to be obedient to Nicholas, without any restriction, formally condemning the decisions of the council of Basle, and rejecting Pope Felix as an intruder and schismatic. This compliance of the sovereign was in truth, but the result of concessions made by the Holy See, which had relieved Germany from the subjection of the investitures. The example, however, of the prince, influenced other monarchs, and drew into the party of Nicholas almost all the Christian kingdoms, always excepting Switzerland and Savoy; these two states continued to recognise Felix, who still dwelt in the city of Lausanne, where he followed his trade like a thief, according to the expression of Pogge, the secretary of Nicholas, who wrote thus in the name of his master:

"You give red hats to your creatures, and you travestie them in ridiculous masks, you send ambassadors to the princes of Europe, to cause them to adore your statue and burn incense to Moloch, by proposing to them to follow your infected heresy. Happily, your delegates have been hissed, rejected from all courts with horror, and the evil has not been accomplished." This missive terminated with furious menaces against Amadeus, if he continued the strife with Nicholas, and with magnificent promises if he consented to submit.

Felix, tired of this agitating life, determined to abdicate, as a bull, dated at Rome on the 18th of January, 1448, attests, decreeing a general amnesty and an entire abolition of all censures, excommunications, penalties, privations, damages, or anathemas, pronounced against Felix the Fifth, the council of Basle, or their adherents.

As soon as they had cognizance of this bull at the court of France, the king, Charles the Seventh, held a general assembly of his prelates in the city of Lyons, at which it was determined to send deputies to Duke Amadeus, who was still at Geneva, to treat definitely concerning his withdrawal. The holy father was very docile, and stipulated no other condition for himself, than that of being replaced in possession of his convent of Ripaille, and of being enabled to resume his usual course of life. It was not so, however, with his cardinals and the officers of his court; they exacted that their honours, dignities, and emoluments should be retained for them; that the grants made by Felix and the general council of Basle, should be approved by Nicholas, and that the latter should also engage to provide for his competitor in an honourable manner.

Such was the Roman pontiff's desire to possess the sole exercise of sovereign power, that he agreed to all that was required. He assigned a considerable pension on the revenues of the apostolic chamber to his conpetitor; he conferred on him the titles of cardinal, bishop, perpetual legate, and vicar of the Holy See, in all the territories of the dutchy of Savoy, and assigned to him the first rank in the church after that of the sovereign pontiff; he specified even, that should it please Felix to visit the court of Rome, he would rise from his seat to receive him, and would give him the kiss of peace upon the mouth, without exacting from him any particular mark of submission or respect; he also consented to permit him to wear the pontifical ornaments, except the ring of the fisherman and the cross on his hose; finally, he declared by a brief, that Felix should preserve the title and rights of a legate, even if he quitted the dominions of Savoy, and in no case should be responsible to the court of Rome nor councils.

Felix, on his side, went to work, to fulfil the obligations of the treaty, and convened the bishops of his party at Lausanne, to lay down his functions; before, however, pronouncing the formula of his abdication, he performed a last act of authority, and published three bulls, which annulled the decree made by Eugenius the Fourth and Nicholas, against the council of Basle.

The schism was terminated by the withdrawal of Felix, and Nicholas the Fifth was recognised as sole chief of the church. But Amadeus of Savoy did not long enjoy his delightful retreat of Ripaille; he died from indigestion, on the 28th of February, 1452, less than a year after these events.

This was the same year which the constitution of Clement the Sixth indicated for the celebration of the jubilee, the handsomest financeering operation that the popes had invented. His holiness had neglected nothing calculated to increase the solemnity of the festival, and attract the faithful to Rome; and for this purpose, he had sent circulars into all Christian kingdoms, promising indulgences to pilgrims who should come to offer presents to St. Peter, and to recite prayers in the three principal churches of the apostolic city.

Among the lords whom the superstition of the times attracted to Rome, was remarked an old man of eighty years, named the count of Cilley. "He had great need of indulgences," says Æneas Sylvius, "for his long career was filled with crimes and infamies; he had strangled his wife with his own hands, because she had refused to abandon herself to horrible plays with one of his mistresses; he had carried off a prodigious number of women, young girls, and boys, whom he kept confined in his seraglio; and he was, besides, the leader of a band of robbers and forgers. Although it appears that he made this journey to be converted," says the historian, "he returned no better, and one day, when his bishop asked him, what motive he had in undertaking a pilgrimage, since he had no intention of changing his conduct, he replied to him, 'I do like my shoemaker, he went to Rome, and on his return commenced making boots again.'"

This jubilee, commenced under prosperous auspices, terminated very sadly. One night when the faithful, who had been present to receive the blessing of the pope in the church of St. Peter, were leaving it, several arches of the bridge San Angelo suddenly broke, and a large number of victims were swallowed up or crushed.

In the beginning of the following year, Constantine Paleologus sent ambassadors to Rome, to renew the proposition which the Greeks had so often made, to reunite with the Latin church, provided his holiness would arm against the Turks, and would raise the siege of Constantinople, which was blockaded by the infidel.

Nicholas, according to Father Maimburg, received the envoys of the emperor with great haughtiness, and made this reply to them:—

"Go tell your prince, that the Greeks have sported long enough with the patience of God and men, in seeking by false promises to abuse the equity of the pontiff: We know full well you would deceive us now, still we will not be more severe than Christ, and according to the language of the gospel, we will wait three years to see if the fig tree which the popes have cultivated, will at last produce any fruit; after this delay the tree shall be cut up from the roots, or rather the Greek nation shall be entirely dispersed by the executors of the decree of divine justice."

The Greeks protested their good intentions, but uselessly, and they were obliged to return to their country without other aid than sterile vows.

His holiness evinced the best dispositions towards the young duke of Savoy, the son Amadeus, and from gratitude that the father had yielded to him the tiara, he published the following bull: "We grant to the duke of Savoy, as long as his dominions shall persevere in their obedience to the Holy See, the right of designating the subjects whom he would elevate to the function of abbot, metropolitan, or bishop, or even the inferior dignities, so that no promotion made in the government of the church, or of monasteries, may trouble the peace of his kingdom." This bull has been ever since a subject of continual discord between Savoy and the Roman church.

Towards the close of the year 1451, Frederick informed the holy father, that in accordance with their secret arrangements, he was preparing to come into Italy to receive the crown in the church of the apostle. He, in fact, caused Albert, duke of Austria, to precede him immediately with a considerable body of cavalry, and he himself crossed the mountains with all his nobility of Germany and Bohemia. His train was so numerous that the Italians said loudly, that the emperor was advancing into their provinces rather as an enemy who came to subdue them, than as a prince who came humbly to seek a crown. Nicholas foresaw that he must dread the consequences of an entrance into Italy of a powerful, bold, and ambitious sovereign; they even read in full consistory the prophecies which announced, that in the year 1452 a tyrant of the German race would seize on Rome, and behead the pontiff on the porch of St. Peter, which so alarmed him that he sent orders to his legates in Germany, to prevent the journey of the emperor by every possible means; he wrote with his own hand to the emperor, to induce him to put off the journey until the winter was over, on account, as he said, of the bad state of the roads, and that he might have time to collect provisions for his escort, and to prepare the festivals at his coronation. The pope, at the same time, commanded Æneas Sylvius, who was then at Sienna, to come immediately to Rome to confer with him about the coronation of the emperor; but the latter, who had always shown hostility to the Roman See, refused to obey him: he replied to Nicholas, that he had received orders to wait for the empress at the port of Talamona, in Tuscany, to accompany her to Rome, and that he had better not retard the coronation of Frederick, if he did not wish to expose himself to the danger of losing his tiara.

Frederick, without paying any regard to the letters of the holy father, continued his march, and went towards Florence; five bishops and two archbishops came to receive him at the gates of the city, and accompanied him as far as Sienna, where he found the empress Eleonora with her court. Twelve cardinals awaited him in this last city, to receive his oath that he would undertake nothing hostile to the Holy See, and to conduct him to Rome.

Nicholas received the emperor with the ceremonial usual on these occasions; he himself installed him in a magnificent palace, and, to do him more honour, put off his coronation until the anniversary of his exaltation, that he might make of their two consecrations a solemn festival. Frederick, in the interim, solicited a bull of anathema against the Austrians. Æneas Sylvius relates at length, the reasons which prevailed on his holiness to issue a sentence of excommunication against his enemies. "It was," says the historian, "an ancient custom of the house of Austria, from which Frederick and Prince Ladislaus were sprung, on the death of an emperor to confide the guardianship of his children to the seniors of the family until their majority. In accordance with this usage Frederick had taken the reins of government, on the death of his uncle Albert, who left his wife eniente.

"In every way the prince hoped he would not be compelled to lay down again the sovereign power; if the empress was delivered of a girl, the sceptre passed into his hands; if she brought a male child into the world, he was of right his guardian; and it was well known how little it costs a regent to put out of the way a pupil, who is an obstacle to his ambition. The princess at last gave birth to a son, named Ladislaus, whom she was obliged to confide to Frederick, surrendering to him the government of Austria.

"Frederick at once pretended to have a fatherly care for his pupil; he affirmed that he had given fiefs to the nobles, not to attach them to his cause, but because they had deserved well of their country; that he had placed honest and vigilant magistrates in the cities; that he had built impregnable forts on the frontiers; that he had driven off the enemies who were ravaging the dominions of the young Ladislaus, and had even paid out of his own treasures seventy thousand crowns of gold, which were due to the soldiers.

"Now," added the emperor, 'the ungrateful people revolt against my authority, under pretext that they no longer owe me obedience, since my pupil has attained his majority: they accuse me of having brought Ladislaus into Italy to put him to death the more surely; and it is those very Hungarians who are accustomed to kill their kings; men and children; who judge of my sentiments, by their own. During the twelve whole years that Ladislaus has been under my guardianship, could I not have found a favourable occasion to rid myself of him, if his death were necessary to my ambitious views? On the contrary, I have always desired a long life for him, and never have dreamed of ravishing his inheritance from him.

"If I have brought my pupil into Italy, it is to show him Rome, and to instruct him in the manners of a foreign people; it is that he may become informed by listening to your holiness, and the wise men of your sacred senate; I wish him to learn from you how to govern his people, and to receive your blessing. You see, holy father, that my veneration for your person is the principal cause of the revolt of the Austrians; let us then unite our arms against the rebels, and strike at once with the spiritual and temporal sword."

Nicholas, flattered that so great a prince professed so much respect for the Holy See, promised him to send legates at once into Austria, to threaten the people with the most terrible anathemas, and to place the provinces under interdict, if the people and lords did not within forty days return under the rule of Frederick. This step did not, however, fulfil the wishes of the tyrant, for he added: "Do you think, holy father, that these people, who do not believe in God, will dread your censures? The Austrians are baptized when young, and as soon as they become men they make a mock of baptism. Besides, it is useless to dissimulate longer; I ask from you a bull of excommunication, to have a pretext for exterminating them, and I pledge myself to divide the spoils of these heretics with you."

His holiness had no more objections to make, and hastened to fulminate a bull of anathema against the Austrians, Moravians, and Hungarians. They did not remain inactive, but formed a powerful league against the emperor, and prepared for war. The decrees of the court of Rome were publicly burned in the cities of Salzburg, Vienna, Passaw, and Olmutz; the priests even preached a crusade against the pope and the emperor, and pointed them out to the vengeance of the people.

Things were in this state when an event took place which, from its importance, arrested all minds, and stopped, in a moment, the embittered strife of the different parties: the bulwark of Christendom, the rival of Rome, Constantinople, fell into the power of the Musselmen, and Mohammed the Second put an end to the great empire.

This caliph was the son of Amurath the Second, whom the Musselmen count as the eighth from the prophet, and governed the powerful empire of the Ottoman since the year 1451. On the death of his father, Mohammed the Second lived on the best understanding with the Greek emperor Constantine Paleologus; he had even confided the custody of his uncle Orcan to him, but his want of promptness in paying the pension which he had promised for the support of his uncle, excited demands too animated from Paleologus, who had the impudence to threaten the young sultan to send him back his prisoner.

Mohammed the Second, instead of giving satisfaction to the emperor, declared himself grievously offended at his proceedings. He marched on Constantinople with a numerous army, which he installed in a small borough, two leagues from the city; his camp extended along the whole northern shore of the Bosphorus, and was, besides, defended by a powerful artillery, among which was the famous piece which threw bullets of six hundred pounds weight, more than two thousand yards. In this way the entrance to the Black sea was entirely closed, and all intercourse with Constantinople, from without, intercepted. To take away from the Greeks their last resource, the sultan invested the places they possessed on the borders of the Black sea, on the banks of the Propontus, or in Thrace. He, at the same time, attacked the cities which remained to them in the Peloponnesus, and carried them without striking a blow; Sparta alone, which was defended by good walls, resisted the Turks, and only surrendered after a siege of ten months. At length, in the third year of the reign of Mohammed the Second, Constantinople, besieged by a land force of three hundred thousand men, composed of Turks, Germans, Greeks, Hungarians, Poles, and Latins, and blockaded, by sea, by a fleet of an hundred and twenty sail, was carried by storm, after a bombardment of fifty-five days. This event took place on the 29th of May, 1453.

Thus terminated the empire founded by Constantine, after an existence of eleven centuries and a half. The implacable policy of the popes triumphed; the rival of Rome existed no longer; what mattered it to Nicholas to have sacrificed to the interests of his see, even the blood of Christ!

Still, the Greek religion was not annihilated. Mohammed permitted the free exercise of their religion to the conquered; he gave them one half of the churches, and a solemn investiture to the patriarch Germadus, according to the custom of the Greek emperors, which consisted in presenting to the titular a cap with a veil, a cloak with bands, a magnificent Arab courser, and a pastoral baton. The caliph gave up to him the church of the apostles as a cathedral, and permitted him to transform the rich monastery of the Virgin of Summacrista into a patriarchal palace.

The capture of Constantinople was a still more terrible blow to Frederick, as it gave him the redoubtable Mohammed the Second for a neighbour; he therefore hastened to suspend his war against the Hungarians, and to bring about negotiations with the court of Rome, to induce the pope and sacred college to preach a crusade against the Turks.

But his holiness was too much occupied in his own states, to think of succouring his allies effectively. A Roman knight, named Stephen Porcario, was traversing the principal cities of the patrimony of St. Peter, calling the people to arms, and exciting them to break the yoke of the pope. At the instigation of this courageous tribune, a vast conspiracy was organised, the day was fixed, the party distributed, and the conspirators were to seize the persons of the pontiff and the cardinals, on the day of the Epiphany, at the moment when Nicholas was celebrating divine service in the church of St. Peter, when, unfortunately, on the eve of the execution a traitor revealed the plot. Soldiers were sent against the conspirators, and invested the house in which they were assembled. A bloody combat followed. Porcario was arrested, after having received seven wounds; his companions fell into the power of the Holy See, and Baptiste Sciécra alone escaped. Eleven of the conspirators were decapitated in the capitol; twenty others were hung to the gates of the city; fifteen more were burned alive, and Porcario was nailed to a cross on the walls of the castle of San Angelo.

These bloody executions over, tranquillity was restored to Rome, and the pope was enabled to employ himself in organizing a general crusade against the Turks. As he thought the king of Arragon alone capable of conducting this expedition, he sent to him the cardinal Dominic Capranico, one of the most distinguished prelates of the court of Rome, to offer him the title of generalissimo of the confederated forces. At the same time he convened a congress at Frankford, that the northern princes might arrange the contingency of troops which each was to furnish.

This assembly was actively engaged in the preparations for the war against the Turks, when Pope Nicholas died suddenly, in the night of the 24th of March, 1455, from an attack of gout. He was interred in the church of St. Peter.

Some ecclesiastical historians exalt the qualities and virtues of Nicholas; but conscientious historians only say he was one of the best of the bad popes.

CALIXTUS THE THIRD THE TWO HUNDRED AND SEVENTEENTH POPE.

[A. D. 1455.]

Election of Alphonso Borgia—He wishes to follow up Nicholas' plans of a crusade—Orders public prayers against the Turks—Remarkable decree of the parliament of Paris, which refuses subsidies for this enterprise—Crusade against the Moors of Spain—Dissensions between the holy father and the king of Arragon—Calixtus pretends to arm galleys to combat the Turks, and levies tithes on all the Christian kingdoms—Opposition of Germany and France to this fiscal measure—Abuse of the employment of the tithes—Calixtus wishes to give the kingdom of Naples to his nephew, Peter Borgia—Death of the pontiff.

DURING the obsequies of Nicholas the Fifth, which, according to custom, lasted nine days, the old cardinal Alphonso Borgia spread about every where a prediction of Saint Vincent Ferrer, which promised him the papacy; and his confidence in this prophecy was so great that he had already chosen the name he would take after his exaltation, and had contracted diocese engagements, among others that of persecuting the Turks with spiritual and temporal arms.

As this prelate was more than a septuagenarian, and the irregularities of his life had altered his moral faculties, the cardinals thought he had relapsed into childhood, and would scarcely admit him among them when the sacred college assembled. Things, however, went so in the conclave, that the election which had been thought impossible was realised. None of the cardinals who were intriguing for the supreme authority, having been able to obtain a majority, all gave their voices for the old Borgia, whom they thought would not cause them to wait long for a new conclave. He was enthroned by the name of Calixtus the Third, which he had chosen in advance, and received the adoration of the faithful, after having undergone the proofs of the pierced chair.

Alphonso Borgia was born in Spain, and if we are to judge of his family by what Alphonso of Arragon said of it in one of his letters, we must conclude it to have been one of the lowest; the young Spaniard had been created a canon by Benedict the Thirteenth; Martin the Fifth had afterwards given him the see of Valencia, and the hat of a cardinal. Become pope, he followed the path marked out by his predecessors, and endeavoured to extract the utmost possible from his authority, to advance his own ambition and that of his family. He at first appointed his two nephews, Peter and Roderigo, cardinals, though the one was but twenty-one, and the other twenty-five years old; then, as these young men were not satisfied with that eminent dignity, he gave to Peter the post of treasurer, and to Roderigo the legation of the March of Ancona, with the title of vice-chancellor of the Holy See.

After having elevated his favourites to the highest dignities of the church, it remained to provide for their expenses, and as the treasury was empty, he thought of filling it, and preached a crusade against the Turks. At his command legions of monks spread themselves through the different kingdoms of Europe, and under pretext of seeking for soldiers, they explored all the provinces, cities, and boroughs, laid the inhabitants under exactions, sold to them indulgences and absolutions, and drew from them such enormous sums, that the cellars of the Vatican were none too large to contain them.

There appeared a comet at this time which alarmed all minds. His holiness took advantage of the superstitious panic to sell new indulgences. Finally, when he thought that the mine was exhausted, he recalled his monks, and in return for all the gold he had taken from the faithful, he gave them the institution of the Angelus, which consisted in reciting the Lord's prayer and the angelic salutation, morning, midday, and night, when the bells rang. Platinus gravely affirms that the Christians owed several victories to the efficacy of these prayers, and among others that which the celebrated John Corvin Huniades, Vayvode of Transylvania, gained over the Muselmén before Belgrade.

In addition to the voluntary impost of indulgences, Calixtus still wished to levy a forced impost of dimes; but his bull encountered an active opposition in Germany and France, where the parliament of Paris interfered to protect the immunities of the kingdom. This assembly had already, in a previous matter, evinced hostility to the court of Rome, and had seized the property of William of Malatroit, bishop of Nancy, because he had appealed to the Holy See from an ordinance of Charles the Seventh's. On this occasion the learned chamber had made the following decree:—

"We declare the prelate guilty of violating the fundamental laws of the state, which prohibit appeals to the court of Rome; considering that the king holds his crown from God alone, and that he is not answerable in temporal matters to any power on the earth; although the Holy See has the canonical right to excommunicate the prince, we declare that it has no power to deprive him of his kingdom, or to give it to the first ambitious man who would seize it, nor to free his subjects from their oath of fidelity; we finally decide that the rights of the sovereign can only be pleaded before his own court; that prelates cannot erase his ordinances through the popes, and that they cannot even quit the kingdom without his authority."

The university also protested with energy against the bull of tithes; and notwithstanding the flatteries which the holy father lavished on the French for their military courage, it was decreed that no lord should arm against the Turks until after the revocation of the impost.

In Germany, the complaints excited by the avidity of Calixtus, were still more lively. All the electors of the empire went in a body to Frederick, to cause him to execute in all its force, the concordat, which protected the nation against the violence of the officers of the apostolic treasury.

In Spain even his exactions also irritated Alphonso of Arragon, and as his sway was strengthened in Italy by the double marriage of his grandchildren, the prince of Capua and the princess Eleonora, with the son and daughter of Francis Sforza, duke of Milan, he threatened to retire from the obedience of Rome.

Instead of seeking to return into the good graces of the king of Arragon, the ambitious Calixtus, who wanted the crown of Naples for his nephew, Peter Borgia, endeavoured to thwart the plans of Alphonso, and refused him the investiture of the kingdom of Sicily, which the king demanded for Ferdinand, his natural son, and the vicariates of Terracinum and Beneventum, which he demanded for two of his other bastards.

Matters went so far that the prince wrote to his holiness a letter, which has descended to us, and in which he lashed, in energetic terms, the infamous morals of Calixtus, and his insatiable cupidity. He reproached him with the baseness of his birth, and the disgraceful means to which he had recourse to elevate himself; he unveils the horrid mysteries of lubricity which took place in his family; he accuses him of entertaining relations, reproved by men, with his nephews, whom he maintains were the fruits of an incest with his own sister, and finishes by swearing implacable hatred against him. In fact, Alphonso commenced intriguing against the pope, and sent to solicit Henry the Feeble, king of Castile, and the other princes of Spain, to abandon the communion of the infamous Borgia.

To prevent the fatal consequences of these measures, Calixtus sent to Madrid a legate and three monks, commissioned to compliment Henry on the victory he had gained over the Moors, and to offer him a casque adorned with gold chasings, and a sword whose sheath was ornamented with precious stones. This embassy arrived at the court of Castile on Easter eve, and immediately presented to the prince letters, filled with servile adulations and magnificent predictions. Henry, like all kings, vain and superstitious, listened to the flatteries of the Roman priests with great joy, and commanded a solemn service in his cathedral on the next day, in order to thank God for the victories which he announced to him through his vicar; but his happiness was of short duration, and events soon occurred which gave the pope the lie. During the celebration of the mass a courier brought despatches to the prince, which informed him of the complete route of the Castilian army, and the captivity of his general, the Count de Castaneda.

In France, the indignation against Calixtus was at its height, and even the clergy were ranged in hostility to the court of Rome, since the publication of a bull which gave to the mendicant monks the right of confessing the faithful at a discount, and permitted them to enter into a formidable rivalry with the curates in the sale of indulgences. The university of Paris mixed itself in the dispute, took the side of the priests, and prohibited the monks from using the bulls of the pope, and from confessing. The latter, having refused to obey this injunction, were excluded from the bosom of the university; they then referred it to Calixtus, who erased the decrees and proceedings of the doctors. The university, notwithstanding the decision of the pope, persisted in its conduct, and obtained an ordinance from the king, which prohibited the mendicant monks from confessing the faithful, if they did not wish to be driven like beggars from the kingdom.

It was in vain that Germany uttered its complaints against the Holy See; Frederick permitted the pillage of his subjects, to divide the spoils with Calixtus. Still, these complaints taught his holiness that it was impolitic to take too much money, under a pretext of an armament against the Turks, and not make some preparations for war in reality; he consequently armed eleven galleys, which he placed under the command of the patriarch of Aquileia. The instructions to the admiral expressly prohibited him from compromising the safety of the flotilla; thus the prudent mariner contented himself with making a voyage to the island of Rhodes, which was one of the dependencies of the Holy See.

This ridiculous expedition made a great noise in Europe; the legates pretended that it had exhausted the resources of the apostolic treasury, and demanded from the kings a second levy of dimes, offering to divide with them the profits of this new impost. Such a proposition could not be but agreeable to the oppressors of the people; thus Henry of Castile, Christian of Denmark, the king of France, the emperor of Germany, and the other monarchs who then reigned, hastened to admit the collectors of Calixtus within their kingdoms. The king of Arragon alone refused to authorise the exactions of the Roman court.

This prince still pursued his plans of vengeance against Calixtus, and before marching on Rome, he made a cruel war on the small republics, whom he wished to detach from the cause of his enemy. But the Borgias did not give him time to execute his evil designs, and he died of poison before the walls of Genoa, which he was besieging.

As soon as his death was known at Rome, the pope issued a bull, which declared the Holy See to be the absolute disposer of the crown of Naples, so that the will of Alphonso, which gave this kingdom to his natural son Ferdinand, should be declared null, as trespassing on divine and human laws. He terminated this singular decree by giving the investiture of the Neapolitan kingdom to Peter Borgia, his nephew, whom he had already created duke of Spoleto, prohibiting Ferdinand to take the title of king, under penalty of excommunication. Instead of obeying his holiness, the new king of Naples prepared to levy an army, and march on Rome to depose his enemy, and was preceded by a violent manifesto, in which he thus expressed himself:—"I respect the dignity of pope, but I despise the person of Calixtus; I fear neither his anathemas, poisons, nor arms; I hold the kingdom of Naples by the kindness of my father, the consent of the lords, that of the cities and people, and I will keep it."

A furious war appeared to be imminent, when the death of the pontiff fortunately changed the course of events. On the 6th of August, 1458, Calixtus yielded to an attack of the gout, and left his immense wealth to his infamous nephews, Peter Borgia and Rodrigo his brother, who afterwards used them to purchase the tiara.

PIUS THE SECOND, THE TWO HUNDRED AND EIGHTEENTH POPE.

[A. D. 1458.]

Election of Pius the Second—History of Æneas Sylvius before his pontificate—He orders a levy of dimes, under pretence of a war against the Turks—Gives the investiture of the kingdom of Naples to Ferdinand—Council of Mantua—Quarrel of the holy father with the French—He calls the celebrated Scanderberg to his assistance against the French—Decree of the pope against appeals to councils—Differences with the kings of Europe concerning the collation of benefices—Embassies to the sovereigns—Abolition of the pragmatic sanction in France—Letter of the pope to Mohammed the Second—Letter of Louis the Eleventh to the holy father—Knaveries of Louis the Eleventh and Pius the Second—Cowardly retraction of the holy father—Death of Pius.

As soon as the funeral of the pope was over, twenty-one cardinals entered into conclave in the palace of St. Peter; but, before commencing the ballot, they swore, that he among them who should obtain the papacy, should not grant, without the consent of a majority of the sacred college, the right to elevate to cathedral or collegiate churches, or to confer monasteries, or other benefices, on any prince or prelate, of whatsoever condition or quality they were, imperial, royal, ducal, archiepiscopal or abbatial; that he should revoke the bulls before made on this subject; amongst others, that of Nicholas the Fifth, in favour of the duke of Savoy. This done, the intrigues commenced, and after a struggle of twelve days, Æneas Sylvius finished by carrying it over his rivals, and was proclaimed pope on the 27th of August, 1458.

Bessarion, who was one of those most hostile to Æneas Sylvius, and who feared the consequences of a sacerdotal vengeance, endeavoured to allay the storm by addressing to him a congratulatory discourse. "Holy father," he said, "we all feel sincere joy at your exaltation; if we at first opposed your election, it was for the sake of your health, and a desire to allow you to avoid the fatigue which accompanies the supreme dignity. It appeared to us that, in the midst of the perils in which the church was, there was needed on the throne of the apostle an active, young, and vigorous priest, more capable of sustaining the fatigues of camps, than of presiding in councils. Your infirmities alone prevented us from giving you our votes; since it has pleased the Holy Spirit to grant you the tiara, we hope it will give you at the same time the strength necessary to support its weight, and we beseech you to lay, on our interest for your personal welfare, the fault which we have committed in sustaining any other candidate than you." Æneas replied to this speech:—"You judge me too favourably, my brothers, since you only reproach me with corporeal infirmities; I consider myself unworthy of the honour which has been conferred upon me, and were I not fearful of offending the Holy Spirit, which has manifested its will by uniting upon me the voices of two-thirds of the sacred college, I would refuse the sovereign power of the church; but since God has given me the tiara, I accept it; be not disquieted; I know the purity of your intentions, and be assured I will treat you according to your merits." These words, which might have a double meaning, did not entirely reassure the cardinals of the opposite party; they were, however, obliged to be contented.

According to the historian of the conclaves, the joy which the election of Æneas Sylvius caused, was so great at Rome, that the people, who were divided into two camps, and were fighting in the streets on the very evening of the election, laid aside their arms as if by enchantment. "The apostolic city," he adds, "resembled, some hours before, a place abandoned to pillage; it suddenly took the aspect of a festival. Instead of blood, it was wine which was flowing through the streets; tables were spread in the public squares; the clashing of swords, and cries of war, were replaced by the sound of musical instruments; the whole population went to dancing. This enthusiasm was not confined to Rome; the other Italian cities, and Sienna in particular, of which Æneas was bishop, manifested a joy approaching to madness."

Æneas Sylvius Piccolomini was a Tuscan by birth, and the son of an unfortunate outlaw, who gained his living by the sweat of his brow. It is related, that Victoria Forteguerra, his mother, being large of him, had a dream, in which her child appeared with his head covered with a mitre. As it was then the fashion to place a paper bonnet on the head of the clergy when they conducted them to execution, she argued from it that her son would be the disgrace and dishonour of his family. The disorders of his early youth did but confirm the opinions of his mother; for Æneas abandoned himself, when still a child, to the vilest practices, and became a minion of all the priests of the neighbourhood.

That which should have ruined him, was the cause of his elevation; among his corrupters was an abbot who conceived a great affection for him, and took him into his convent. He there devoted himself to study, and elevated himself by his genius, into the rank of the most learned men of the age. The cardinal Dominic Capranico afterwards attached him to his service, and took him with him to the council of Basle, at which he filled the post of secretary for ten entire years, with remarkable skill and courage. All the energetic measures undertaken against the popes were brought forward by him, who did not then foresee that he would one day occupy the chair of St. Peter, and would have to defend that execrable theocracy which he now attacked so vigorously. After the dissolution of the council of Basle, Pope Felix the Fifth took him for his secretary, and when he abdicated, Frederick the Third offered him the same post about his person; the emperor afterwards made him his intimate counsellor, honoured him with the poetic crown, and confided several embassies to him. Finally, Nicholas the Fifth promoted him to the see of Sienna, and Calixtus gave him a cardinal's hat.

His advent to the pontifical throne was received in different ways by the courts of Europe. France, Scotland, Denmark, Poland, and Hungary, with the cities of Venice and Florence, disapproved of his election. On the other hand, the emperor of Germany, the dukes of Milan and Modena, and Ferdinand of Sicily, testified their satisfaction, and sent ambassadors to Rome to congratulate the new pontiff.

Pius the Second commenced the exercise of his authority, by selling the investiture of the kingdom of Naples to the bastard of King Alphonso, to the prejudice of René of Anjou, and his son John, duke of Calabria, receiving therefor six hundred thousand crowns of gold, and the grant of the duchy of Amalfi to Antonio Piccolomini, his nephew, to whom Ferdinand gave one of his sisters in marriage, and the intendency-general of justice in the kingdoms of Naples and Sicily. After having established the fortune of his nephew on a solid basis, he commenced walking in the footsteps of his predecessors, to fill the apostolical treasury, which had been already emptied by the Borgias on the death of their uncle. The pretext which he employed for ransacking the people, was again the announcement of a crusade against the Turks. He convened a general council at Mantua, for the 1st of June, 1469, and invited all the kings to be present at it, and especially Charles the Seventh, whom he called the defender of the Christian religion. His bulls of convocation went to the Christian princes by skilful legates, who knew how to obtain from them authority to levy tenths on the people submitted to their sway.

All these preliminaries being finished, his holiness left Rome on the 1st of February, leaving the spiritual government of the city to the cardinal of Cusa, and the temporal command to the prince Colonna, with a council of cardinals, auditors of rote, and advocates to form the apostolic court, as if he had been present, and that matters should not suffer from his absence. He even made a decree prohibiting the sacred college from assembling any where but at Rome, if God should take his life during his journey; he then started for Mantua, where he found assembled already, ambassadors, prelates, princes, and kings.

His holiness opened the council in a long speech, in which he exposed pathetically the fall of the Christian religion in the east; then made a long enumeration of the provinces which the infidels had taken from the Christians, and finished by this address:—"If the public calamities do not touch your souls, princes and kings, dread, at least, the evils which threaten you personally; think of guarding by a holy league from the opprobrium, servitude, and death with which each of you is menaced in his isolation. Do not forget that you have to combat a formidable enemy, whose audacity is exalted by numerous victories. Each of you is too feeble to contend singly against him; but if you will unite your strength you will overthrow him, for God will bless the swords of the Christians. Recall the glorious exploits of the faithful in Syria; let the courage of the ancient knights animate you; abandon your wives, your children; fear not to give your treasures, and to shed your blood to assure the triumph of the faith! Shame to the cowards and the indolents who refuse to fight. Princes, who among you presents himself as the chief of this holy war, to raise up the cross and cast down the crescent. to re-establish in the east Christ dethroned by the prophet? Let him advance . . ." and as all remained silent he continued: "You are then all cowards! I myself will lead the crusaders; I will take the sacred standard in one hand, Christ in the other, and I will place myself at the head of the legions. If heaven does not grant me victory, my blood shall appease the wrath of the God of armies."

Loud applause resounded through the council and drowned the voice of the warlike pontiff. "We accept you as our leader," they exclaimed on all sides, "let us march against the infidel." For a moment Pius feared lest he had passed the end he proposed to attain, and would find himself obliged to go on the crusade. Fortunately for him, those who had applauded his words with so much enthusiasm, were not disposed to follow him in such an enterprise, and restricted themselves on all sides to treat of the levy of new tenths. Some eastern sovereigns, who were strangers to the trickery of the court of Rome, alone regarded the thing as serious. David, emperor of Trebizond, Uzun Hassan, king of Armenia, and George, who called himself king of Persia, engaged to furnish cavalry and infantry, and a well equipped fleet for the crusade.

After the public session, the ambassadors of Charles the Seventh demanded a private audience, which was granted to them at once. The bailiff of Rouen reminded his holiness of the services which the kings of France had rendered to his predecessors; he complained bitterly that he had forgotten that the brother of St. Louis had formerly received the investiture of the kingdom of Naples from the court of Rome, and that consequently he was not permitted to sell it to the bastard of Alphonso; he finished his remonstrances by threatening Pius with the vengeance of the king, if he did not revoke his former decision. The pope replied to this, that he had acted with the advice of his cardinals, and that he could not, without consulting them, annul a deliberation of the sacred college; then, to conceal the embarrassment in which he was, for good excuses for his conduct, he feigned to be taken with a fit of coughing, and dismissed the ambassadors. The bailiff of Rouen was not the dupe of this trick; as soon as the holy father had left the hall of audience, he spread injurious reports concerning him in the presence of his officers, and swore vengeance on the traitor who had sold his conscience to the enemies of France.

These threats were immediately transmitted to Pius, who, on his side, determined to create embarrassments for Charles the Seventh, to prevent his hurting him. He abolished the pragmatic sanction, which was observed in the kingdom, and required the French to furnish an army of a hundred thousand men to combat the infidels. Thanks to the energetic opposition of the bailiff of Rouen, who showed that it was impossible for the king of France to raise so large a number of troops, when he was at war with Great Britain, the holy father was compelled to relax from his pretensions, and be content with a tax of six hundred thousand florins of gold for the expenses of the crusade. The bailiff of Rouen could not reduce this sum; in vain did he observe to the cardinals that France was ruined, and that for six years the Holy See had not ceased to levy tithes on its provinces;

all his protests were useless, and as his harangue was taking the tone of a menace, Pius interrupted him shortly, and declared to him that he knew how to reduce a rebellious kingdom to obedience, which found resources to carry on war with Christians, and which was incapable of making the least sacrifice to avenge religion. "Dread my wrath," added he, "for if I wish it, in a month Genoa, Modena, Florence, and even Naples, will rise against the French and drive them out of Italy."

To realise this prophecy, the pontiff called into Italy the celebrated king of Albania, George Castriot, surnamed Scanderberg, under pretext of bringing back the Neapolitans, who were in full revolt against King Ferdinand, to their duty, who had driven him from his capital, ranged themselves with the party of the duke of Anjou, at the head of which was found all the Neapolitan nobility, and even his brother-in-law, Marcian, duke of Sanguesa, and Antonio Caldora, prince of Tarentum. Scanderberg, obedient to the orders of his holiness, disembarked at Ragusa, and went by forced marches to Barletta, to the aid of King Ferdinand, who was closely blockaded in that place. On the approach of this redoubtable foe, the French raised the siege and encamped under the walls of Nocera; the king of Albania pursued the fugitives, overtook them in a vast plain, and brought them to action at the foot of Mount Segian. There took place a terrible battle between the Albanians and the troops of René of Anjou; the latter was cut to pieces, and the hopes of the Angevin party for ever annihilated. All the cities of the kingdom of Naples, which still held for the French, immediately submitted, and Ferdinand returned in triumph to his capital.

Pius the Second, wishing to profit by the preponderance which this victory gave him in Italy, to affirm his sway over the people, decreed that popes were above all the princes of the earth, and that their omnipotence extended even over councils, which could in no case judge or depose the supreme chief of the church.

"There has crept in among us," said the holy father in his bull, "an execrable abuse, that of appealing from the judgments and actions of the Roman pontiff to general councils. Those who approve of such measures, forget, or wish to be ignorant, that the vicar of Christ alone, has power to bind and loose in heaven and earth, and that during his life, he can, at his pleasure, dispose of thrones, riches, the liberty and lives of men.

"Desirous then of removing from the church the dangerous poison of those rebellious opinions, with the advice and consent of our venerable brethren the cardinals, in the name of our infallible authority, we condemn appeals to councils, we reprove them as useless, erroneous, and dangerous, and we order that in future, all shall be prohibited from appealing from our see or from citing a pope before an assembly of prelates. If any one, after the publication of this bull, shall contravene our decrees, be he king, prince, bishop, or mere layman, we declare him excommunicated until death. The same censures shall be equally incurred by universities and colleges."

When they were informed in France of this edict, they thought that the holy father had no other intention than to use it as a pretext to lay an interdict upon the kingdom.—The council of the king immediately instructed John Dauvet, advocate-general of the parliament, to draw up a protest against the encroachments of the court of Rome, and to summon Pius to revoke his bull concerning appeals, as subversive of the ancient canons and the pragmatic sanction, and in case he persisted in his detestable doctrines, to threaten him with the convocation of a general council.

Some days after the promulgation of this ordinance, Pius determined to dissolve the synod of Mantua, but before doing so, he resumed in a long discourse the negotiations for the crusade, with the different people of Christendom, and demanded new subsidies to bring the war against the infidel to a successful issue.

"Know, my brethren," he said, in the close of his discourse, "that the emperor of Germany promises an army of forty-two thousand men; the duke of Burgundy six thousand veteran soldiers; the clergy of Italy, always excepting that of Venice, Genoa, and Florence, engages to give us the tenth of its possessions; the laymen have imposed a thirtieth on their revenues; the Jews a twentieth; the city of Ragusa alone gives two galleys; the Isle of Rhodes furnishes four, and we hope even to see rallying to our holy enterprise France, Castile, Portugal, Arragon, England, Scotland, Denmark, Sweden, Norway, Poland, and Bohemia, who have refused us until now succours in men and money. Thus then, my brethren, go in peace to your homes, recount the great things which have been done in this sacred council, and above all do not forget to expedite to our apostolic chamber the tithes for the crusade."

From Mantua his holiness went to Sienna, where he received a solemn embassy from the patriarchs of Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem, and one from several cities of the Peloponesus, which offered to submit to him if he would furnish them with garrisons against the Turks.

Elevated by all his successes, the pope supposed that nothing could resist him, and gave free scope to his ambition. At first he appointed to the bishoprics of Castile and Portugal, Italian prelates, his creatures, without even consulting the sovereigns of those countries; and as they wished to remonstrate, he excommunicated them and went on. He then started for Rome, escorted by an army of banditti recruited in Upper Italy, and whom he wished to use to restore to their reason the inhabitants of the holy city, who had proclaimed the republic, and dragged his standard in the mud.

He had no difficulty in overcoming a population destitute of any provisions. After eight days of open siege, he forced one of the gates of Rome, and installed himself in the Vatican, he then proceeded to a massacre of the insurgents. By his orders the pupils of the schools and a prodigious number of citizens were bound hand and foot in his presence, and pitilessly murdered; all their possessions were confiscated to the Holy See, and their families exiled. Among these martyrs to liberty was Tiburcius, a son of the generous Massian, one of those whom Nicholas the Fifth had hung at the gate of the capital, with the tribune Porcario.

These executions over Rome became calm, and reposed in the silence of death from its passed agitations. The holy father continued his course of infamies; he excommunicated the duke of Austria and Sigismund Malatesta; the first, because he had imprisoned the cardinal of Cusa, who wished to levy dimes without his authority; and the latter, because he had formerly refused to pay a tax to the Roman church. He employed the same rigorous means against Dichter, the metropolitan of Mayence, who was unwilling to pay the annates of his archbishopric. But the bulls produced no effect; the three excommunicated princes did not open the strings of their purse, and appealed from the anathemas of the pope to a future council.

Pius having failed on this side, renewed his efforts on France, and solicited, through the cardinal D'Alby, from Louis the Eleventh, who had succeeded Charles the Seventh, the abolition of the pragmatic sanction. The bishop of Balue, who was then all-powerful with the monarch, opposed the adoption of this measure, and represented to the nuncio, in energetic terms, that it was disgraceful to his holiness to seek to overthrow the work of his own hands, since the pragmatic sanction was but an expression of the sentiments which animated the council of Basle, and which Pius the Second had brought forward, sustained and defended against Eugenius the Fourth. His indignation led him even to say, that if the pope dared to renew this subject, he would cause him to be declared a schismatic, and would unveil to the gaze of Christendom, "that the papacy transforms the most holy prelates into knavish, avaricious, cruel, and implacable tyrants."

Despairing of conquering by arguments the opposition of Balue, the wary cardinal determined to bribe him, and offered him a large sum with a cardinal's hat. The bishop, who loved money and honours, immediately changed his tone; from being the defender of the pragmatic sanction he became one of its bitterest detractors. He represented to Louis the Eleventh, that after having profoundly studied the question, he had discovered that he could not give the name of law to the regulations decreed by an irregular assembly; he threatened the bigot king with excommunication by the Holy See, and extracted from him a promise of revocation. But when he presented it to the parliament of Paris to be registered, the attorney general, Saint Romain, opposed it there, and declared he would lose his life before he would suffer a treason which was to destroy the kingdom to be consummated. The university of Paris also addressed remonstrances to Louis, and besought him not to authorise the abolition of decrees which were in conformity with the pure constitutions of the church. Unfortunately, all was useless; the cardinal D'Alby affirmed to the king that the revocation of the pragmatic sanction would not at all prejudice the liberties of the Gallic church, that the pontiff would constantly maintain a legate at Paris, to confer the grants and benefices, without the French being compelled to send money to Rome.

Louis the Eleventh, at last convinced by these reasons, and enticed by the promise of being sustained by the Holy See, in reconquering the throne of Naples for the duke of Anjou, signed the ordinance, which placed the clergy of France, body and soul, under the jurisdiction of the court of Rome. It is true, that in recompense, the bishop of Balue received a cardinal's hat, and the king a sword blessed on Easter eve. This was all the mean monarch received from the pope, for the latter had never intended to ratify the engagement made by his legate concerning the crown of Naples. On his side, Louis took no pains to cause the orders against the pragmatic sanction to be executed, which was in reality observed during the whole course of his reign.

Thus it was evident that these two despots played the knave with each other, and mutually sought to deceive the people. What chiefly contributed to unmask the court of Rome, and to enlighten Christians concerning the Machiavelian policy of the pontiff, was the publication of a letter which he had addressed to Mohammed the Second. In relating this fact, the historian Duplessis exclaims, "Never was the execrable ambition of priests more clearly revealed than in this epistle, in which a pope, who maintains that he is the vicar of God on earth, offers to a Mussulman to recognise him as emperor of the east and west, if he would send an army to annihilate his enemies." Behold the very text of the holy father: "Mahomet, if thou wert baptized, we would invoke the aid of thy terrible sword against those who dispute our patrimony. And as our predecessors Stephen, Adrian, and Leo called to their aid Pepin and Charlemagne, and crowned them emperors to recompense them for having exterminated the enemies of the church, so we would make thee the greatest king in the world to pay thy services." How can we avoid being indignant in seeing a pope propose to a Mussulman to sell him baptism, and offer him the imperial crown as the price of his apostasy.

Whilst the holy father was undertaking the conversion of Mohammed the Second, he was pressing the levy of dimes for the crusade, and wished to oblige France to furnish him ten thousand men, or an equivalent in silver.

But he encountered an active opposition at the court of Louis the Eleventh, who did not pardon him for maintaining Ferdinand on the throne of Naples; the king wrote to him a very disrespectful letter: "I have abolished the pragmatic sanction," he said, "I have sworn entire obedience to you; I have sustained you against those who wished to convene a council to depose you; all this in the hopes of obtaining your protection for my family. I have now discovered my fault, and learned how to judge you; I have, moreover, resolved to break openly with your see, and recall my ambassadors from Rome. As for the money you ask, it is safe in our treasury; go your way and seek it elsewhere."

This missive of Louis the Eleventh reached Rome at the very time when the envoy of Scanderberg brought a copy of a treaty which their master had concluded with the Turks. His holiness caused the treaty to be ratified by the sacred college, and to avoid having this step interpreted by the faithful into a renunciation of the crusade, which would have badly hurt the levy of the dimes, he assembled, in public consistory, the cardinals, principal citizens of Rome, and ambassadors of all Europe, and in the presence of an immense crowd, collected to the solemnity, he declared that an ardent zeal animated him for the defence of religion: "In order to arrest the Turks," he exclaimed, "I have determined, notwithstanding my great age, and my infirmities, to embark with my cardinals; I will go myself to besiege Constantinople, but I want money to equip a fleet; to organise an army; I must buy provisions, arms, clothing; I must have something to maintain my own poor household, my monks, my cardinals. Bring in then your money, my dear sons; let an holy emulation seize all of you; approach our throne and let each one deposit his offering." He closed his address by fulminating a decree against those who refused to pay tithes for the war.

This ceremony produced a fatal result for his holiness. The excitement brought on a violent fever, and so increased his fits of gout, that the physicians advised that he should be taken to Sienna for the benefit of the waters, though it was in winter. Before leaving Rome he wished to behave like a true chief of the church, and published the following recantation:—"We were wrong in combating pontifical infallibility at the council of Basle; we were then but a man, and we erred as all men do; we sinned through seduction, like St. Paul; and we persecuted the church of God from ignorance. We will now imitate the blessed Augustin, who, in his old age, retracted the opinions of his youth. We confess that our writings are heretical, because they opposed the supreme power of the Holy See; now that we are pope, we recognise the chair of St. Peter to be the first throne in the world, and that it is only required to place the tiara on the forehead of a man, to render him infallible, even though he had been before a perjurer, robber, sodomite, murderer, and marked with the seal of the beast. By the mere fact of the exaltation of a pope, a great miracle is accomplished; the Holy Spirit illuminates him, he becomes pure and great like God; he is God himself! Despise then my dialogues, my letters, my tracts; reject them as the works of a man, and believe on the contrary this bull, which emanates from the vicar of Christ; reject Æneas Sylvius, and glorify Pius the Second."

The sufferings of the holy father, instead, however, of diminishing, increased in intensity, and they were compelled to renounce the hopes of saving him. He himself soon perceived the approach of death, and called his cardinals around his bed, to exhort them to give him a successor who was truly animated with the pontifical spirit; he then demanded extreme unction. Laurent Roverella, bishop of Ferrara, represented to him that the church authorised this sacrament to be administered only once, and that, having already received it at Basle, when he was attacked by the plague, he was exposing himself to eternal damnation; but the dying man replied, "I wish it." "Well then be damned, holy father," replied Laurent, and administered it to him. He died some hours afterwards, on the 14th of August, 1464.

Platinus affirms that the pontiff was an implacable foe, and that he united insatiable cupidity and avarice to his immoderate love of power. Mezerai says of him:—"Never did man labour more to reduce the power of the pontiffs than Æneas Sylvius, and never did pope endeavour to stretch them further beyond law and reason than Pius the Second."

Dupin gives a detailed notice of the numerous writings of this pope. We will be contented with repeating the titles of his principal works; among which are the History of the Bohemians, from their origin to the year 1458; Memoirs of the Sessions of the famous council of Basle, from the suspension of Eugenius to the election of Felix the Fifth; a poem on the Passion of Christ; treatises on Cosmography, Grammar, Rhetoric, and the Topography of Germany; some very scandalous productions on women, minions, and the different kinds of love. In his last works the holy father tells some very animated adventures, of which he is the hero. There are besides four hundred and thirty-two letters, of which the most remarkable are treatises on matters of theology; the one hundred and thirtieth is a dialogue between heretics on the Catholic communion; the one hundred and eighty-eighth treats at length on the pope and the officers of his court; several are discourses on the comparative excellence of Christianity and Islamism; two panegyrics on Alphonso of Arragon; a treatise on the Roman empire, and several volumes of erotic poetry are attributed to him.

PAUL THE SECOND, THE TWO HUNDRED AND NINETEENTH POPE.

[A. D. 1464.]

Election of Paul the Second—His history before his pontificate—He refuses to keep his oath to the members of the sacred college—He seizes the dimes destined for the crusade against the Turks—Becomes odious to the Romans—Rupture between him and King Ferdinand—Affairs of Hungary, Bohemia, and Castile—Public games at Rome—War of the Florentines—The emperor comes to Rome—The historian Platinus condemned to the torture of the heated chamber—Quarrel between the pope and Louis the Eleventh—Quarrel between him and the king of Poland—His death.

AFTER the death of Pius the Second, the cardinals went to Rome, and assembled in the Vatican, to the number of twenty. Peter Barbo, a Venetian, cardinal of St. Mark, having received two-thirds of the suffrages, was proclaimed sovereign pontiff. Before, however, clothing him with the cape, and submitting him to the proof of the pierced chair, the cardinals exacted an oath from him that he should continue the collection of dimes, and divide the profits with them; they made him promise not to elevate to the cardinalate young men under thirty years of age; not to give the hat to any of his relatives, and never to surpass the number of twenty-four cardinals. They made him swear to submit the promotions and depositions of prelates to the sanction of the sacred college; not to alienate any part of the patrimonies of the church, or the revenues of the Holy See; to permit the ecclesiastics of the pontifical court liberty to make their wills; not to make war or peace with princes or republics, without the approval of the cardinals; to cause the governors of places and castles, to swear to place them in the power of the sacred college, when the Holy See should be vacated; that important places should not be governed by his relatives; that the army of the church should never be commanded by his family, and that in his bulls, made without the approval of the college, he should not place these words:—"By the advice of my brothers." They also imposed on him the condition of reading this same constitution every month in full consistory, to preserve a recollection of it; and they demanded that his holiness should grant them in advance, authority to assemble twice a year, in order to see if all the articles of the engagement had been strictly observed.

All these conventions having been accepted and signed by the new pontiff, the first deacon opened the window of the conclave, and showing the cross to the people, announced the election of Peter Barbo, cardinal of St. Mark. As was usual, they asked the holy father what name he would take; at first he chose that of Formosus, but on its being pointed out to him, that the Romans might accuse him of puerile vanity, in taking a name which, in the vulgar tongue, signified "the handsome," he decided on that of Paul the Second.

Peter Barbo was the son of Polyxene Condemère, the sister of Pope Eugenius the Fourth. He had entered upon a commercial career; when he was apprised of the exaltation of his uncle, he changed his vocation at once, and applied himself to the study of the sacred scriptures, under the direction of skilful professors. Eugenius the Fourth elevated him successively to the archdeaconate of Bologna, the bishopric of Servia, the post of apostolic protonotary, and finally to the cardinalate. Under Nicholas the Fifth he had enjoyed great credit. It is related that he was gifted with the singular faculty of shedding tears, when he wished to persuade his audience to adopt some political measure, which is the sublime of hypocrisy. Pius the Second named him, in derision, "our Lady of Pity." He had a mania of thinking himself a physician, and his principal occupation was to prepare salves and pills, which he sent to his friends when they were sick.

As soon as he was consecrated sovereign pontiff, he wished, in contempt of his oath, to govern despotically, without even counselling with his cardinals; he conferred the principal dignities and benefices of the church on his creatures, and framed several laws, which he presented in form to the sacred college to be ratified; but he forewarned them that he would immediately depose those who refused to obey him. Almost all subscribed to the wishes of the holy father without making any observation; but John de Cavajal, a Spanish cardinal, resisted him boldly, called him a traitor, perjurer, and simoniac, and stood so firm, that a kind of outbreak took place in the consistory. Paul, comprehending the necessity of dissimulating until his authority was more confirmed, feigned to yield to the representations of the cardinals, and endeavoured to bring back the malcontents by loading them with favours. He granted to them the privileges of wearing mitres of silk, like those of the popes; he permitted them to cover their horses with scarlet housings, instead of the violet trappings they had before used, and immediately appointed a commission of three of them to lay taxes on the kingdoms, still under the pretext of a war against the Turks. In vain did the ambassadors of the powers wish to oppose this arbitrary measure; their complaints were not listened to, and all that was permitted them was, to levy on each of the provinces of the different kingdoms, the amount of the respective sums they were to pay to the Holy See. These forced contributions served to increase the luxury of the Roman court, and to bring about concord between the pope and his cardinals.

Paul then received an embassy from the king of Naples, who besought his holiness to bless, through a legate, the marriage of his son with Hippolyte, the daughter of Francis Sforza, duke of Milan. As the pope dreaded the consequences of this alliance, which threatened to render Ferdinand the absolute master of Italy, he used pretexts of relationship between the betrothed, and pronounced against the marriage. The ambassadors then adroitly added, that they were instructed to inform the Holy See, that Mohammed the Second had offered their master one of his daughters, with a dowry of eight hundred thousand crowns of gold, as a bride for his son; that he only required, as a condition for this union, the promise of aiding him in conquering Venice, but that Ferdinand had not been dazzled by this brilliant offer, and had been unwilling to give a definite reply until he knew the opinion of the court of Rome.

Placed in the alternative of seeing Ferdinand contract an alliance with the enemy of the Christian name, or with an Italian prince, he decided on that which appeared to him to be the least formidable; he quieted his scruples in regard to the propinquity, and consented to the marriage of the son of the king of Naples with the princess Hippolyte. He, however, refused to bless their union, or to have it consecrated by a legate, and contented himself with giving the golden rose to the young spouses when they passed through Rome.

At about the same period, the arms of Ferdinand experienced several reverses in Apulia, where the Angevin party still maintained itself under the leading of the duke of Lorraine; but the king took his revenge, and, assisted by the troops of the duke of Milan, gained a great victory over them near the city of Troy. This rout forced the lords of the Angevin party, and the duke of Lorraine himself, to retire to the island of Ischia, from whence they passed over into France. Paul, who had contributed his part to the expulsion of the enemies of the king of Naples, claimed, in his turn, from his ally, the assistance of an army to exterminate the sons of the count Evasus, who were laying waste the ecclesiastical states. Ferdinand granted him at once the succour which he asked for, and, thanks to the activity of the Neapolitan generals, his holiness found himself freed, in less than fifteen days, from a family who had struggled against the three popes, Eugenius, Nicholas, and Calixtus, and had never been conquered.

Ferdinand, who justly attributed to himself so unhopd for a success, demanded, as a recompense for this important service, that the court of Rome should free him from arrears of unpaid tribute, and which would diminish his ordinary revenues. Paul the Second, who had an immoderate love of money, had not counted on this, and made a pretext of great need, to insist on the immediate payment of the arrears. A quarrel naturally followed between the king of Naples and the chief of the church.

His holiness had also a quarrel at the same time with Pogebrac, prince of Bohemia. It was on this account: A rich lord, named Zdencon, having failed in a revolt against that prince, had taken refuge in the city of Arastus, from whence he continued to menace his sovereign. Pogebrac determined at last to punish the rebel, and came to besiege him in his retreat. Zdencon, after a courageous defence, was reduced to the last extremities, and was about to be compelled to surrender, when he hoped to escape the danger by placing himself under the protection of the Holy See. Paul, who had received a large sum to under take his defence, immediately declared him inviolable, and threatened those who dared to continue the siege of Arastus, with the anathemas of the church. Without troubling himself about the ecclesiastical censures, the prince pressed the siege, took the place, and put to the sword all whom he found in it.

The holy father, wounded in his vanity, immediately addressed letters to all the princes of Germany, and besought them, through his legates, not to oppose the execution of the sentence he was about to pronounce on the sovereign of Bohemia; he then freed his people from their oaths of fidelity, and even preached a crusade against Pogebrac. He declared him to be a perjurer, sacrilegious, and a heretic; deposed him from his throne, and denounced him to the judgment of the holy inquisition. He then offered his crown to Casimir, king of Poland, who had the generosity to refuse it, then to Mathias of Hungary, who was less scrupulous, and who made a terrible war on the unfortunate excommunicated. Afterwards, doubtless, from gratitude that he had aided him in his vengeance, the pope exhibited great indulgence towards this latter king, and did not punish him for a sacrilege he committed in striking in the face the bishop Nicholas, the nuncio of the Holy See, for having calumniated his queen.

Besides, it was easy, as Gallatus Martius even relates, to purchase with money the protection of the holy father, which was the means employed by Henry of Castile, to obtain anathemas against his subjects. Paul undertook the defence of this debauched prince, who had prostituted his queen to one of his minions; he declared him absolved from all the crimes he had committed, ordered his subjects to obey him, and fulminated against his brother Alphonso, who had been named king in his stead, the most terrible anathemas. Anthony Vernier, bishop of Leon, was appointed to carry the bull of the pontiff to the court of Madrid; but he could not acquit himself of his commission: Alphonso refused even to see him, and ordered him to quit the kingdom at once, unless he wished to incur the risk of his life; that his holiness had nothing to do with the political affairs of his dominions, and that he appealed to a future council against his attempts at usurpation.

Pusillanimous and cowardly as all priests are when resisted, the bishop of Leon dared not publish his bull, and hastened to return to Rome. A new affront awaited him in the holy city; Paul also refused to see him, accused him of treason, and transmitted to him an order to return to Castile to menace the rebels with all the calamities of divine justice, and to set aside a king whom they had crowned. This time the pope was obeyed. The legate returned to Madrid; a month afterwards the young Alphonso died of poison, and Henry remounted the throne.

As a sign of rejoicing, and to celebrate in a worthy manner the triumph of his protege, the holy father gave public games to the Romans, as in the times of the pagan emperors. There were chariot races, horse races, and foot races; "and one could for a moment believe," said the cardinal of Pavia, "that he was in the fine days of paganism."

Whilst Rome was resounding with songs of gladness, Florence was plunged into consternation; the Medici and the Pitti disputed for the sovereignty of that city, and were aided by the dukes of Milan and Modena, who ravaged the country, now crying, "long live Peter de Medici," and now, "life to Luke Pitti." As the misfortunes of Florence did not touch the direct interests of the apostolic court, Paul did not trouble himself about them: it is just to say, that he had not a moment to himself, and that he was seriously engaged with reforms among the officers of the Holy See, and with breaking the abbreviators for selling their duties to other titularies.

Platinus relates that, having wished to make some observations to the pope on the promise which he had made at his election, not to take any important determination without consulting the sacred college, he replied to him: "So you call us before judges! Do you not know that all laws are confined within the coffer of my bosom? The decision which I have taken is unchangeable and sacred. What matters it to me that the abbreviators have been reduced by it to beg, and to live on the charity of the faithful! Such is my will! I am pope—I am permitted to abolish or approve the acts of my predecessors, according to my good pleasure."

These unfortunate men protested with energy against the arbitrary act of Paul, and announced that they were about to solicit the sovereigns of Europe to hold a general council, to decide the question between them and the Holy See. Platinus, who was faithfully attached to the pope, and who feared the consequences of these proceedings, took the liberty to address a letter to him, to enlighten him on the uproar he was creating for himself.

The pontiff, instead of being moved by this act of devotion, declared the letter to be an act of felony; he caused Platinus to be arrested, and to be cast into a tower, in which the unfortunate man passed four entire months, exposed to all the rigours of winter, almost without clothing and food. At last, thanks to the entreaties of the sacred college, and the energetic representations of the magistrates and trades, he was set at liberty; but it was only for a little time. Paul, who was determined to destroy him, subsidised false witnesses, who accused him of having conspired against his authority, with the celebrated Callimachus, and several learned men, whom the pope wished to envelope in the same proscription.

The house of Platinus was one night surrounded by his soldiers, his furniture pillaged, his papers carried off, and he himself dragged from his bed and led in chains before his persecutor; his holiness proceeded at once to interrogate him, and caused him to be put to the torture; by his orders the sufferer was despoiled of his garments, and conducted into a vaulted hall, separated into two parts by a partition of glass. In one of those chambers were the pope and his counsellors, mixed up with the executioners; in the other were placed heated braziers, which kept up a boiling in immense vessels full of water, which rendered any stay in it insupportable. In the midst was a post three feet high, terminating in a diamond point; to the ceiling were fastened five cords. The punishment, over which the holy father presided, was that of the heated chamber.

Platinus was bound by his four members and reins, and raised above the stake, the point of which was introduced into his anus; they then drew the cords so that he was bent double, and all the weight of his body rested on the axis of the stake; the heated braziers were then fixed close to him, and a glass, which reflected all this horrid scene, was placed before him, so as to double in some sort his punishment. Paul, surrounded by his minions and favourites, continued the examination of Platinus through the partition, and only stopped to make cynical allusions to the pain which tore the entrails of his victims so cruelly. Notwithstanding the atrocious sufferings he underwent, the sufferer having nothing which he was willing to avow, they were obliged to take him down, and the pope caused his place to be occupied by others. All underwent frightful tortures; and no one having accused Platinus, they were then compelled to abandon the charge of a crime against the state, and seek some other pretext to destroy the imprudent censor of the pope. His holiness accused him of heresy, and ordered the executioners to renew their punishments, to force the accused to admit this new crime.

Almost all these unfortunate men expired on the rack, after having been torn with iron pincers or broken with blows from a bar of iron; the historian Platinus alone, thanks to his moral energy and the strong constitution with which he was endowed, defied the rage of his executioners, and survived these horrid tortures. He even afterwards recovered his liberty, on the express demand of the emperor Frederick the Third, who came to Rome to receive from the Holy See his portion of the levy of the dimes.

The last years of the life of Paul possess no interest for history; his holiness continued to foment troubles in France, Bohemia, Poland, Spain, and Italy, and always for the purpose of obtaining a levy of tenths, for his avarice only yielded to his cruelty, his pride, and his lubricity. He was so vain of the beauty of his face, that he passed whole hours in covering himself with carmine and paint! and his taste for female ornaments was pushed so far, that he exhausted the treasures of the church, in buying lace and jewelry.—Platinus says, that he caused a tiara to be adorned with so great a number of diamonds, that this tower of Cybele, the first time he wore it, caused him an apoplectic fit, of which he died.

Paul was at once the Narcissus and the Lucullus of the popes; like Narcissus he was amorous of his own person, and like Lucullus he wished his table to be always covered with the most delicious dishes; thus he died a victim to his intemperance. To conceal his ignorance, he affected to be an enemy to the learned, and declared those heretical who abandoned themselves to study. During his pontificate, the Romans were prohibited from sending their children to school, since, he said, priests alone should know how to read and write. One of his favourite maxims was, "religion ought to annihilate science, because science is the enemy of religion."

He died on the night of the 29th of July, 1471, in consequence of indigestion, from having eaten two melons after dinner. ?

SIXTUS THE FOURTH, THE TWO HUNDRED AND TWENTIETH POPE.

[A. D. 1471.]

Election of Sixtus the Fourth—His history before his pontificate—He decrees that the bastards of popes shall be princes by right of birth—He continues the levy of tenths in Europe, under the pretext of a crusade—Legation of the cardinal Roderick Borgia, in Spain—Reorganization of the tribunals of the inquisition of Castile—The people refuse to pay the tithes—His holiness falls back on the publication of a jubilee to raise money—Embassies of France and Spain—The holy father authorises the consecration of a child of six years of age to an episcopal see—He directs the persecutions against the Florentines—Extortions of the pope—His death—He establishes a most noble Lupanar at Rome.

FOURTEEN days after the death of Paul the Second, the cardinals chose Francesco D'Albexola, who took the name of Sixtus the Fourth, as his successor. The new pope was originally from Cella, a small town on the coast of Genoa, five miles from Savona. His father was a poor fisherman, with a large family, and he himself in his early youth followed this profession. His genteel appearance attracted the attention of the lord della Rovera, who first made him his minion, and then confided him to skilful teachers. Francesco acquired such an ascendancy over the mind of his protector that he determined to give him his name and adopt him.

As soon as he attained the age of manhood, Francesco went to Sienna, where he obtained the grade of doctor, and permission to make a profession at Bologna and Florence; then, after having passed successively through all the grades of the Cordeliers, the son of the poor fisherman found himself a cardinal. His pretensions to the throne of the apostle were actively supported by the cardinals Romain des Ursini, Gonzagua of Mantua, and Roderick Borgia, who had already, through all Italy, the reputation of being the most infamous of all the Roman cardinals, then recognised as the most abandoned men under heaven. Thanks to their intrigues and their threats, Francesco D'Albexola was proclaimed sovereign pontiff and supreme chief of the church.

This act of justice is due to Sixtus, that he never evinced ingratitude towards those who had protected him; his holiness, during his whole reign, loaded these three cardinals with honours and benefices, and generously gave up to them a part of the spoils of the faithful.

Onuphre, Machiavel, and Peter Volaterran, affirm, that the holy father had conducted himself very outrageously when cardinal; that he had deflowered each of his sisters in turn, and that he even pushed his lubricity so far as to use his monstrous debauches to young children, the fruits of an incestuous commerce between him and his eldest sister. "Never," add the historians, "had the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah been the theatre of such abominations! and as if the scandal was not yet great enough, Sixtus the Fourth had the impudence to publish a bull, which declared that the nephews and bastards of the popes should be of right, Roman princes."

In consequence of this decree, Peter and Jerome de Riario, his two bastards, took rank among the Italian princes. Peter also obtained a cardinal's hat, and an annual pension of a million five hundred thousand crowns of gold, an enormous sum for the times, and which, however, was barely sufficient to maintain the luxuriousness of the courtesan Theresa Fulgora, his mistress. Happily for the people, this depraved woman, who had already abandoned herself to the caresses of all the debauchees of Rome, was taken with a terrible disease, with which she infected her lover, and after two years of horrid sufferings, Peter died, a victim to his debauchery. Jerome, who had been created, by the holy father, prince of Forli and Imola, was more fortunate than his brother in his loves, and after a year of debauchery, he married the natural daughter of the duke of Milan. Jerome, not content with all the honours and riches which his father had heaped on him, thought of raising himself still higher, and cast his eyes on Florence and the small states adjoining it, to make of them an independent principality.—His holiness approved of the plans of his bastard, and turned his thoughts towards the means of defeating the Medici, who governed Florence, and were the only obstacles to the success of their efforts. A vast conspiracy was organised in the palace of the Vatican, and extended as far as Florence; the archbishop Salviati was promised a cardinal's hat, and entered into the plot; a priest named Stephano, and the family of the Spazzi, received money, and engaged to poignard the Medici; finally, when all was ready, the cardinal of St. George, Raphael Riari, the nephew of Jerome, left the holy city, and came to arrange with the conspirators the place and day of the execution.

Eternal shame on the pontiff who directed this execrable enterprise; the place fixed for the assassination was the church of St. Reparado, the day Sunday, the time that of the celebration of the mass, the signal the elevation of the host, in order that the murderers might stab the two brothers, Lawrence and Julian de Medicis, without giving them time to defend themselves, and whilst they were bending their heads before the majesty of God.

On that day, the archbishop Salviati, who was very desirous of gaining his cardinal's hat, wished to officiate himself, and at the moment when he elevated the chalice above his head, the priests, who carried arms concealed beneath their surplices, rushed upon the Medici; Julian fell beneath eleven wounds; Lawrence, his brother, though losing blood by three wounds, was strong enough to fly into the sacristy, barricade the door, and wait for assistance. The people, who had been warned of what was passing by the uproar, invaded the church, and seized all the conspirators; Salviati was hung in his episcopal robes; the priests and deacons, Poggio, Pietro, Stephen, and John, underwent the same punishment. The cardinal of St. George, who was discovered in the cellar of his palace, would, beyond doubt, have received the just chastisement of his felony, notwithstanding his rank, if Lawrence de Medici had not demanded the pardon of the guilty man from the citizens; he only obliged him to confess, in a loud and intelligible voice, that he had done nothing in all this matter, which he had not been ordered to do by the sovereign pontiff; they then drove him from the city.

As soon as his holiness was informed of the ill success of his conspiracy, he fell into a great rage, and made horrid threats against the Florentines; he even summoned the most serene republic to deliver up to him Lawrence de Medici, bound hand and foot, under penalty of anathema and interdict, and on its refusal to obey, he excommunicated the city of Florence, declared all its inhabitants infamous, heretical, and devoted them to Satan as children of perdition, the rejected of iniquity. His powerless thunders excited only derision, and he was compelled to put off to another time the vengeance which he counted to draw down on Florence.

Though the holy father had an excessive tenderness for Jerome, he was not on that account forgetful of his other relatives, and laboured for their fortune. One of his nephews, named Julian, was created cardinal; another was elevated to the dignity of prince of Sovra and Senagaille, and married the daughter of Frederick of Monte Falco, duke of Urbain; a third nephew, Leonard Riario, was invested with the government of Rome, and married the natural daughter of Ferdinand, king of Naples. At last the abuse of his prodigalities to his family became such, that to put an end to them, the cardinals came to him in a body to address remonstrances to him, and to beseech him to be more reserved in his actions.

In translating this passage of the life of Sixtus the Fourth, the historian Duplessis Mornay adds, ironically:—"The cardinals were wrong in saying that he pushed nepotism farther than any of his predecessors; for they were not his nephews whom he protected, but his minions and bastards." What contributes to confirm the certainty of this assertion is, that Sixtus the Fourth did nothing for the children of his brothers, whilst he loaded the sons of his sisters with honour and wealth.

In consequence, however, of his taking so much from the apostolic treasury, to enrich his numerous family, he finished by exhausting it, and found himself without money. He then determined to work on the credulity of mankind, that mine of gold so fruitful for the priests, and published a bull convening a council to meet at St. John Lateran's, under pretext of consulting on the means of carrying on war with the Turks. He gave the legation of France to Cardinal Bessarion, that of Spain to Cardinal Roderick Borgia, that of Germany to Cardinal Mark Barbo, commissioned to obtain from the kings, authority to preach the crusade, and offer to divide the tenths with them. His holiness sent legions of monks in advance, who spread themselves in every direction, and ransacked the kingdoms unmercifully. Jews were taxed to a twentieth of their property, the faithful to a thirtieth, and when this first contribution was collected in, the pope ordered a second levy of tenths for the sale of indulgences, absolutions, dispensations, permissions. . . . After this the legates went for their respective destinations.

Roderick Borgia was received in Spain with acclamations bordering on frenzy; when he arrived near Madrid; the clergy and nobility went more than three leagues from the city to meet him; the king received him in person at one of the gates of the capital, and conducted him to the palace which was destined for him, walking on his left hand, which was the greatest mark of respect he could bestow on a man. Scarcely was he installed in Castile, when he assembled the bishops and abbots of the kingdom, under the pretext of taking with them more favourable measures for the re-establishment of peace among the different states of the peninsula, but in reality to reduce them to subjection to the Holy See. In fact, the only questions in the council were regarding ecclesiastical contributions, and the collections of imposts, which were minutely regulated, notwithstanding the opposition of some prelates, who observed, with good reason, that the people, already ruined by war, and the last missions, could pay nothing more without being reduced to the last stage of misery. Henry the Weak, who was to share the profit of the tenths, paid no regard to the representations of the bishops, and fortified with all his authority the demands of the court of Rome. In consequence of the orders and will of the king, the Spaniards were decreed to be taxable, and the clergy submitted to pontifical despotism. It is true that the priests of the peninsula deserved no consideration on account of their immoralities; they were all ignorant, and debauchees; the greater part of them did not even understand the prayers which they recited in Latin; some passed their whole time in taverns and brothels; other sold publicly, without scruple, and without shame, benefices and immunities; others again, practised usury with more rapacity even than the Jews; finally, they were so demoralised, that there was no serious opposition on their part, to hinder Roderick Borgia from accomplishing the work of destruction of the privileges and liberties of the Spanish church.

After having used King Henry to strengthen the rule of the Holy See in Castile, the legate turned against him, and declared in favour of his sister-Isabella and Ferdinand of Arragon, who sought to dethrone him; he also entered into secret treaties with the duke of Burgundy, and Edward of England, and sold to those two princes the protection of the Holy See, to the detriment of Castile and France. All his tricks and knaveries having been discovered, Henry drove him in disgrace from Madrid. But what did Roderick Borgia care for the disgrace of an insult? He left with the honours of war, and arranged with Ferdinand the Catholic, the basis of a constitution which subjugated the Spaniards to the execrable tyranny of the court of Rome.

Some years afterwards, the Cardinal Medina Celi continued the work of the court of Rome, and increased the already so powerful authority of the inquisition. At his instigation the greedy Ferdinand, become king of Arragon and Seville by the death of the weak Henry, granted permanency to the odious tribunal, and accomplished the most revolting iniquity of that age, the extermination of the Jews of his kingdom. These laborious men were then in possession of every branch of industry, simply from their religion, which gives glory to labour; whilst the Spaniards, slothful and idle, addicted to a contemplative life, or the profession of arms, had become, almost all of them, debtors to the Israelites. Bad faith on one part, and fanaticism on the other, determined Ferdinand the Catholic to place the Jews without the protection of the laws, and in less than eight days, more than ten thousand of these unfortunates were pitilessly massacred by the soldiers of the king. This butchery only increased the rage of the implacable tyrant; and, as he dared not pursue, single handed, the execution of his sanguinary plans, from the fear of exciting the people against him, he established a supreme tribunal at Seville, which took the name of the Holy Office, and appointed Thomas of Torquemada, the prior of the Dominicans, to preside over it as Grand Inquisitor General.

It was computed that there were in the kingdom of this gracious monarch, more than one hundred and fifty thousand Jewish families, or almost a million and a half of individuals of that nation. Torquemada undertook to convert them all, or to purge the soil of Spain of them, and he kept his word. The familiars of the holy office seconded him so well, and understood so perfectly how to apply racks, boots, wheels, fangs, and all the instruments of torture, that the Jews left Arragon in bands, and came to seek protection in the territories of the duke of Medina, Sidonia, the marquis of Cadiz, the count of Arcos, and some other lords. Their flight could not, however, save them from the pursuit of the dreaded inquisition, for Torquemada had ordered the governors of all the cities to lay strong hands on the emigrants, and send them back to Seville, under penalty of excommunication, which was punctually done, so that these unfortunates were sent back by force into Arragon and Castile, thrown by thousands into the dungeons of the inquisition, and submitted to frightful tortures.

The prisons of the holy office were filled and emptied at least eleven times in nine months; but the smell of wasting flesh, and the sight of palpitating limbs, instead of softening these tigers with a human face, rendered them more ferocious. As soon as they found that the number of their victims was diminishing, they anxiously sought out new guilty, and for this purpose, Ferdinand the Catholic, published a decree, by which his majesty enjoined on heretics who had fled the kingdom to give themselves up voluntarily as prisoners to the holy office, solemnly promising them, on the body of Christ, to set them at liberty on this condition, and to restore their property to them. A great number of these unfortunates, full of confidence in these promises, came to deliver themselves up to their executioners, and they learned, when too late, that men should never believe the oaths of kings. They were all burned alive.

This method of re-peopling the dungeons of the inquisition was, however, soon exhausted; and as no more victims presented themselves, Torquemada had recourse to informers. In the space of six months more than nineteen thousand heretics were denounced to the inquisitors, and judged by that terrible tribunal. At last, the number of those condemned to be burned became so great, that Torquemada, to get through his work more quickly, caused four immense hollow statues to be erected in the place where the executions took place, in which the sufferers were shut up. On the day of the executions a pyre was constructed around these statues, and the victims died, consumed in frightful agony. These acts the priests called auto-da-fe, or acts of faith!!!

These first exploits of the inquisitors increased enormously the treasures of Ferdinand the Catholic, and determined him to give a regular action to the tribunals of the inquisition. He consequently created a royal council of the inquisition, which was called the supreme council. Over this Torquemada presided, and he added four ecclesiastics as counsellors to him; these last had no deliberative voice but in civil questions; religious matters were entirely submitted to the will of the grand inquisitor.

Sixtus the Fourth granted bulls authorising the establishment of this institution, and permitted Torquemada to convene a council of all the inquisitors of Spain, who decreed the horrible inquisitorial code. This monument of sacerdotal ferocity was divided into twenty-eight principal articles. The three first concerned the rules to be followed in the installation of tribunals, and the different modes of proceeding to obtain denunciations. The fourth article formally interdicted the judges from granting definite absolutions, even when the accused were converted, so that they might be compelled to purchase indulgences from the court of Rome. By the sixth article it was specified, that the new Christian, though reconciled to God, was deprived of every honourable employment, and was prohibited from wearing gold, silver, or pearls on his garments, silk and fine linen; the court of Rome alone could sell freedom from those penalties. The seventh and eighth articles imposed pecuniary punishment on the accused who made a voluntary confession, and declared their property confiscated for the benefit of the king. The following articles, were concerning penalties against the accused who were convicted of heresies, and the lightest was perpetual detention in their frightful dungeons. The twelfth and thirteenth authorised the inquisitors to condemn, as false penitents, the new converts, whose repentance they considered feigned. The fourteenth provided that the recalcitrant who persisted in maintaining his innocence, should be condemned as an obstinate heretic, and should be put to different tortures, whose violence was to be increased until he avowed his heresy, and then as soon as he had admitted his guilt, he was to be mounted on the queredaro, which was the scaffold on which were the four statutes destined for the condemned. Thus, in any way, innocent or guilty, he could not escape these terrible inquisitors.

Two articles were devoted to the forms of proceeding; the judges were prohibited from communicating to the accused the testimony brought against them, and also from confronting them with their accusers; they were only to interrogate them and receive their confessions, whilst they were put to the torture. The nineteenth and twentieth articles condemned as heretics, all accused who did not present themselves before the sacred office, after having been warned; and they provided, that if it were proved by writing or testimony, that any one already dead had been attached of heresy, his dead body should be exhumed, judged, condemned, and burned, and his property be confiscated, half for the advantage of the prince, half for that of the inquisitors. The four last articles were in relation to the proceedings which the inquisitors should observe between themselves and towards their subordinates.

In all past ages, among the most barbarous people, never had the fanaticism nor cruelty of priests immolated so many victims, and no atrocities, whose record has been left us by the historians of antiquity, could approach the horrid punishments invented by the holy inquisition or the pontiffs of Rome.

Whilst these things were taking place in Spain, the cardinal Bessarion was still deliberating at Rome, whether or not he should go to the court of Louis the Eleventh, whose knavery inspired him with just fears. At last he decided to go, on account of a letter which he received from the king, who invited him to hasten his arrival to his court, and promised to receive him as if he were the pontiff himself.

"But it did not turn out that things should happen so," says Brantome, "that long and magisterial personage who bore the title of metropolitan of Nice and the name of Bessarion, committed the error of going to the duke of Burgundy, before going to the court of Louis the Eleventh; so that when he appeared before our gracious monarch, the latter took him by his long beard, saying to him:—'Reverend sir, I am astonished that Charles the Bold did not shave you, for he knows that I do not admire the beards of the Capuchins,' and without saying any more, he turned his back on him and refused to grant him an audience, and even receive the despatches of the holy father. Bessarion was so mortified, that he fell sick of a violent fever, of which he died on his return to Rome."

The legation to Germany was no more successful. The people, tired of paying tithes for a pretended crusade against the Turks, which was in reality but an apostolical crusade against their money, refused, in most of the cities, to receive the delegates of the Holy See. In England they also opposed the levy of Peter's pence, and the bishops were the most opposed to the exactions of the court of Rome. Stillington, bishop of Bath, even confined in a prison the prothonotary Prosper, who wished to proceed and levy tithes on the churches of his diocese. His holiness was more successful in Scotland than Great Britain, thanks to the protection which his collectors received from Graan, the new bishop of St. Andrew's. Thus, in gratitude for his services, he was appointed primate of the kingdom, with the title of perpetual legate. This new mark of favour increased the zeal of that prelate for the court of Rome, and he placed himself at the head of the exactors, to regulate the collection of the impost for the crusade. A general cry of indignation rose from all parts of the kingdom, and James the Third found himself compelled to suspend him from his functions. Graan, careless of the orders of his sovereign, immediately went to Edinburg, and produced before the assembly bulls, by virtue of which Sixtus the Fourth authorised him to levy dimes on Scotland, and to anathematise all those who should oppose the exercise of the discretionary authority of the legate.

James, fearful of exciting troubles, feigned to submit to the orders of the pontiff, and permitted the metropolitan of Saint Andrew's to pillage his subjects. But it was not for a long time. The king, furious at having no share in these dilapidations, resolved to supplant the prelate with the holy father, and sent ambassadors to Rome to obtain, by paying a large sum, apostolic bulls and authority to permit him to seize the body of the legate, to despoil him of his archbishopric, to confiscate his property, and even to behead him. As the sums offered by James the Third were large, and much surpassed those which the primate promised him, his holiness gave the required authority, and the unfortunate metropolitan was plunged into a dungeon, where he died miserably.

Henry of Sponda remarks, that this was a fortunate matter for the crown of Scotland; for after that time, thanks to the power which had been conceded by the pope, James the Third could appoint to the bishoprics and abbeys of his kingdom, and give them to his favourites. Notwithstanding the extreme skill he displayed in extorting money from the faithful, the holy father was always poor, in consequence of the prodigalities of his bastards and sisters, who swallowed up the dimes, the receipts from indulgences, the sales of benefices, and even the taxes for absolutions. Sixtus, finding his resources at an end, determined to exhume a decree of Paul the Second, which reduced the period which separated the jubilees to twenty-five years, and which that abominable pope had promulgated in the hopes of deriving enormous advantages from it for his own account. As death had overtaken him in the interval, he had laboured for his successor. The latter made it an object of a new decree, and fixed the periods of the jubilee, definitely, for each quarter of a century.

Circulars were consequently addressed to all the sovereigns of Europe, to announce to them that this remunerative solemnity would be celebrated at Rome in the year 1475, on which they were entering; and superstition was still so great at that period, that notwithstanding the wars which desolated France, England, Hungary, Spain, and Poland, a large number of pilgrims from these different countries came to the holy city to make their devotions at the tomb of the apostles, and to gain the indulgences promised by the pope. Those whose engagements kept them at home were ransacked by legions of monks, who bore the title of collectors of the Holy See.

All the Christian kings and princes sent rich presents and solemn embassies to Rome to merit absolution for their sins. Ferdinand, king of Naples, the king of Bosnia and his wife, as well as Charlotte, queen of Cyprus, came to the court of the pontiff, wearing the robes of pilgrims, the first to demand pardon for their crimes, the others to do penance for their amours. Louis the Fourteenth himself, notwithstanding his hatred for the Holy See, sent to purchase indulgences and relics at Rome; but as soon as the year of jubilee was expired he recommenced the war against his holiness, and published a decree in which it was said, that by virtue of the canons of the council of Constance, which recognised in kings the right of convening national councils, he enjoined on the French prelates who were without the kingdom, to return at once to their respective sees, and prepare to come to the synod which he convened six months hence, to regulate the ecclesiastical affairs of his dominions. He moreover ordered the priests who came from Rome to submit to the inspection of his officers on the frontiers, bulls and other papers of which they were the bearers, to avoid the introduction of any apostolic bulls which might be prejudicial to the liberties of the Gallican church; finally, he prohibited, under threats of the most grievous penalties, the regular and secular clergy from assisting at any assembly without the kingdom, unless by a formal authority, and one written by his own hand.

Italy was then travelling with ideas of emancipation which were propagated by bold men, who, not despairing of the safety of the people, wished to overthrow tyranny. Among this number were three young Milanese, Olgiati, Lampugnani, and Visconti, who bravely killed with their daggers Galeas Sforza, the oppressor of their country, in open day and in the midst of a solemn festival. "He was a cruel tyrant, that Galeas Sforza," says an Italian chronicle, "if we are to judge him by one of his favourite diversions, which was to inter his victims alive, with their heads above the earth, and to prolong their agony by feeding them with human excrements. Fortunately, there were three young men who devoted themselves for the safety of all, and freed the earth from this monster."

They thus executed their sublime plan:— On the day after Easter, in the year 1478, Galeas left his palace to go to the church of St. Ambrose, to perform his devotions; he assisted at the mass between the ambassador of Ferrara and him of Mantua. In the midst of the ceremony, John Andrew Lampugnani approached, with his two friends, pushed through the crowd of courtiers who surrounded the prince, stating that he had an urgent despatch to present to him. When he had approached him, he put his left hand to his cap, placed his knee on the ground as if he had a request to present to him, and at the same time with his right hand struck him in the belly upward with a dagger he had concealed in his sleeve; Olgiati, struck him in the throat and breast; Visconti in the middle of his shoulder and the middle of his back; and all this was done so quickly, that Sforza fell into the arms of the two ambassadors who were at his side, before they noticed what was passing. But the courtiers, who had time to recover from their first surprize, soon perceived that the duke had been assassinated. Some fled; others drew their swords, and pursued the conspirators. Lampugnani, in endeavouring to escape from the church, was unfortunately entangled in a group of women who were on their knees. Their dresses caught in his spurs; he fell, and was overtaken by one of the squires of Galeas, who killed him on the spot. Visconti was arrested a little farther off, and slain at once by the guards. Olgiati alone escaped; but his flight only retarded the horrible punishment which the satellites of Louis Sforza, the brother of the tyrant, were preparing for him.

This courageous youth has left us a touching relation of that frightful drama, of which he is at once the historian and the hero. "I dared not go to my father's," said he, "to avoid compromising him, but I went to the house of a friend. Unfortunately, on the morning of the day on which I had fixed to endeavour to gain my liberty, I heard the cries of the soldiers who were dragging the body of Lampugnani in the mud, and who were approaching my retreat. I then discovered that I had been sold; I had not, however, strength to fly; the horror with which I was seized chilled my blood in my veins, and deprived me of the faculty of seeing and hearing." Here stops the recital of Olgiati. "The soldiers," adds the chronicle, "those natural enemies of the people, seized the daring apostle of liberty and dragged him by his hair to the palace of the inquisitors, loading him with blows and insults."

Olgiati was condemned to be tortured with hot pincers and cut to pieces while still alive. In the midst of these atrocious torments the priests, who performed the duties of executioners, exhorted him to repent and ask pardon from God for his crime.

"Never," he replied, "ye props of tyranny; I do not repent; if God had given me ten lives instead of one, I would have disposed of them in the same manner, though I should have perished ten times in the same torments." When they were tearing off the skin of his neck and person, he uttered a cry of pain. "Dost thou then implore mercy," asked one of the priests. "No," replied the martyr, "I only ask that thou shouldst leave this miserable body strength enough that I may exclaim on the scaffold 'Death to kings—long live liberty!'"

Thus perished Olgiati, aged twenty-two years, a victim to his love for his country! May his noble action find imitators, and may the fate of Galeas cause despots to tremble on their thrones.

As Louis the Eleventh found it was to his interest to foment the disorders in Italy, he did not hesitate to encourage the rebellions; thus he sent Philip de Comines with a body of troops to aid the Florentines, who were in open revolt against the Holy See; he even informed his holiness through Guy d'Arpagon, viscount de Lautre, his ambassador, that he must raise the excommunication against the Florentines, and convene a general council, unless he wished to go to war with France. On the refusal of Sixtus to comply with these demands, the ambassador declared, in the presence of the whole Roman court, that Louis the Eleventh was about to assemble to re-establish officially the pragmatic sanction, and he enjoined on the French cardinals, as well as the metropolitans, to return at once to their country.

Ferdinand endeavoured to interfere between Sixtus the Fourth and the most serene republic, but the intractable pontiff was unwilling to grant any but humiliating conditions to Florence, and his efforts to stop the war were useless. Whilst Italy was on fire, and the people were murdering each other to sustain the quarrels of the pope and subjugate a flourishing republic for his infamous nephew, Sixtus the Fourth was continuing the course of his spoliations. Thus he sold the bishopric of Arragon to Ferdinand, and gave the government of that church to a bastard of six years of age, the son of the king of Naples and a Spanish prostitute; he also sold a dispensation of marriage to the old king of Portugal, Alphonso the Fifth, to enable him to espouse his near relative, the princess Joanna, and almost immediately after expediting this sacrilegious bull, which authorised an incest, he revoked it, because Ferdinand of Naples gave him double the sum to prevent the alliance. Finally, in accordance with the testimony of a cotemporaneous historian, it was proved that he wished to treat with the Turks to sell them Italy, but that Mohammed the Second, having rejected his offer, he was compelled to make peace with the Florentines, who had already gained several advantages over the troops of the Holy See.

The Mussulmen had not, however, renounced their plan of seizing on Lower Italy; and though forced to raise the siege of Rhodes, they had attacked Otranto, which had fallen into their power after an energetic resistance. From that city the pacha Achmet could make incursions with impunity on the coast of the Adriatic, and even pushed them as far as the church of Our Lady of Loretto, whose immense wealth was an object of desire to this miscreant. Naples, Venice, Florence, and Rome, at last united their troops to repulse this dreaded foe, and to drive him from Italy; they had not much difficulty in effecting their object, for at the very moment when the confederates were about to march, they learned that Mohammed the Second was dead, and that the Mussulmen had abandoned Otranto to take part in the bloody dissensions between the sons of that caliph.

His holiness took advantage of this respite to renew the intestine wars of Italy; he fulminated terrible anathemas against the Venetians and Florentines, and ordered the Italian princes to take the cross against these two republics, under the pretext that they were becoming too powerful, and threatened to destroy the equilibrium, which was the guarantee of the existence of each principality: "During these wars of extermination," says Varillas, "the nephews of the pontiff seized on numerous domains, and it only remained for Jerome de Riario, in order to achieve the conquest of Florence, to set foot in Umbria from whence it was easy to extend himself into Romagna and Tuscany, when fortunately money began to fail the holy father. To procure it he put up at auction the offices of the chancellery, and of the apostolic court, augmented the number of employments, and created five colleges to expedite the affairs of the datary's office. As he found no buyers of these offices, he doubled the old imposts, imposed new, and decreed an extraordinary levy of dimes, under pretence of a crusade against the Turks."

All these means, which had heretofore succeeded so well, produced but little money, and after three years of burnings, pillages, and massacres, he was compelled to sue for peace from Florence, and renounce the hope of placing a crown on the head of his bastard.

It affected him so violently that he sickened, and died on the 13th of August, 1484.

A very singular act, which preceded the death of Sixtus, by only a few days, is related by an historian. "The pope was apprised one morning, that two soldiers were engaged in mortal combat without the gates of Rome. He caused them to be arrested and led to the square of St. Peter, there to fight out their quarrel in his sight. When he appeared on the balcony, they drew their swords, knelt to receive his blessing, and commenced an embittered struggle. Sixtus regarded them and applauded whenever a good blow was struck; it terminated in their both falling, one killed dead on the spot, the other mortally wounded."

Some Catholic authors have affirmed that Sixtus the Fourth showed himself a generous protector of letters, because he enriched the library of the Vatican with the precious and rare manuscripts which the Greek fugitives sold him at a low price. "The better to appreciate," says Bayle, "the protection he afforded to writers, it is enough to relate, that the poor Theodore de Gaza, who had passed all his life in translating the Zoology of Aristotle, presented to him a copy enriched with golden ornaments, and adorned with precious stones. Sixtus received it, and asked him what price he named for it; the author having done so, he sent it to him without adding a penny or a maille, (a very small coin.) Theodore de Gaza cast the money of the holy father into the Tiber, and perished of hunger."

If the pontiff did not exhibit himself as the most generous towards men of letters by way of compensation, he showed himself the ardent protector of the courtezans of Rome, and Cornelius Agrippa relates very gravely, that his holiness founded several noble lupanars, which were under his protection, and in which each girl was taxed a golden Julius a week. "This impost brought in more than twenty thousand ducats a year," adds the historian; "prostitutes were placed in these resorts of depravity by the prelates of the apostolic court, who levied a certain tax upon their products, and it was a custom so universally practised at that period, that I have heard bishops in counting up their revenues say, I have two benefices which are worth to me three thousand ducats a year, a cure which brings me in five hundred, a priory which is worth to me three hundred, and five prostitutes in the pope's lupanars which bring me in two hundred and fifty."

But that which surpasses all belief, is a fact related in every history of the times; the infamous pontiff permitted Peter, a cardinal and patriarch of Constantinople, Jerome his brother, and the cardinal of St. Lucia, to exercise horrible iniquities during the months of June, July, and August, and with his own hand wrote at the bottom of the request presented to him; "Be it, as is desired."

INNOCENT THE EIGHTH, THE TWO HUNDRED AND TWENTY-FIRST POPE.

THE historian of the conclave relates very remarkable particulars concerning the death of Sixtus the Fourth. He maintains, that his dead body became so black that it could not be regarded without horror, and that it spread an insupportable odour through the church of St. Peter, in which it was exposed, so that no one, priest or monk, was willing to remain to pray near the body.

As soon as the news of his death was known, the people rushed in a mass to the palace of Jerome de Riario, to wreak on his bastard the hatred they entertained for him; but Jerome had already fled from the holy city, with his jewels and all the wealth that he could carry off. His magnificent residence was pillaged; the prophyry columns and marble statues, which were so many masterpieces of statuary, were broken up with hammers; they even rooted up the fine trees which shaded his splendid gardens. They then went to his chateau of the Jubilee, so named, because it had been bought with the offerings of the pilgrims at the last jubilee; all his farmhouses were ravaged and given to the flames, and the granaries which belonged to him were entirely emptied, and the grain they contained distributed to the poor. These acts of justice terminated, tranquillity was restored to the city and the cardinals could form a conclave

The cardinals of St. Mark obtained sixteen of the twenty-six votes on the very evening they assembled. The cardinal of St. Peter in Bonds offered to procure for him three voices more, if he would give him a palace he possessed near the castle of San Angelo; not having been able to conclude the bargain, the latter conceived a violent dislike towards him, and caballed during the night with the vice chancellor in favour of Cibo, cardinal of Melfe. They awoke in succession the prelates who had retired to their cells; they proposed to Savelli to buy his vote, giving him for it the castle of Monticelli, and the promise of the legation of Bologna; they offered to Colonna the chateau of Ceperani, with the legation of the patrimony of St. Peter, a rental of twenty-five thousand ducats, and a benefice worth seven thousand ducats more; they signed an engagement in full form with the cardinal of Ursini, for the chateau of Servertre, and a treaty which assured to him the legation of the March of Ancona, as well as the titles of intendant general of the palace and treasurer of the Holy See; they promised to Martinusius, the seat of Capanica and the bishopric of Avignon; they surrendered to the son of the king of Arragon, in full fee, the city of Pontecorvo; they granted to the cardinal of Parma the enjoyment of the palace of St. Lawrence in Lucina, with the revenues attached to it; they promised the cardinal of Milan, to appoint him archpriest of St. John's of the Lateran, and to give him the legation of Avignon; and finally, the cardinal of St. Peter in Bonds, reserved for himself the domains of Farno, with five adjoining territories, and the rank of generalissimo of the armies of the Holy See. In this way the cardinal of Melfe received a majority of the suffrages, and was proclaimed pope, by the name of Innocent the Eighth.

John Baptist Cibo was born at Genoa, of Grecian parents, who had placed him, when very young, in the service of the king of Sicily. As the young Cibo was very handsome, the people of Alphonso had initiated him early into debauchery. He afterwards passed into the service of the cardinal, Philip Calendrin, who made him his minion, and thanks to the aid of this new protector, he had elevated himself, little by little, to the highest ecclesiastical dignities.

Innocent the Eighth had sixteen bastards when he reached the sovereign pontificate. After the example of his predecessor, his first care, as soon as he was installed in the Vatican, was to provide his lineage with benefices, bishoprics, and principalities; to some he gave duchies and counties; to others whole provinces; he even wished to seize on a part of Abruzzza, a dependency of the kingdom of Naples, for his bastard, Francis. This inconceivable arrogance of the Holy See, irritated Ferdinand, who at first protested in respectful terms against it; but when the pope replied insolently to him through his ambassadors, that a sovereign had always a right to dispose of his dominions, notwithstanding the wishes of his feudatory, the king of Naples levied troops, and declared that he would forcibly repulse the encroachments of the Holy See. In fact, he attacked all the lords suspected of being in correspondence with the court of Rome, and prohibited his subjects from paying the tribute to which he had assented on his investiture of the kingdom.

As the pontiff needed large sums to carry on this war, he thought to procure them by following the route marked out by his predecessor. He multiplied the ecclesiastical employments, and adjudged them to the highest bidder. He added twenty-six secretaries to those whom Sixtus had already created, and fifty-two sealers of bulls. He also collected tithes for a crusade against the Turks; and his numerous legates once more laid contributions on Jews and Christians; on the one for a thirtieth part of their possessions, and on the other for a twentieth.

They protested in France against the exactions of the legates of the Holy See, and the states-general having assembled at Tours, John of Retz, a canon of Notre Dame, in Paris, besought King Charles the Eighth, the successor of Louis the Eleventh, in the name of the clergy, to have mercy on the Gallican church, and to protect it against the attacks of the Roman vultures. The third estate also protested against the enormous transportation of silver, which the legates of the Holy See were sending out of the kingdom, and addressed energetic representations to him concerning it. But the prayers of the people, and the representations of the prelates, were alike useless. Charles, who had already planned the conquest of Italy, and who wished to use the holy father as an ally, listened in preference to the representations of the pontifical court, in regard to the refusal of the magistrates of Provence, to pay tithes for the crusade. This good understanding was, however, of short duration; and the treaty of peace which the pope concluded with the king of Naples, cooled the diplomatic intimacy between Charles and Innocent, although his holiness had specified in the treaty, that he reserved the right to furnish provisions to the French, and to give them a free passage whenever they desired to recover the kingdom of Naples.

This disgraceful peace, agreed to by Ferdinand only to gain time, and to recover from the defeats he had experienced, increased even the implacable hatred he bore the pope, and he sought every method of hurling him from the pontifical throne. For this purpose his agents sowed divisions in Rome, employed by turns gold, promises, and threats, to induce the cardinals to join his party, and, spreading through Italy writings which unveiled all the turpitude of the holy father, had even allied himself secretly with the Florentines, the duke of Milan, and several princes, who were hostile to Innocent. At length, when he judged himself to be in a position to retake the offensive, he declared sharply to the pope, that he had never intended to fulfil the terms of the treaty concluded with the apostolic court, and chased off the Roman collectors whom he found in his kingdom. Innocent immediately lanced a bull of excommunication against him, deposed him from the throne as a bastard and usurper, and gave the crown of Naples to the king of France, as the sole legitimate sovereign. Ferdinand, to sustain himself in his quarrel with the pope, had become reconciled to the grandees of his kingdom, and had even set the count and countess of Montford at liberty. Still more, he had sowed the seeds of rebellion in the states of the pope, so that his enemy, having full occupation at Rome, could not direct all his forces against Campania. Moreover, at his instigation, his son-in-law, Mathias, king of Hungary, sent to summon his holiness to revoke the unjust censures which he had pronounced against Ferdinand; and on his refusal to obey, Mathias immediately arrested, as guilty of the crime of lese-majesty, such of the prelates of his kingdom as were suspected of favouring the policy of the court of Rome.

Whilst the holy father was labouring to overthrow the king of Naples as an usurper, through a contradiction not surprising to those who know the tortuous policy of the court of Rome, he was confirming the earl of Richmond in possession of that throne, which that prince, the conqueror of Richard the Third, had assumed to himself by his marriage with Elizabeth of York, the daughter of Edward the Fourth. Presents and gold decided the pope to legitimatise this usurpation, and to authorise a marriage regarded as incestuous by the church, on account of the connection of the parties. His holiness declared, that by the plenitude of his apostolic power, he made regular every thing which could be attainted of irregularity in the new dynasty, and that he legitimatised all the children born or to be born of this union. He enjoined on all the citizens of Great Britain to obey their new sovereign, under penalty of anathema, and blessed those who aided it against its enemies.

After having despatched the bulls solicited by the ambassadors of Henry the Seventh, the holy father recommenced the war against Ferdinand, in order to secure a part of the estates of that prince for his bastard Francis. To attain his end more readily, he first sought to restore peace to Upper Italy, by making himself an offensive and defensive alliance with the Venetians for twenty-five years, and he also brought about an arrangement between Venice and the duke of Austria. He was less successful in his negotiations with a leader of adventurers, named Bucolini. This lord, after having ravaged a part of Romagna, at the head of some banditti, had established himself in the city of Osimo, an important place in the March of Ancona, from whence he made frequent incursions on the Roman states. The holy father knew that Bucolini was allied with Bajazet, and had promised that sultan, to subjugate for him the shore of the Adriatic, and even to conquer Italy, if he would disembark ten thousand Turks on the shores of Romagna, a plan which seriously disquieted the court of Rome. In order to prevent its being realised, Innocent determined to invest the retreat of this bandit, and sent the general, James Trivulcius, and the cardinal Julian, to attack Osimo with twelve thousand horse, with whom Louis Sforza and the cardinal of Balue, had united eight thousand foot. But the skill and courage of the garrison triumphed over the assailants, and after a siege of seven months, the generals of the pope were obliged to raise it in disgrace. Innocent, who was never in any difficulty as to the means, wrote to his lieutenants, that if they were unable to conquer his enemy, they must buy him, for he knew how to get back the money they should give as soon as the banditti were out of the place.

Conferences then took place between the besiegers and Bucolini; the bishop of Arezzo offered him seven thousand crowns of gold to surrender Osimo, and break off his treaty with Bajazet. He imprudently agreed to the terms, left the city, disbanded his soldiers, and went to Milan with the money of the holy father. Two days after his arrival, he was found hung to the casement of his window; it was rumoured that he had himself finished his days, but the truth was, that during the night, a prostitute, aided by some sbirri, had strangled him, to recover for his holiness the seven thousand crowns of gold he had given him.

Innocent united to his other vices a naturally sanguinary disposition, and a ferocity which appeared in the briefs he addressed to the bishop of Brescia and the inquisitor of Lombardy, in order to engage them to persecute the heretics, and to publish a crusade against the Vaudois of the valley of the Loire. Perrin thus relates this persecution:—

“Albert, archdeacon of Cremona, having been sent into France by Innocent the Eighth, to exterminate the Vaudois, obtained authority from the king, to proceed against them without any judicial forms, and solely with the assistance of James de Lapalu, lieutenant of the king, and the counsellor Maitre Jean Rabot. These three wretches, the legate, the lieutenant of the king, and the counsellor, went to the valley of the Loire, at the head of a band of fierce soldiers, to exterminate the inhabitants, but they found no one; on their approach, the unhappy heretics had fled with their children into the mountains which crown this fertile valley, and had concealed themselves in the depths of the numerous natural caverns which are found on their tops. The archdeacon and his two acolytes then pursued them as if they had been chasing a fox, and every time they discovered a subterranean cavern in which the unfortunate Vaudois were concealed, they closed the entrance with heaps of straw or dry wood and set it on fire. In this manner these unfortunates were suffocated by the smoke; or if they endeavoured to escape from the caverns which were to become their tombs, they were received with blows from the pikes of the soldiers, and driven back into the flames.

"The terror which this punishment inspired became so great, that most of the Vandois, who had so far escaped the researches of the envoys of the pope, murdered themselves, or cast themselves into the abysses of the mountains, to avoid being wasted alive. When the executioners had no wood with which to stifle their victims in this horrible hunt, they contented themselves with closing up the entrances to the caverns with rocks, or with walling up the cisterns; so that afterwards, after the departure of the legate, when they made excavations in the mountains, they found more than eight hundred dead bodies of young children, stifled in their cradles or in the arms of their mothers, dead like them from fire or famine. The executioners did their work so well, that of the six thousand Vandois who peopled this fertile valley, there remained but six hundred to weep over the death of their brethren. All the property of these unfortunates was divided between Jacques de Lapalu, the archdeacon of Cremona, and Maître Jean Rabot; each of them also received tokens of the munificence of the sovereign, and the legate obtained the dignity of bishop, as a reward for having fulfilled his duties with vigour and energy."

Though occupied with persecuting the heretics, his holiness none the less continued his war against the king of Naples, and, the more easy to accomplish his end, had organised a vast conspiracy in the dominions of Ferdinand. Unfortunately for the pope, a traitor revealed the plot, and all the Neapolitan prelates, who had entered into the conspiracy, were massacred at a festival to which the prince had invited them. Ferdinand ordered the dead bodies to be cast into the sea, to conceal their death, and in order to prevent a revolt of the people, his agents gave out that they were only prisoners in a fortress. At first, on the news of this arrest, the pope demanded loudly from the prince, that the ecclesiastics should be set at liberty, and on his refusal to obey his injunctions, he excommunicated him a second time; then when he discovered the whole truth, and was assured of the massacre of the bishops of his party, he no longer restrained his violence; he called down all the curses of heaven on the head of the usurper, published a crusade against him, and invited Charles the Eighth to hasten his coming into Italy, to avenge him on his implacable foe.

As the king of France was still at war with the emperor Maximilian, and found it impossible to dispose of his troops to second the plans of the Holy See, Innocent, who under other circumstances would have encouraged the division between these two princes, interposed between them and caused them to come to a suspension of hostilities. The holy father also solicited the aid of the arms of Ferdinand and Isabella, but unsuccessfully. These two sovereigns said that their wars with the Moors would not permit them to weaken their armies. Innocent was no more successful in the extraordinary levy of dimes which he had ordered in France; the parliament of Paris courageously opposed the collection of this impost, and represented firmly to the king, that it was odious and impolitic to permit the Roman clergy to seize on all the wealth of France to carry it into Italy. The sovereign was compelled to listen to these remonstrances; the money went no more to Rome, but the people gained nothing by it; Charles continued to levy the tithes, and appropriated them to his own use, in order, as he said, ironically, to show his deference for the parliament, which was unwilling that the money should leave the kingdom.

The affairs of the holy father were taking a very bad turn, and he was already devising means to reconcile himself with the king of Naples, when an event occurred which made the balance preponderate in his favour, and increased considerably his influence in Europe. As we have seen, after the death of Mohammed the Second, his two sons, Bajazet and Zizim, disputed for the throne of the caliphs, and caused rivers of blood to flow: Zizim had been at last defeated, and forced to take refuge in Egypt, from whence he went to Rhodes, and then to France. Afterwards, the grand master of Rhodes, who was sold to the court of Rome, persuaded him he would be in greater safety in Italy than in the dominions of Charles the Eighth, and he determined to place himself under the protection of Innocent. He came to the apostolic city accompanied by the grand prior of the order of the knights of St. John of Jerusalem. He was presented to holiness at a public consistory, where, according to custom, the grand master of the ceremonies informed him through an interpreter, that he must salute the pontiff by kissing his feet. This the Mussulman prince refused to do, swearing by the beard of Mahomet that he would not touch such a dirty baboon. The dragoman did not judge it prudent to translate the oath of Zizim; he merely announced that the young prince demanded to be excused from the humiliating ceremonial of kissing the feet. Innocent waived this form, and his joy at having the Mussulman prince in his power was so great, that he promised him all he asked, and even engaged, by a solemn oath, to re-instate him on the throne of Constantinople.

Innocent well understood all the advantage he could draw from his prisoner; he at first used him to extort from Bajazet an annual tribute, by threatening him to raise the west in behalf of his brother, and compelled him to conclude a treaty, by which the Sublime Porte was obliged to furnish him with troops whenever he required them. He still, however, made use of the crusade against the Turks to extort new subsidies from the people, and whilst his emissaries were negotiating with the sultan to sell him peace, he was sending legates to all the courts of Europe, commissioned to announce to kings and republics the convocation of a general council at Rome, for the day of the Annunciation of the Virgin, in the year 1489.

Embassadors came together from all parts, and every kingdom, every province, every city of any importance, was represented by its deputies or bishops. It was decreed in this synod, that all Christians should, in accordance with their resources, contribute money, arms or provisions for the expenses of the war against the infidels, and that the holy father should receive full authority to levy annates or tithes, to make collections, to sell indulgences, dispensations and privileges, so far as he judged it necessary for the interests of the crusade. Innocent did not fail to make full use of the authority of the council, and he reaped so rich a harvest in France, Germany, Spain, Hungary, Bohemia, Poland, and England, that he was obliged to add several rooms to the buildings of the apostolic treasury to hold the tons of gold and silver sent in by his collectors. Never had the preaching of a crusade been so productive, and that was owing to the presence of the prince Zizim at Rome, which gave an appearance of truth to the plans of the holy father. To increase his happiness, his negotiations in the east were as successful as his preachings in the west, and the sultan Bajazet, who feared lest he might execute his threats, determined to pay him the tribute which he demanded, and as a proof of his friendship, sent him rich presents in gold, silver, and precious stones; his ambassadors were also accompanied by thirty beautiful Circassian slaves, whom he generously presented to the pope and his cardinals. The ambassadors of the sultan were received with distinction by the officers of the Holy See, who went to meet them a mile without the walls of the city.

Besides this tribute, and these magnificent presents, Bajazet gave to the holy father a hundred and sixty thousand crowns of gold to defray the table expenses of Zizim. Some days afterwards his holiness received an embassy from the sultan of Egypt, who sent to offer to ransom Zizim for four hundred thousand ducats, and to surrender the city of Jerusalem in full to the Christians; he took moreover a solemn pledge to surrender to the pope all the conquests he might make from Bajazet, even Constantinople itself. The intention of the sultan was to place Zizim at the head of his troops, and dethrone the sultan, who was his most formidable foe. Innocent accepted the money of the Egyptians, promised to send the young prince to Cairo as soon as he could do so conveniently, and dismissed them.

Although these negotiations had been kept secret, something of them still transpired. The chief of the Turkish embassy discovered that his holiness had promised to set Zizim at liberty on the payment of an enormous ransom. He then determined to outbid the Egyptians, and offered the pope six hundred thousand crowns of gold to permit him to poison the brother of the sultan. Authors say that Innocent was capable of committing any crime for money; he did not, then, reject this odious proposal. He took the six hundred thousand crowns, and gave the required permission, exacting, however, that he should furnish the means to be used in the execution of the plot. It was told his holiness that an officer of the palace, named Christopher Macrin, already gained over to the cause of Bajazet, had promised to mix poison in the water used by the prince at table. "Innocent," says Raynaldi, "approved of every thing. The ambassador caused him to send poison to the assassin on the appointed day. But the holy father, who derived large sums from the existence of his prisoner, had no intention of depriving him self of them. In the evening Christopher Macrin was arrested by the guards of the pope and at once put to the torture. The unfortunate man avowed his crime, and was condemned to be torn by hot pincers, and to be quartered on the public square. After the punishment his members were nailed to the gates of the city. This great rascality," adds the historian, "broke off the negotiations, and the next day the ambassadors embarked for Constantinople, publishing every where that the pope was an unblushing robber."

On his side Innocent published every where, that their anger arose from his having refused the alliance of Bajazet. His legates propagated this story every where, and it served to stimulate the levy of the tenths. The cares and pains which the holy father took to increase his treasures did not, however, absorb all his attention, and did not prevent him from pursuing his plans against the kingdom of Naples. His new returns permitted him to assemble a formidable army, and resume the offensive. In this extremity Ferdinand discovered that his best plan was to submit to the pope, and surrender to him the domains which he wished to erect into a principality for his bastard. The king of Arragon consented to be the mediator between him and the Holy See, and peace was concluded at Rome in the month of February, 1491.

Thus did the infamous Innocent triumph over his foe, and the oldest of his bastards was recognised as a prince. But divine justice had marked out the termination of his crimes, and he died on the 25th of July, 1491, from an attack of apoplexy. Stephen Infesura maintains, that the holy father in his last sickness attempted to reanimate the sources of life by means of a frightful beverage, composed by a Jewish physician with the blood of three young boys of ten years old, who were murdered for the purpose. Onuphre and Ciaconius relate the same fact, which they place at an earlier period.

We have reached a period in the history of the Roman pontiffs, which may be regarded as that in which intelligence commenced replacing ignorance in the See of St. Peter; and we must also say, that it is the one in which the corruption of the clergy reached a height which it had not before attained. Before the reign of Alexander the Sixth, the chiefs of the clergy were already neglectful of the care of their flock; but after the time of that pope we shall see them abandoning entirely religious discussions to cast themselves into political struggles, and turn their attention to strategy, finance, the organization of armies, fortifications, and other worldly sciences, which alone could maintain them on the dishonoured chair of St. Peter. For themselves, there exists but one God; it is gold; its worship, debauchery and murder. They have no longer belief or religion; it matters little to them whether a people believe in the Bible, the Evangelists, or the Koran. They despoil all, be they Jews, Christians, or Turks; they no longer condemn heretics to the scaffold from fanaticism, but from avarice. They massacre, indifferently, the rich whose fortunes they covet, and the poor whose energy they fear. We are, finally, entering upon a period in which the theocracy reached the apogee of its power, and in which, far from concealing its perfidies, corruption, and cruelties in the dark, it exposes them to the light of day, and even glories in them.

The pope, who best comprehended this new phase of the pontificate, is beyond all contradiction the successor of Innocent the Eighth, the execrable Roderick Borgia. He was descended, on his mother's side, from the Spanish family of Borgia, which had already occupied the pontifical throne in the person of Calixtus the Third. Some authors maintain that he was the offspring of an incestuous commerce between the pontiff and his sister Joanna, who was married to a certain Godfrey Lenzuolo of Valencia; and that his holiness, wishing to bequeath to him his name, obliged his brother-in-law to abandon his own name, and take that of Borgia.

From his infancy Roderick was the subject of assiduous care, and was confided to skilful masters, who developed his intellect, and made a remarkable advocate of him. Unfortunately, on becoming a man, he took a turn entirely opposed to every thing good, and employed his admirable talents in defending immoral and scandalous causes. Soon his profession even became insupportable to him, because it compelled him to place a certain restriction on his morals; and he threw himself into the career of arms, being made an officer of a free company, that he might the more readily abandon himself to his taste for debauchery.

It is supposed that it was at this time he entered into a liason with a remarkable beautiful Spanish lady, who was a widow, with two daughters. After having seduced the mother, he corrupted her children, and initiated them into his horrid pleasures; then, when his mistress died, he freed himself from the eldest of the daughters by placing her in a convent, and kept near him the handsomest and the youngest, named Rosa Vanozza. He had five children by her, Francis, Cæsar, Lucretia, Godfrey, and another who died when young.

Roderick scandalised Spain with his debaucheries for almost seven years, when he heard of the elevation of his uncle Calixtus to the throne of Saint Peter. Seeing at once the immense fortune which this event promised him, he hastened to send a letter of congratulation, in which he besought his holiness to preserve his affection for him. Calixtus replied to his nephew, that he must come at once to Rome, where an important post in the government of the church awaited him, and with his message he sent him a brief, which gave him a benefice that brought him an annual revenue of twelve thousand crowns. This sum, joined to an annual revenue of thirty thousand ducats, which he derived from the property of the family, permitted him to maintain the establishment of a prince. He did not hesitate to obey his uncle's orders; but, as he was unwilling to be separated entirely from his dear Vanozza and his children, and as he understood the necessity there was for his concealing his intrigues in the new part he was about to play, he determined to send them to Venice, where he hoped to be enabled to visit them sometimes without exciting suspicions.

He went alone to Rome, installed himself in a magnificent palace, and became one of the most assiduous courtiers of the holy father, which gave rise to strange rumours in regard to the nature of their relations. The rigidity of morals, however, which he affected, and the mask of hypocrisy which he wore, imposed on the mass, and he even acquired the reputation of an holy person, in despite of his enemies, or rather of those who had penetrated his real character. He was endowed with an eloquence so charming, and urged his doctrines with such skill, that he captivated the minds of those most hostile to him, and had no great difficulty in becoming master of the will of Calixtus. Whilst concealing his ambitious plans beneath the appearance of humility, he was appointed archbishop of Valencia, vice chancellor of the church, and finally, cardinal deacon of St. Nicholas, "in carcere Tulliano," with a pension of twenty-eight thousand crowns of gold; this, with the profits of his metropolitan see, and his place as vice chancellor, rendered his fortune one of the largest in Rome.

From this moment Roderick, the debauchee student of Valencia, the advocate of robbers and assassins, the pillaging and incendiary soldier, the incestuous lover of Rosa Vanozza, thought seriously of making his way to the apostolic throne. From this time he affected the life of a veritable anchorite; he never appeared in public, but with his hands crossed on his breast and his eyes bent to the ground; his language became unctuous and serious; he visited churches, hospitals, and the dwellings of the poor, scattering every where abundant alms, and giving out that at his death the unfortunate should be his heirs; and, finally, he exhibited such profound contempt for wealth, and so great a love for religion and morality, that the Roman people, accustomed for so many ages to be deceived by the priests, allowed themselves to be deceived by his hypocrisy, and proclaimed him a Solomon for wisdom, a Job for patience, and a Moses for the publication of the law of God.

He showed great indefatigability in the duties of his office; he was never absent from consistories or audiences, he conformed always with the sentiments of others, and sought every means to call out their good qualities. By turns grave, light, serious, and playful, he was the charm of the meetings at the Vatican, and created for himself partizans among the cardinals, the ambassadors, and the Italian lords who frequented the court of the holy father. Never did a man know better than he how to conceal his passions beneath an impenetrable mask, nor show more constancy and tenacity in his plans than he.

Whilst he was playing adroitly with the credulity of men, he was carrying on a correspondence with his mistress, which has come down to us, and in which he gave his reasons for the farce he was playing at Rome. "Rosa, my well beloved, imitate my example; remain chaste until it shall become in my power to reseek thee, and mingle our love in infinite pleasures. Let no other mouth profane thy charms, no other hand raise those veils which conceal my sovereign good; a little more patience, and he who is called my uncle will bequeath me the chair of St. Peter as a heritage. In the mean time take great pains with the education of our children, for they are destined to govern people and kings."

Notwithstanding the profound judgment of Roderick, his provisions were not realised on the death of Calixtus; his youth, and perhaps even the rigidity which he affected in his morals, prevented the suffrages from being given to him, and Pius the Second obtained the tiara. During this pontificate he exercised no influence over the government of the church, and applied himself solely to increasing the immense wealth which his uncle had left him, and on which he seized. Pius the Second died ; Paul the Second succeeded him, then came Sixtus the Fourth. During this last reign he bought the rich abbey of Subiaco, and the legation of Arragon and Castile. But he was at the end of his efforts, and being unable longer to endure the constraint he had imposed upon himself, he returned to his course of life, as a captain of adventurers, and committed so many murders and rapes, that Henry the Feeble, king of Castile, drove him out of Spain.

On his return to Rome, having nothing more to conceal, he brought Rosa Vanozza and his five children to him ; only, to keep up appearances, he gave them a palace in a retired quarter, and his mistress took the title of the countess Ferdinand, of Castile, from the name of his intendant, who passed for her husband. Every night, under the pretext of visiting this gentleman, his countryman, the cardinal went to the residence of his mistress, where he passed, they said, whole nights in his orgies with Vanozza, and, eternal shame, with his daughter Lucretia.

Sixtus the Fourth died, Innocent the Eighth succeeded him, without any change in the infamous conduct of Roderick Borgia ; it is true that his debaucheries were unnoticed in the midst of the Saturnalia of the pontifical court. Rome had become an immense brothel, in which were fifty thousand prostitutes ; the streets and lanes were peopled with cut-throats and assassins, the roads were infested by banditti, so that on the death of Innocent, when the cardinals wished to assemble in conclave, they were obliged first to place soldiers in their palaces, and to plant cannon in the avenues to them, to preserve their sumptuous residences from pillage. As soon as the conclave was formed, they guarded with horse and foot soldiers the suburbs adjoining the Vatican, and closed all the approaches to it with enormous beams.

These precautions being taken, they proceeded to the election of a pope ; the bishop of Pampeluna was at first proposed as a candidate, but Roderick, who had already bought the suffrages of several cardinals, protracted matters and arranged them so as to assure himself of a majority of the votes. To some he gave palaces, to others castles, land, and money ; the cardinal Orsino sold his vote for the castles of Monticelli and Sariani ; Ascanius Sforza exacted the vice chancellorship of the church ; the cardinal of Colonna demanded, for his vote, the rich abbey of St. Benedict, as well as the domains and right of patronage for himself and family for ever ; the cardinal of St. Angelo claimed the bishopric of Porto, and the tower which was a dependency on it, with a cellar full of wine. The cardinal of Parma received the city of Nepi ; Savelli received the government of Citta Castellana, and of the church of St. Mary the Greater ; a monk of Venice who had obtained the cardinalate, sold his vote for five thousand ducats of gold and the promise of passing a night with Lucretia, the daughter of Borgia, to which he assented. Having thus bought up the sacred college he was proclaimed pope by the name of Alexander the Sixth.

"At last," exclaimed he, "I am pope, the vicar of Christ on earth."

"Yes, holy father," replied Sforza, "you are so most canonically, and we hope by your election to have given repose to the church, and joy to Christendom, as you have been chosen by the Holy Spirit as the worthiest of all your brethren."

Roderick replied, "Though the burden with which we are loaded is heavy, we hope that God will grant to us, as to St. Peter, the strength to bear it gloriously. We have no doubt of the aid we shall derive from the concurrence of your abilities, and especially from your obedience, which we trust will be such, that we shall never be compelled to remind you, that the flock of Christ should be blindly submissive to the prince of the apostles."

He then clothed himself in his pontifical ornaments, and seized the tiara with so much eagerness, that the cardinal de Medicis could not avoid saying to Lorenzo :—

"I fear, my brother, that we are surrendered to the most voracious wolf in the world, and he will doubtless devour us, if we do not hinder it by prompt flight."

As soon as the ceremonies of the enthronement and of the pierced chair were over, the new pontiff gave his blessing to the clergy, and entered his palace in triumph. All the streets on the route were hung with rich tapestry and strewed with flowers, the public places were dressed with banners, and the stupid crowd rent the air with acclamations. The delight of the Romans was shared by the different courts of Europe, and all the Christian princes sent solemn embassies to the pope, to congratulate him on his exaltation.

Ferdinand of Naples was the only one who foresaw the infamies of this reign, and who abstained from any act of deference towards Alexander the Sixth. He unfortunately predicted what came to pass, for Roderick Borgia, having become pope, no longer placed any restraint upon his passions. He trampled under foot all laws, human and divine, he unveiled the mysteries of his monstrous amours, he audaciously installed in the Vatican his mistress, his daughter Lucretia, and his other children, and showed himself to be avaricious, knavish, implacable, debauched, cruel, or rather fierce, for Paul Langius affirms, that he turned Rome into a slaughter-house. What had he to fear ? Had he not been proclaimed supreme father of the faithful, king of kings, vicar of God on earth, the infallible pontiff ?

The ruling passion in the mind of Alexander the Sixth, was an unmeasured ambition for the elevation of his bastards. He was scarcely seated on the pontifical throne, when he loaded them with riches and honours. Francis, the eldest, was created duke of Candia and prince of Beneventum ; Caesar, his second son, who was, next to Lucretia, the object of his most tender care, was made a cardinal and archbishop of Valencia, in Spain. But this districession of titles and benefices was only the beginning of an immense plan which he had formed. His ambition coveted for his bastards the sovereignty of Naples, Venice, Florence, all Italy; thus he dreamed of but victories and conquests, and these thoughts had determined him to take the name of Alexander, which recalled the greatest conqueror of antiquity.

Italy, that magnificent country, so bounteously provided for by Heaven, though degenerate and shorn of its ancient splendour, was still the constant subject of desire to the sovereigns of Europe, who multiplied unceasingly its troubles and intestine divisions. It is true, that the situation of the country assisted in marvellously prolonging these incessant struggles and civil wars, which arose on all sides, at the least encroachment on the self-love of the small princes or the Italian republics. The necessity of maintaining the respective independence of each state, was the result of a refined policy, which entwined Italy and bent its people beneath an insupportable yoke. Venice was distinguished among all the cities for its oligarchical government, a mixture of nobles and merchants; its Council of Ten had carried the art of deceiving the people, and of using men for the advantage and well-being of a privileged caste, so that neither before nor since, has any one surpassed them in the art of duping mankind; and to characterise this period, it is enough to say, that Machiavel, that abominable preceptor of tyrants, flourished in it.

This most serene republic had, like the holy father, ambitious views and plans to realise; its attention was turned unceasingly towards Romagna, of which it already possessed a large part, and towards the duchy of Milan, a fief of the empire, then ruled by the weak John Galeas, under the tutelage of his uncle, the ambitious Louis Sforza; it dreamed of wresting from him the states of Parma, Placenza, and Genoa, then dependencies of the Milanese; and even without avowing it, it foresaw the moment in which the republic of Florence, tired of obeying the Medici, would wish to reunite with Venice. On the other hand, the kingdom of Naples, which alone, was sufficiently important to exercise a salutary influence over the other states, was placed in a most critical position in consequence of the national hatred towards the king. Thus was Italy threatened with ruin on all sides, and Venice, the sovereign of the Adriatic, hoped soon to ornament its diadem with the flowers of other crowns; Rome even did not give it umbrage, and it regarded with calmness the successors of the apostles in the apostolic city, and their processions of minions, bastards, and courtisans.

The papacy, however, was to teach the Venetians, so proud of their greatness, that God sports with the combinations of men, and that which appeared to lead infallibly to the ruin of the popes, that double character of king and priest which they have united in their persons, became, in the hands of Alexander the Sixth, a powerful lever, which he used to break down the formidable wall of that republic.

Roderick Borgia, gradually, and without chief even having need of recourse to temporal arms or spiritual thunders, but simply by his prudent and Machiavelian course, triumphed over Venice, and re-established the preponderance of the Holy See in Italy. We must admit, also, that this was difficult to accomplish, for the long sojourn of the popes at Avignon, the multiplied attempts at revolt by the Roman people, the grants obtained from emperors and pontiffs by the vicar barons of the Holy See, had considerably diminished the domains of the church and the revenues of the apostolic treasury. Alexander at once applied all his care to restore the integrity of the pontifical states. He then determined to overthrow the authority of the neighbouring petty princes, among whom were the Bentivogli of Bologna, the Malatesta of Rimini, the Manfredi of Faenza, the Colonna of Ostia, the Montefeltri of Urbino, and, finally, the Vitelli, Savelli, and several others who owned rich provinces.

Before, however, engaging in contest against all these families, the pope was desirous of obtaining strong assistance by contracting alliances with powerful princes. He first addressed himself to Ferdinand, king of Naples, and taking advantage of the alarm, which the armaments of the king of France, who was preparing to invade his kingdom, caused him, he offered him the aid of an army, on condition that his son Alphonso, duke of Calabria, should give his daughter in marriage to the youngest of the bastards of the holy father, with a dowry in the kingdom of Naples.—His proposition having been rejected in insulting terms, Alexander turned his views in another direction, and formed a defensive league with the tutor of John Galeas, duke of Milan, and the most serene republic. It was a difficult matter to conclude an alliance between Rome and Venice; thanks, however, to Alexander's skill in diplomacy, the difficulties were overcome, and the treaty was signed between the republic, the court of Rome, and the duchy of Milan.

Alphonso of Calabria and Peter de Medicia, alarmed at the consequences of a league, which threatened the political existence of the other states, sought to break it; for this purpose they received joyfully proposals from Fabricio Colonna, Prosper his brother, and the cardinal of St. Peter in Bonds, avowed enemies to the pontiff, who engaged to deliver Rome with the assistance of the party of the Guelphs and the Ursini, if the army of Alphonso could in three days present itself before the walls of the holy city.

The old king, Ferdinand, with his prudent foresight, had opposed this plan, and desired to make peace with Alexander on any terms; unfortunately death overtook him at the moment when he was renewing negotiations with the pope. His holiness would, doubtless, have easily arranged a new treaty, since the opposing interests of the contracting parties had

Second, induced grave discussions between the court of Rome and the Venetians. Afterwards, when the new king of Naples had been informed that France had entered into the league, he was desirous of repairing the fault he had committed, and re-opened the negotiations commenced by his father with the court of Rome. The conditions were, however, no longer the same, and his pride, which had before revolted at the idea of giving the hand of his young daughter, Donna Dancha, to Godfrey Borgia, was obliged to bend before the exigencies of his position, and he sent to give his consent to the proposed marriage, to bestow the principality of Squillace and the countship of Cariati on the young couple, to make a rich gift in benefices to Caesar, and a pension of five thousand ducats to Francis, duke of Candia, with the promise of one of the first posts in the kingdom and the command of his armies. These offers of the king were accepted by his holiness, who demanded in advance ten thousand ducats, of which he had pressing need.

Public feasts and rejoicings took place at Rome, on account of the marriage of Godfrey Borgia, and the holy father displayed such magnificence in the matter that he entirely emptied the treasury of the church. He then had recourse to the expedients which popes and kings usually employ to refill their coffers; he increased the imposts and oppressed the unfortunate people; he then tried a new publication of a crusade, and however improbable it may appear, after having been robbed by the popes for forty years, under the pretence of wars against the Turks which never took place, the stupid people still brought enormous sums to the Vatican, and nourished the licentious displays of the bastards of Alexander and his cherished Lucretia.

It was at this time, in the year 1492, that an extraordinary event occurred; the discovery of a new continent by the celebrated Christopher Columbus, and at about the same period the Portuguese, Vasco de Gama, prosecuted the discoveries of Henry the Navigator, of Cavellas, and of Bartholomew Diaz, doubled the cape of Good Hope, passed to India through the Mozambique channel, and changed entirely the route and form of the commerce of the world.

The Portuguese had followed the Spaniards to the continent discovered by Columbus, and were disputing with them by arms for this rich prey. As their interest, however, induced them not to make too much noise about their quarrel, the king of Portugal, John the Second, and Ferdinand the Catholic, agreed to refer the settlement of the boundaries of their new empires to the pope.

Alexander the Sixth consented to act as the mediator of peace between the two countries; he traced a line which passed from pole to pole through the Azores, or Western islands, and decreed, by virtue of his universal omnipotence, that all the countries which were beyond this line, that is, the West Indies, or America, should belong to the king of Spain, and those on this side, that is, the East Indies and the shores of Africa, to the king of Portugal. His holiness imposed no other condition on this magnificent gift than the immediate payment of a large sum of money, and an engagement by the Spaniards and Portuguese to convert, willingly, or by force, the inhabitants to Christianity. Sixty years after the publication of this bull, the execrable Spanish missionaries had murdered fifteen millions of victims in the new world, in obedience to the orders of the pope.

As soon as Alexander had repaired his treasury with the profits of the crusade, he was engaged in concluding a marriage between his daughter and John Sforza, lord of Pesaro, and as she had been affianced from her infancy to an Arragonese gentleman, by virtue of his apostolic power he freed her from her oath.

"At this marriage took place," says Stephen Infessura, "fetes and orgies worthy of Madame Lucretia. In the evening his holiness, the cardinal Borgia, the duke of Candia, some courtiers, and several noble ladies supped together, at which play actors and female dancers appeared, who represented obscene plays, to the great joy of the guests." (The recital of the after transactions are not proper to be translated.)

Alexander had consented to the marriage of his daughter because he was then ruled by a new passion for a young girl called the beautiful Wilhelmina, the sister of Alexander Farnese, whom this wretch had prostituted to him to purchase his pardon for a crime he had committed. The Farnese afterwards obtained a cardinal's hat, and we shall see him, in his turn, filling the apostolic chair, by the name of Paul the Third. Such is the origin of the great Farnese family, with which the first sovereign families of Europe have allied themselves.

Madame Lucretia, after her marriage, refused to go with the lord of Pesaro to his principality, and lived as before in the palace of the Vatican. "She no longer quitted the apartments of the holy father, by day or by night," adds Burchard, the master of ceremonies to Alexander, who registered carefully, hour by hour, all that occurred at the pontifical court.

Alexander granted to his cherished daughter, not only all that she asked, but even gave her the superintendence of the government of the church. She was present when the letters were opened and business despatched; she convoked the sacred college, and frequently, at the close of orgies, she presided over the council of the cardinals in the costume of a bacchante, with naked bosom, and her body scarcely covered by a muslin robe. In this condition she deliberated on subjects of licentiousness, and was not ashamed to give and receive, before them, caresses so immodest, that Burchard himself, habituated as he was to so many of such things, exclaims, in recording it, "Horror! ignominy! disgrace!"

Musulman ambassadors soon after arrived at Rome, commissioned by the sultan Bajazet to make overtures to the holy father to have the prince Zizim poisoned. The following was the letter of the Ottoman emperor:

"The sultan Bajazet, by the grace of God, the greatest king and caliph of the two continents of Asia and Europe, to the excellent lord Alexander, father of all Christians, by the gifts of Providence, and most worthy pontiff of the Roman church, reverence, kindness, and sincerity.

"I have, my lord, until now, payed with exactness to your holiness forty thousand ducats a year, for the support of my brother Zizim; but, as Innocent the Eighth, your predecessor, as I have been informed, whilst he was receiving large sums from me to guard that ambitious prince, was also listening to the proposals of the sultan of Egypt, and accepting his money to set Zizim at liberty, I am led to fear, lest one day your successor may furnish troops to my brother, to enable him to dispute my throne.

"Your envoys are well apprised of my apprehensions, and have advised me to address myself directly to you, to procure for my mind the tranquillity I so much need, and to put an end to the cause of my alarm. They have even induced me to hope that you would listen favourably to my propositions.

"I then pledge myself to give you three hundred thousand ducats, several cities, and the shirt of Jesus Christ, if your holiness will remove Zizim from the world in any way you may judge best. A signal service will thus be rendered to the prisoner himself, for according to the prophet, he should prefer death to servitude, and you, most illustrious lord, will not commit a crime, since, by your religion, Christians are ordered to exterminate heretics and infidels."

No authentic document containing the pontiff's reply remains, only Comines affirms that he accepted the offer of the caliph, and what appears to confirm this opinion is the knowledge afterwards acquired of a secret treaty between the courts of Rome and Constantinople, by which Bajazet engaged to furnish to the Holy See six thousand veteran cavalry, and as many infantry, to combat the French, who were preparing to invade the kingdom of Naples.

Charles the Eighth did not delay to enter Italy at the head of an army of thirty thousand men, assisted by an artillery force of a hundred and forty field pieces, and his progress was so rapid, that he had already conquered Lombardy before Alexander could obtain the means to resist him. In this extremity the holy father endeavoured to bring into play the arts of diplomacy, and sent ambassadors to the king of France, to enjoin on him to stop his march. Charles, however, undisturbed by the prohibition of the pope, continued his route towards Rome, whither his deputies had already preceded him, commissioned to demand from his holiness the investiture of the kingdom of Naples for their master.

Not only did Alexander reply that he would never accede to their proposal, and would oppose with all his power the passage of the French through his states, but when the chief of the embassy represented to him, that Charles, being the ally of Maximilian, could deprive him of his tiara, either by force, or by having him judged by a council as a simoniacal, adulterous, incestuous, robbing, and murdering pope, he was still unwilling to yield, and even spoke in reviling terms of Charles, in the presence of the minister of the king of Naples, of Lopez, his datary, and of the prince of Anhalt, the delegate of the empire. He had the boldness to accuse the king of France of having formed the ambitious project of placing the imperial crown on his own brow, and of overthrowing Maximilian from his throne. "As for myself," added he, "even were Charles to place a drawn sword at my throat, I would still oppose his execrable ambition. And you, prince of Anhalt," said he, addressing the ambassador of Germany, "it is your duty to inform your master of the designs of France, that in his capacity of protector of the church, he may join other Christian princes in defending our see, and preserving the rights of the empire, and the liberty of all Italy."

As was to be anticipated, his courage failed before the danger, and when the king of France presented himself on the borders of the ecclesiastical states, the pope dared not dispute his entrance. Finally, when he was beneath the walls of Rome, his holiness sent to him his master of ceremonies, his apostolical secretary, and the dean of the rota, to receive his orders. Charles caused the gates to be opened immediately, and entered the city armed at all points, with lances in rest, ensigns displayed, and trumpets sounding, escorted by his troops, who marched in close columns, followed by his formidable artillery.

His quarter masters billeted the troops, his prevosts placed sentinels in all the quarters, fixed the rounds and the patrols, erected scaffolds and racks, and published the ordinances of the prince to the sound of the trumpet, as if he had been in Paris. Though absolute master in Rome, the king had not yet seen Alexander, who had shut himself up, with his family, in the castle of San Angelo. A great number of prelates, among whom were Ascanius Sforza, vice chancellor of the church, the cardinals Julian de la Rovere, Gurch, St. Severin, Savelli, and Colonna, proposed to the king to judge and depose the pope, if he refused to submit. Twice even had the artillery been turned against the castle of San Angelo, to alarm him and conquer his obstinacy; but, says Comines, the prince refused to come to extremities. At length the pope yielded to the urgency of his son, Cesar Borgia, who represented to him how imminent was the danger of the ruin of their family, and consented to grant an audience to Charles the Eighth. The first interview commenced in this singular manner:—Alexander, to avoid embracing the king, as ceremony required, feigned to faint, and fell back on the sofa; Charles, on his side, took a seat near a window, until they had brought the holy father to by the use of salts. The conference then commenced, and they came to the following arrangements:—Alexander agreed to live in peace with his cardinals, to pay them the rights due them, to place in possession of the king the cities of Viterba, Civita Vecchia, Terracina, and Spoleto; not to confer any legation without his permission, to give cardinal's hats to two of Charles' captains, and to surrender the prince Zizim to him. His holiness, moreover, granted to him the investiture of the kingdom of Naples, and even granted to him the cardinal Borgia, his son, as a hostage for the execution of his promises. Charles then took the oath of obedience to the pope, and paid the ransom of Zizim; that done, he left Rome with all his troops, and went towards Naples. Eight days afterwards, when he was scarcely out of the territories of the church, the unfortunate Zizim yielded up his last breath. The pope had kept his promises religiously; he had engaged to give up his prisoner to Charles the Eighth, which he had done, having only poisoned him beforehand. In this way he obtained the ransom which was already paid by France, and the three hundred thousand ducats which had been offered him by the sultan of Constantinople.

On the next day, Cæsar Borgia, in defiance of his oath to remain with Charles, escaped from the French camp in disguise and returned to Rome, where the pope received him with the most extravagant demonstrations of love. Cæsar was the object of Alexander's preference, and he truly deserved it from the similitude of his character to that of the holy father. Like him, destitute of shame or modesty, he abandoned himself to all the licenses of his passions; like him, obstinate in his plans, implacable in his revenge, he erected crime into a political system, and recoiled before no atrocity; like him, ambitious and egotistical, he bent every thing to his selfishness, sacrificed every thing to his interest; morality and religion were in his hands but instruments, which he used for the success of his plans, and which he trampled under foot when they became useless to him. These two men, so well made for each other, had not, however, agreed upon one point; Alexander was desirous of bequeathing the papacy to his son, and Cæsar coveted an imperial crown, and all Italy for a kingdom. Cæsar was a prince of the church, and he would have given all his ecclesiastical honours for one of the secular titles with which his elder brother, the duke of Candia, was so abundantly provided. It was on this account that the cardinal had conceived a secret hatred against his brother, whose results we are to see.

This flight of Cæsar Borgia, and the poisoning of Zizim, greatly enraged Charles the Eighth, and he swore vengeance against the pontifical family. As his interests did not permit him to return at once to Rome, he put off the punishment of the pope to another time, and marched rapidly on Naples. The cowardly Alphonsus fled into Sicily on his approach, abdicating in favour of his son Ferdinand, to whom he left the defence of the capital. Naples, notwithstanding the efforts of the young prince, was carried by assault, and the rest of the kingdom was conquered with such marvellous facility, that Alexander said, that the French had made war with wooden spurs, and had chalked out their quarters, meaning thereby, that they would not long remain masters of Naples. He could, moreover, the better prophesy about it, since he had taken measures to make it true, by forming a formidable league among all the Christian powers against the king of France. The republic of Venice and the duke of Milan, had entered into the confederacy; Ferdinand the Catholic, Henry the Seventh, king of England, the archduke Philip and his son Maximilian, had also rallied to the support of the holy father.

Charles soon discovered the danger which menaced him, and to allay the storm, he wished to alarm his enemies by a daring blow. Leaving then a part of his troops in his new kingdom, under the command of the duke of Montpensier, whom he had created viceroy of Naples, he marched on Rome with nine thousand picked soldiers, to chastise the pope. The latter had been advised of his movement, and had fled with his family to Orvieto. The king remained but three days in the holy city, and went rapidly into Tuscany, and from thence to the duchy of Parma, where forty thousand of the confederates had assembled to dispute the passage.

Alexander, on his side, had returned to Rome as soon as he was informed of the departure of Charles, and as he considered himself strong enough, thanks to his allies, to dictate laws to him, he sent ambassadors instructed to inform him, that the conventions before agreed upon by them, were erased and annulled, on account of their having been imposed by force; he also ordered him to leave Italy immediately with all his troops, and to recall the garrisons which he had left in Apulia and Calabria, under penalty of being cited to appear before the pontifical justice, to hear himself excommunicated, interdicted, and deposed. The commissioners of the pontiff met Charles at Turin, on the very day of the victory of Fornova, in which ten thousand French had crushed an army of forty thousand men. The prince was still all covered with blood and dust when the legates came to summon him to go to Rome to render an account of his conduct to the sovereign pontiff. This was adding sarcasm to a hateful perfidy. "I will accept the invitation of the holy father," replied Charles to the deputies, "and I hope that he will await me, that I may have the honour of kissing his feet, of which I was deprived when I last passed through Rome."

This reply of the monarch showed the ambassadors that they could not return too quickly, if they did not wish to be treated as enemies. Notwithstanding his victory, Charles was obliged to return to France, and the kingdom of Naples had passed under the sway of Ferdinand the Second, in less time than it had taken the French to conquer it. Alexander, freed from his dreaded foe, turned all his thoughts to the accomplishments of his plans for the elevation of his family, and employed by turns treason, simony, force, and assassination, which form the usual train of popes and kings. At first, under the pretext that the Roman barons had betrayed their oaths of fidelity, by submitting to the French, he declared them deprived of all authority, and instructed the duke of Candia, whom he had appointed general of the church, to attack them, one after another in their fortresses, and to seize on their domains. The greater part, seeing the uselessness of resistance, surrendered, and were cowardly murdered; the Orsini alone disputed Romagna foot by foot.

His holiness was, at the same time, occupied in repairing the wretched state of his finances, and proceeded in it, with his second son, the cardinal Cæsar, in such a way as to exhibit how great was the genius of the Borgia, since they surpassed all the predecessors of Alexander in inventing a new mode of refilling the treasury of the Vatican. They published a law, declaring the Holy See the heir of the members of the sacred college; they then sold the cardinalship to the richest Romans, and then poisoned them to become their heirs. Alexander also carried on a large trade in crucifixes, relics, and indulgences, which brought him in considerable sums; he also sold, through his datary, Jean Baptiste Ferrara, the cardinal of Modena, ecclesiastical dignities, employments, and benefices, without troubling himself whether they were vacant or not; only in the latter case, poison or the dagger were employed on the prelate who refused to yield his place to him who had bought it. In his turn, Jean Baptiste Ferrara, the minister of iniquity, the instrument of pontifical despotism, received the chastisement of his crimes, and was poisoned by Cæsar Borgia, who coveted the immense wealth he had amassed in the exercise of his office.

Whilst his holiness and his son were making or breaking cardinals as their policy or their interest required, the duke of Candia was carrying on the war against the Orsini in Romagna, razing castles, destroying fortresses, pillaging towns, and forcing the people to submit to the Holy See. His atrocities, however, ended in exasperating the people; the citizens armed every where, and he was forced to retreat.

Alexander then called to his aid Gonzalvo de Cordova, who was in Italy with a formidable army, destined for the conquest of the kingdom of Naples; but instead of fighting the Orsini, the Spanish general treated with them, and constrained the holy father to ratify his engagements. To avenge himself for what he called treason, the pope was desirous of ridding himself of Gonzalvo de Cordova, and instructed him to drive the French from Ostia, in the hopes that he would there find his death. In fact, the enemy was so strongly entrenched in this position, that it appeared to be impossible to dislodge him; in less, however, than a month, after incredible efforts and prodigies of valour, the Spaniards rendered themselves masters of Ostia, and Gonzalvo returned to Rome to beseech the holy father to permit him to put an end to the war in Naples, and fulfil the wishes of King Ferdinand the Catholic. Alexander, who could not pardon the new glory he had acquired, refused his demand, and broke out into gross abuse of Ferdinand and Isabella, whom he said, were indebted to him for large sums, which he had lent them to bring their conspiracy against the foolish king of Castile to a successful issue. "Thus then, pope of Satan," replied Gonzalvo, "thou refusest to obey the sovereigns whose subject thou wert, before thou occupiedest the pontifical throne, through their protection? Tremble, senseless old man, lest they take a shining vengeance on this insolent tone." This done, the Spanish general retired quickly from the audience chamber, rejoined his army and marched on Naples.

Shortly after, news of the entire expulsion of the French from Italy, and of the death of King Ferdinand, was received at Rome.—By this event, the crown of Naples of right, reverted to an uncle of that prince, named Frederick, who hastened to send ambassadors to the court of Rome, to solicit the investiture of that kingdom. Before deciding the question regarding this crown, the pontiff, who had constantly in view the elevation of his family, exacted, that the consistory should make a decree investing the duke of Candia with the principality of Beneventum, and placing him in possession of a tribute of an hundred thousand crowns of gold, which the kings of Castile and Portugal paid yearly to the Holy See. Garcia Las, the Spanish ambassador, opposed this measure energetically, and protested, in the name of Ferdinand and Isabella, against the encroachments of the pontiff, and what surprised the cardinals most was, to see the protest of Spain supported by Cardinal Valentine. Notwithstanding their united efforts, however, the decree was made, and Francis, the eldest son of the pope, obtained the principality of Beneventum, with the countships of Terracina and Ponte Corvo.

On this occasion, the duke of Candia came to Rome, to receive the investiture of his new estates, and entered the holy city mounted on a magnificent horse, glittering with gold and precious stones, and surrounded by an escort of rich lords, barons, and princes, as if he had himself been emperor or pope. All these honours awakened the jealous fury of Cæsar Borgia, and Lucretia having been imprudent enough to extend her incestuous caresses to Francis, without appearing to pay any attention to her other brother, the death of the new prince of Beneventum was resolved upon; one night, after leaving the house of Rosa Vanozza, where he had supped, he was attacked by four men in masks, pierced with aine blows of a dagger, and his dead body thrown into the Tiber.

On the next day, the cardinal Caesar Borgia started for Naples, where he was commissioned to crown Frederick of Arragon. This precipitous departure, and the disappearance of Francis, caused him to be accused of fratricide. "But the pope sought to dispel it," says Burchard, "and sent us to seek his son in all the brothels of the city."

Some days afterwards, the dead body of Francis was found in the Tiber, by some fishermen. Alexander at first thought that the enemies of his family had assassinated him, and not knowing on whom to lay it, he put to the torture several notables of Rome, chosen by hazard, and did not stop until he became certain that the crime had been committed by his cherished son. "Then, says Burchard, he burst into tears, and consoled himself in the arms of Madame Lucretia, one of the causes of the murder."

When Caesar Borgia supposed that no more was thought at Rome of the murder of the duke of Candia, he returned from Naples, and presented himself before his holiness, as if nothing extraordinary had occurred in his absence. Alexander received him with the same demonstrations of tenderness as before, and at his request consented to free him from his ecclesiastical vows, that he might enter upon a career more conformable to his tastes and habits. Thus Caesar Borgia, by authority of the pope, found himself the heir of the titles and principalities which he so long envied his brother, and from a cardinal became a soldier.

To celebrate his reconciliation with his father, Caesar was desirous of giving him the diversion of a hunting party, and both started for Ostia, accompanied by courtiers, prostitutes, minions, and jugglers, and escorted by five hundred horse and six hundred foot soldiers, which placed them beyond the reach of an attempt at abduction. "They passed four whole days," says Tomasso Thomasi, "in the woods of Ostia, taking pleasure in surpassing in debauchery and licentiousness, all that the most depraved imagination could invent, after which they returned to that Rome which they had rendered a cavern of brigands, a sanctuary of iniquity. It would be impossible," adds the historian, "to relate all the murders, rapes, and incests which were daily committed at the court of the pope, and scarcely would the life of a man be long enough to allow him to transcribe the names of the victims who were stabbed, poisoned, or cast alive into the Tiber."

In the midst of all these abominations, the cardinals prostrated themselves before Alexander the Sixth, and applauded the incests of the father and his children; but what finished the degradation of this court, is the concert of praise and flattery with which they hailed the arrival of Caesar when he appeared in the consistory. It is true, that the terror which this monster inspired, added much to the marks of submission which were lavished on him, for each one knew that Caesar Borgia, either from avarice or cruelty, was constantly thinking of lowering their heads. "It was so great a pleasure for him to see blood flow," says Burchard, "that following the example of the emperor Commodus, he exercised himself with killing, in order to keep up his tiger rage. One day he enclosed the square of St. Peter with palisades, and ordered his guards to bring into the enclosure prisoners of war, men, women, and children; he then commenced a horrid contest with these unfortunate persons, they bound with cords, he armed at all points, mounted on a fierce courser; he shot some, hacked others with blows of his sabre, trampled some under his horse's feet, and in less than half an hour he caracoled alone in a sea of blood, and in the midst of dead bodies, whilst his holiness and Madame Lucretia were taking their pastime in a balcony, by assisting at this horrid scene." These details are not the most frightful which the master of ceremonies has transmitted to us; there are others which we are forced to suppress, on account of their monstrous character.

Some time after, Ferdinand and Isabella addressed energetic protests to the court of Rome, on account of a permission which the pope had granted to the heiress of the crown of Portugal, to leave the convent in which she was, and marry a son of the foolish king, John the Second; this authority compromised seriously the interests of the king of Castile, who had pretensions on this kingdom.

As Caesar Borgia was desirous of contracting an alliance with Charlotte, the daughter of Frederick, king of Naples, the near relative of Ferdinand, he was fearful lest that prince would oppose some obstacle to his plan, in order to avenge himself on his father for having raised up a dangerous competitor for the throne of Portugal; he determined to escape this inconvenience by casting the blame on another. This determination taken, his holiness assembled the consistory, and in the presence of the Spanish ambassador, accused the secretary of the briefs, Florida, archbishop of Cosenza, with having traitorously forged a dispensation for the heiress of Portugal, and with having sent it to her at her entreaty. He ordered his guards to arrest him, and proceeded at once to his examination.

The unfortunate prelate appeared at first annihilated, and could scarcely articulate some words in his defence; he gradually recovered from the blow that he had been struck, protested his innocence, and related, in accents of truth, the minute orders which had been given him in this matter. Alexander did not give him a long time to pursue his justification; at a sign from the pope, four sbirri cast themselves upon Florida, bound him, and hurried him to the castle of San Angelo. This unfortunate man was plunged into a dungeon, despoiled of his garments, his feet naked and immured to his knees. They left him only a wooden crucifix, a breviary, a Bible, two pounds of bread, a small cask of water, a vial of oil, and a lamp, and informed him they would renew his provisions once a week.

After two months, when Cæsar judged that the energy of the archbishop had been sufficiently broken by this prolonged fast, he sent John Merades to propose to him to take upon himself the fault of which the pope was culpable. In case he refused to obey, he was to menace him with perpetual imprisonment; and on the other hand, if he yielded to the desires of the pope, and consented to sign a declaration that he alone had given to the princess of Portugal the dispensation of marriage, he was to promise him, not only his freedom and re-installment in his offices and benefices, but the still greater favour of his holiness, and the friendship of his son, to whom his yielding would render an important service. The poor archbishop, who saw no other mode of safety, confessed his guilt in the presence of several witnesses, and signed the declaration which the pope and his son caused to be presented to him.

Once master of the written proof, the holy father proceeded against Florida in a consistory held for this purpose, and in the presence of the governor of Rome, the auditor of the apostolic chamber, the attorney general, and the fiscal procurer, pronounced a sentence which deprived the archbishop Cosenza of all his wealth and dignities, degraded him from his orders, and handed over his person to the civil magistrates to undergo the punishment inflicted on forgers. All the articles of the sentence were punctually executed, except the last. Cæsar Borgia had promised the archbishop his protection, and he kept his word, causing him to be poisoned in his dungeon, that he might escape the rack. It was rumoured about that he died from despair, and Alexander was enabled, without inconvenience, to sell at auction the property and benefices of the guilty man.

At last the crimes and abominations of the Borgia excited such indignation, that the princes of Europe instructed their ambassadors to address the pontiff in full consistory, and to summon him to put an end to his incests and infamies, if he did not wish to be condemned by a general council, and deposed from the Holy See. In consequence of these orders, the ambassadors of the emperor of Germany, the kings of France, England, Castile, and Portugal took advantage of a day of solemn audience to notify the wishes of their sovereigns to the pope; but Alexander took it in very bad part, he caused his guards to enter the hall, and threatened to throw them out of the window if they dared address their admonitions to him. He declaimed violently against the kings, and added with derision: "It a pretty thing for these despots to reproach me with my elevation to the chair of St. Peter, and impute to me, as a crime, some robberies and assassinations, they who leave kingdoms to their children as farms are bequeathed, and who murder millions of men in their quarrels! Go, ye footmen, return to them who sent you, and say to them that I have yet much to do before I can equal them in wickedness."

"What should people think of their tyrants," said brother Jerome Savonarola, in one of his addresses, "if an Alexander the Sixth judges kings to be more infamous than himself." These bold words lost the life of him who uttered them.

Jerome Savonarola was the prior of the convent of St. Mark in Florence, during the pontificate of Alexander the Sixth. Led away by an ardent love for humanity, say the historians of the times, this bold monk declared himself to be the defender of the people, and urged the Italians, unceasingly, to the conquest of liberty and the annihilation of despotism; the purity of his morals, the elevation of his soul, and the eloquence of his language were such, adds the chronicle, that Jerome Savonarola, the monk of St. Mark's, even imposed on Lawrence de Medicis the tyrant of Florence.

Savonarola announced publicly to men, that a new era of liberty and faith would succeed the reign of slime and mud which weighed down Italy, and that an universal republic would sweep all kings and tyrants from the earth. Notwithstanding this profound hatred for the oppressors of the people, his reputation for holiness was so well established, that Lawrence de Medicis, on his death-bed, sent for him, to receive the sacraments at his hands, as the only just man, he said, who lived in Italy; but Savonarola was unwilling to absolve the tyrant, who even, when about to appear before God, refused to renounce the power he had usurped.

On the day succeeding the death of the prince, the prior of St. Mark's preached before the lords and citizens of Florence, and explained, in a magnificent discourse, sublime theories, which showed what a perfect knowledge he possessed of men, religion, and government. His discourse was divided in four parts; he treated of the fear of God, the love of the republic, the forgetfulness of past injuries, and the equality of men in the sight of the law. By his masculine eloquence, he obtained all the suffrages, electrified all minds, and when he descended from the tribune, the citizens, with one voice, invested him with power to re-constitute the republic of Florence. Savonarola then labored at his work of regeneration, and commenced by attacking the papacy, that fatal institution, which gave to one man the privilege of subjugating his kind, of corrupting, despoiling, massacring them.

Such a direction given to men's minds was not in accordance with the views of Alexander the Sixth, the vice-God on earth, the infallible vicar of Jesus Christ. His holiness then took steps to destroy Savonarola. His agents at first excited the lords and priests of Florence against the monk; he then fulminated a terrible anathema against him, and took into his pay fanatic monks, who insulted the reformer even in the sanctuary, whilst he was preaching a purified religion. A Franciscan monk, named Francis of Apulia, even publicly announced that he was ready to enter a fire to convince Savonarola of imposture, and prove that Alexander the Sixth was the holiest and most religious of pontiffs. This singular challenge was accepted by Dominic of Pesica, a partizan of Savonarola, who offered, in his turn, to submit to the same proof to justify the prior of St. Mark's; the combat being agreed upon, the time of execution was fixed for the following Sunday. They came to Florence from all the neighbouring towns, to be present at this spectacle; unfortunately, at the moment in which the two champions were prepared to enter the fire, which had been kindled in the great square, a violent rain came on, which extinguished the flames, and forced the two monks to defer it to another day.

In the meantime, the agents of the pontiff, who were not anxious to see the result of the challenge, accused Savonarola of having employed the aid of a demon to cause torrents of water to fall, and thus shun the terrible proof; and they succeeded so well in exciting the fanatical populace, that a mob assembled before the convent of St. Mark's, seized its prior, and led him bound before the grand inquisitor. Savonarola was put to the ordinary and extraordinary torture, to compel him to plead guilty to the crime of sorcery. As his great soul was enclosed in a feeble and sickly body, he could not resist the frightful pains of the torture, and signed all the executioners presented to him; but scarcely was he taken down from the rack, than he retracted the avowals which torture had wrenched from him. Seven times did the executioners renew his tortures, without obtaining any thing but avowals during the punishment and retractions when he had returned to his prison. To put an end to it, Alexander sent two inquisitors from Rome, who superintended the trial of the reformer, and condemned him to be burned alive, with two of his disciples; the sentence was executed on the 23d of May, 1498, and his ashes were cast into the Arno. Such was the fate of this glorious apostle of liberty, who died a victim of his love for man, preaching the end of the slavery of the people, and the reign of an universal republic.

Whilst Florence was assisting at the terrible auto-da-fe of its defender, Alexander the Sixth was celebrating, by orgies at Rome, the baptism of a new bastard which the beautiful Wilhelmina had borne him. On this occasion the pope caused to be placed on the right side of the high altar of the church St. Marie del Popolo, which he had chosen for the ceremony of the baptism, a magnificent portrait of Rosa Vanozza, which he exposed for the veneration of the faithful, instead of that of the virgin. He then annulled the marriage of Lucretia and John Sforza, under the pretext of impotence, though he had seen the marriage consummated in his presence, and caused his well loved daughter to espouse the young Alphonso, duke of Bisaglia, a natural son of Alphonso the Second, duke of Arragon, an alliance which increased considerably his influence in Italy.

His holiness also was desirous of profiting by the death of Charles the Eighth, to obtain the hand of the daughter of Frederick, who was at the court of France, for his son Cæsar Borgia, and in this plan he found himself the more aided by the new king, Louis the Twelfth, since he sought to break off his marriage with Joan, the daughter of Louis the Eleventh, in order to espouse Anne of Brittany. The pope sold the bull of dispensation to the prince, and Cæsar Borgia was charged to carry it to the court of France, so as not to leave to others the care of his fortune. Nothing ever equalled in magnificence the train of the bastard, say the memoirs of the times; all his pages were clothed in tunics of gold and silk, their shoes were covered with fine pearls, their housings glittered with precious stones, and from their necks hung collars of emeralds and sapphires, marvels of workmanship. On his entrance into Paris, Cæsar caused shoes of gold to be placed on his mules, so carelessly shod, that at every step they fell from them. Louis the Twelfth received him with great marks of deference, and in acknowledgment of the good offices of the pope, he gave him the duchy of Valentinois, the command of a company of a hundred lancers, and a pension of twenty thousand livres.

Cæsar Borgia was not so successful with the daughter of Frederick; that haughty princess rejected his offers of marriage, and declared that she would never espouse the bastard of a priest. To moderate the anger to which such an insult must give rise, Louis the Twelfth married him to the daughter of John d'Albret, king of Navarre, and placed at his disposal two thousand horse and six thousand foot soldiers, to assist him in his plans of conquest. Cæsar accepted all that was given him, but did not abandon his hope of vengeance. As soon as he returned to Italy, he commenced a war of extermination against the petty princes of Romagna; he took from the family of Riario the cities of Imola, Forlì, and Césena; he seized on Pesaro and the other domains of John Sforza, the first husband of Lucretia; he drove Pandolphus Malatesta from the city of Rimini, and besieged the city of Faenza, which was defended by Asore Manfredi, a youth of sixteen, and of remarkable beauty. After several assaults the place yielded, on condition that Cæsar Borgia should preserve the life and property of the young prince. What matter the solemnity of an oath to the pope's bastard! Could not his father, at his will, bind or loose on earth? Thus, as soon as Cæsar was master of Faenza, he hastened to change the garrisons of the fortresses, and to take possession of the principality. As for the young Manfredi, whose beauty excited his lubricity, he made him his minion, and when he was tired of him, sent him to the holy father with his natural brother, and another child, who were all three used for the debauchery of the pontiff, and then thrown into the Tiber. Romagna conquered, the duke of Valentinois came to Rome, to receive its investiture at the hands of the sovereign pontiff, and to accomplish a new crime, which he was meditating with his father. Since his alliance with the house of France, Cæsar thought of urging on Louis the Twelfth to a war against the kingdom of Naples, so that he might, under cover of the general disturbance, conquer one by one the small republics of Italy; but the marriage of Lucretia was an obstacle to their plans, which it was necessary to remove. As the Borgia were never embarrassed about ridding themselves of an enemy or a friend, they agreed that his holiness should write to the prince to come to Rome, to assist at the festival of the jubilee, and that he should be murdered in the Vatican. The thing took place thus: on the evening of his arrival, at the moment when he was entering the palace of the holy father alone, assassins fell upon him, struck him with five blows of their daggers, and escaped, thinking they had slain him. He, being of a vigorous frame, had still strength enough left to drag himself into the interior of the apartments, and call for aid. His holiness, warned by the noise, of what was occurring, hastened to the wounded man, and caused to be administered to him all the care which his state demanded. "The physicians," adds Burchard, "who received all the lamentations of the pope as serious, took so much pains with the wounded man, that they saved his life; and Alphonso was now convalescing, when one night masked men entered his palace and strangled him."

Alexander was then occupied with granting an audience to the ambassadors of Ladislaus, king of Hungary, who had orders to ask, for their prince, authority for a divorce from Beatrice of Arragon, daughter of the old Ferdinand of Naples; also to the deputies of the king of Portugal, who came to beseech his holiness to grant a dispensation to the king to allow him to marry the sister of his first wife. As both supported their requests by rich presents and sums of money, the pope granted to the king of Hungary authority to repudiate his lawful wife; and to the king of Portugal, permission to contract an incestuous marriage. When the sitting was over, Alexander returned to his palace, and went, as was his custom, towards the apartment of the duke of Valentinois, who was absent; he found there three prelates, who were waiting for his son. Whilst the pontiff was discussing with them as to the means of increasing the product of the jubilee, a storm suddenly arose, a thunderbolt entered the room, knocked down the ceiling, and killed the three bishops; the pope alone survived the catastrophe, the beam and rafter having formed a kind of dais above his head; he, however, received violent contusions, and was drawn out expiring from the midst of the ruins.

Notwithstanding the severity of his wounds, Alexander was soon in a state to retake the government of affairs and to celebrate his convalescence, he published a new crusade against the Turks, and imposed a tax of a tenth of their revenues on all Christendom. To appreciate the incredible sums which he wrested from the fanatical devotees, it is only necessary to state, that in the territory of Venice alone, these taxes yielded him seven hundred and ninety-nine pounds weight of gold. This wealth, added to that which the jubilee had produced, placed Cæsar Borgia in a position to equip new troops and continue the war. In order, however, to reach his end sooner, he called the imbecile Louis the Twelfth into Italy, who, at his instigation, became subservient to the policy of the pontiff, and formed an offensive and defensive league with Ferdinand the Catholic, for the division of the kingdom of Naples.

In less than four years, the confederated armies conquered the states of Frederick, and in the same time, Cæsar Borgia reduced, beneath his sway, the principality of Piombino, which belonged to James of Appiano, as well as the duchy of Urbin, and the city of Camerino; the lords of these two last cities were strangled, as were their children; it was the fate which the duke of Valentinois reserved for those whose spoils he coveted; neither age nor beauty found favour in his eyes; the favour he granted to young women, was to use them in his debauches for a few days, and then to throw them into the Tiber. Alexander and his son marched steadily to their end, which was the subjugation of Italy. Implacable in their policy, casting down all obstacles, ridding themselves of all their enemies, employing, by turns, the sword and poison, as circumstances demanded, forming alliances with the powerful to annihilate the weak, and then crushing the powerful, it appeared as if nothing could resist them, and as if the whole universe must, in the end, become submissive to their sway.

Moreover, all princes obeyed a species of fascination which Cæsar Borgia exercised, and came themselves to hand to him their fortunes and lives; thus, under the pretext of a league against Florence, he enjoined on the sovereign lords of Italy, to join their troops to those of the pope, which were already increased by a body of six thousand horse, which Louis the Twelfth had furnished him; and with the assistance of this army, he commenced by summoning John Bentivoglio, who had been one of his allies, to surrender Bologna to him. This mode of proceeding showed the other princes what they had to expect from the pontiff and his bastard; they therefore wished to break the league at once, and unite against the common enemy. Guidibaldo retired to the city of Urbino; John of Varano threw himself into Camerino; the Orsini, the Vitelli, the lords of Perouse, Fermo, Sinigaglia, Siena, who all followed the trade of condottieri, formed a single army of all their bands, and engaged, by oath, to defend themselves against the Borgia. But it was too late for such a plan to succeed; the pope and his son, who had preserved agents and spies among them, sowed dissension in the hostile camp.

They frightened some, bought off others, and in less than two months afterwards the league broke up, and the condottieri remained in the service of the Holy See. With their assistance, Cæsar constrained Guidibaldo and John of Varano again to fly from their estates; he carried Sinigaglia, which belonged to Francis Marie de la Rovera, by assault, and on the day of the victory, he caused the condottieri, of whom he had no longer need, to be arrested in his camp. By his orders Vitellozzo Vitelli, the lord of Citadi Castello, Oliverotto, the lord of Fermo, Paul Orsini, the duke of Gravina, and Francis of Todi, were murdered or hung.

The pope, on his side, proceeded with like executions at Rome against the children or relatives of these families, in order that none among them might undertake to avenge the death of their brethren or fathers, and no one lay claim to their domains. Only two condottieri remained alive, John Paul Baglioni and Pandolphus Petrucci, who, more prudent than their colleagues, had refused to unite with the party of Cæsar; they abandoned the cities of Perouse and Sienna, in which they had taken refuge, and all Romagna submitted to the bastard of the pope. His holiness at once left Rome with his courtiers, minions, and mistresses, to visit the new conquests of Cæsar, whom he seriously thought of declaring king. Every where on his way, he spread largesses, gave feasts, and sought to excite enthusiasm by all the means in his power. In the island of Elba, he even wished to take part in the diversions of the people, and brought the handsomest girls into his palace to execute the dances of the country. "These reunions," says the historian Gordon, "could not fail, with a Borgia, to degenerate into orgies, so that licentiousness was soon carried to its utmost limits, and at supper they did not hesitate to eat flesh, though it was in Lent, only his holiness baptised the poultry and game by the names of turbot and sturgeon."

Alexander then returned to Rome with the duke of Valentinois, in order to concert with him upon the final steps to be taken before proclaiming him king of Romagna, of the March, and of Umbria. A measure of policy of this kind required powerful allies, and as their financial resources were exhausted, they resolved first to fill their treasury, and to levy new troops, to be ready for any event. His holiness also desired to establish his other children, before striking the great blow, in order that he might not be occupied with any thing but his dear son. He gave the government of Spoleto to Lucretia, and the duchy of Sermona to a bastard, called Robert of Arragon, whom he had by his incests with his daughter; he gave the duchy of Nepi to another of his bastards, named John Borgia; and, finally, he proceeded to the third marriage of Lucretia with Alphonso of Este, the son of Hercules of Ferrara.

"This union was celebrated," says Burchard, "by Saturnalia which had never yet been equalled. His holiness supped with his cardinals and the great dignitaries of his court, each having by his side two courtezans, who had no other dress than muslin robes and garlands of flowers. When the repast was over, the courtezans, to the number of fifty, performed lascivious dances, at first alone, then with the cardinals, finally, at a signal from Madame Lucretia, their robes fell off, and the dances continued amid great applause from the holy father." (The remaining proceedings will not bear translation. The original, from Burchard, is to be found in Gordon.)

It is impossible to deny the authenticity of these facts, which are all related at length by the master of ceremonies of Alexander the Sixth, the historian Burchard, who placed them hour after hour in the journal which he has left us of the actions of the holy father. It is to this author we are indebted for our knowledge of a very singular dispensation, granted by the pope to Peter Mendoza, the cardinal of Valencia, who asked for permission from his holiness to take one of his bastards, named Zanet, as his minion. "He must be a good prince," said Alexander the Sixth, on this occasion, "and we cannot in conscience refuse to our subjects an authority which we have so often taken to ourselves."

After the marriage of Lucretia, the pontiff was occupied in raising the money for the coronation of Cæsar; it was not an easy thing, for all his resources were beginning to dry up; the sale of benefices, privileges, and employments no longer produced any thing. Crusades against the Turks were of no avail; the people no longer wished to buy absolutions nor indulgences; there was but one thing to do, poison the rich ecclesiastics of the pontifical court, in order to inherit their wealth. This plan was also difficult, for the prelates for a long time past had been suspicious of the dinners of the Vatican. The pope discovered that most of the cardinals found pretexts for not accepting his invitation, if he proposed to them to dine at his palace. He then made a change, and besought the cardinal Corneto to lend him his villa for a grand festival, which he wished to give his friends, requesting him to prepare the repast, merely reserving the expense for him. The thing succeeded marvellously, and the invitations were all accepted.

On the morning of the day selected for the feast, Alexander sent his steward to the villa of the cardinal Corneto to arrange the service; he sent by him, at the same time, two bottles of a perfumed wine, called in Italy the wine of the Borgia; he recommended to him most expressly to lay them aside, that he might take them more readily when he gave him a signal to pour them out for the guests to drink. No one failed the pope's call, and when his holiness arrived at the villa with his son, he could already calculate what the dinner, he had generously offered, was to bring him in. It was in the month of August and very warm; Alexander and Cæsar, who had come on foot, complained of fatigue, and asked for some refreshment. A domestic went to the pantry, and as the steward was absent, he took up a bottle of wine and offered some to his holiness to drink. Alexander, as was his custom, emptied his glass at one draught; Cæsar poured some water into the wine and also drank a whole glass. Scarcely had they set down their glasses, when both felt pains in their bowels; they were poisoned! The domestic had served to them the wine which the steward had set aside. The holy father was soon seized with frightful convulsions, and they were obliged to carry him to the palace, where he died during the night, the physicians being unable to find any remedy to relieve his sufferings. This event took place on the 18th of August, 1503. Alexander was seventy-two years old, and had reigned eleven.

As for Cæsar Borgia, whether the poison mixed with the water had lost part of its force, or whether the vigour of his constitution was greater than the strength of the malady, he escaped death, and entirely recovered in ten months. In the midst, however, of the horrid suffering caused by the violent remedies which were administered to him to make him reject the poison, he preserved his wonderful presence of mind. By his orders messengers passed constantly from his chamber to that of the holy father, to bring him information of the condition of the sick man, and as soon as he learned that Alexander was dead, he immediately gave orders to Micholetto, the captain of his guards, to close the gates of the Vatican; he then caused the keys of the apostolic treasury to be taken by force from the cardinal treasurer, and appropriated to himself the gold, silver, and precious stones which were in it.

On the next day, when the death of the pontiff was known, cries of gladness and transports of joy resounded through Rome. Every one wished to contemplate the dead body of him, who, for eleven years, had caused the most powerful lords to tremble; the church of St. Peter, in which his dead body was placed, was soon invaded by an innumerable crowd. "The sight of that dead body," says Raphael Volatenan, "black, deformed, prodigiously swollen, and exhaling an infectious odour, was a disgusting spectacle; black froth covered his lips and nostrils; his mouth was unnaturally open, and his tongue, swollen by the poison, hung down upon his chin. Thus there was not found any devotee or fanatic to kiss his feet or hands, as was the custom."

Towards six o'clock in the evening the infection in the church was such, that the cardinal charged with the care of the funeral, was obliged to give orders to bury the pope. No priest, cardinal, or officer was willing to assist at the burial ceremony, and the dead body was abandoned to the carpenters and porters, who placed it in a coffin which was too short, and into which they forced it by pressing in the feet, and striking it with a hammer. After this horrible scene of profanation they cast it into a tomb which had been prepared for it on the left of the high altar.

Thus terminated the abominable reign of Alexander the Sixth, the last pontiff of the fifteenth century.

Alexander the Sixth is one of those popes whom the adorers of the Roman purple, and of pontifical infallibility, dare not justify, at least as regards their turpitudes; they say, however, that the reign of Roderick Borgia was one of the happiest for the church, since Providence permitted neither schism nor heresies to appear during it. And if God has willed, they add, that there should sometimes appear on the venerated chair of the apostle incestuous, sodomite, and murdering popes, it is to show men that the preservation of Catholicism does not depend on the vices or the virtues of its ministers; a conclusion well worthy of those shameful priests, who seek to cover their irregularities by contemptible sophisms. We, who deduct rigorous consequences from the truth of history, we will say, that an institution like that of the papacy, is a monstrosity in religion, precisely because it gives to wicked men an exorbitant power, which permits them to employ, for their passions, the greatest sublimity in the heart of men, the love of the Divinity. Quorum non est deus, et a doctrines with enthusiasm, and after sixteen hundred years of slavery, the people awaken, and dare to proclaim the intellectual emancipation of the human race.

Rome, it is true, will not contemplate this strife with indifference; it will strengthen the arms of fanatics, it will cause torrents of blood to flow, it will kindle the stakes of the terrible inquisition, it will prepare its racks and instruments of torture; monks and priests will sharpen their daggers, kings will arm cohorts of assassins, popes will erect gibbets and scaffolds; all the oppressors of the people, will, finally, unite to annihilate the hydra with a thousand heads which is to devour them—Reform.

Thousands of victims will perish in the flames, others will be engulfed in the floods, others will expire under the torture; whole people will be annihilated in Germany, Spain, Flanders, and France, and notwithstanding the massacres and butcheries of the cruel Francis the First, the sanguinary Philip the Second, the ferocious Pius the Fifth, and the execrable Charles the Ninth, who, in emulation of each other, and like tigers thirsting for blood and carnage, will dispute in horrid strife the glory of exterminating an entire race, the reformation will go on triumphantly, and will come out victorious from the calcined bones of its martyrs.

During this period, the people, tired of being laid under contributions by depraved priests, will, finally, break the yoke of the papacy, and separate themselves from the Roman church, with such violence, that popes, drawn on by the progress of events, will be forced to abdicate religious omnipotence, in order to become monarchs; from priests they will become kings, and will defend their political existence by force of arms.

After the death of the execrable Alexander the Sixth, his son Cæsar Borgia was careful to fortify the approaches to the Vatican with soldiers and banditti, who were devoted to him, to secure himself from the vengeance of his enemies, the Colonna and Orsini, who still had numerous partizans in Rome. His foresight was of admirable use to him, for the latter had no sooner heard of the death of the pope and the illness of his son, than they hastened, at the head of numerous troops, to fall on the holy city. All the petty Italian princes who had been despoiled of their estates by the Borgias, followed their example. The duke of Urbino reconquered his cities; Francis Marie de la Rovera re-entered his immense domains; the lords of Pesaro, Camerino, Citadi Castello, and Piombino did the same. Baglioni, Louis of Orsini, the count Petigliano, and Albiano freed Perouse, and drove the troops of Cæsar from the neighbouring country; Malatesta was less successful than his friends, and the states of Rimini remained beneath the rule of Borgia.

In this general conflict the cardinals who were present in Rome, to the number of thirty-seven, perceived the necessity of exhibiting vigour, in order to arrest the disorders; they then levied troops, drove the Colonna and Orsini from the city, and even constrained the duke of Valentinois to leave the Vatican and go to the castle of San Angelo; they then formed a conclave to choose a pope. The members of the sacred college were divided into three parties, equally powerful; the French sustained the cardinal of Amboise, their countryman; Gonzalvo of Cordova, wished to impose on them a Spaniard, the cardinal Bernardin Carvajal; finally, Julian de la Rovera, the richest of the cardinals, intrigued on his account for the papacy. After a struggle of thirty-five days, a fourth party arose which succeeded over the other three, and the cardinal of Sienna, Francis Piccolimini, was proclaimed sovereign pontiff, by the name of Pius the Third.

According to the abbot of Bellegarde, the life of this pope was exemplary, and his morals were irreproachable; his new dignity inspired in him no sentiments of pride, and did not alter his habitual conduct; he only did wrong in expressing a desire to labour for the reform of the church, and especially of the Roman ecclesiastics, whose irregularities were a constant subject of scandal for all Europe; he was very wrong to expose his plans of reform in an assembly of cardinals, and to declare that he had resolved to banish licentiousness and debauchery from his court; he was desirous of pursuing at once energetic measures, proportionate to the greatness of the evil.

On the evening of the same day, after dinner, Pius the Third felt in his entrails an unknown disease, and notwithstanding the most active remedies, he expired in the most frightful convulsions. This event took place on Tuesday the 13th of October, 1503, twenty-six days after his elevation to the pontifical throne.

JULIUS THE SECOND, THE TWO HUNDRED AND TWENTY-FOURTH POPE.

[A. D. 1503:]

Exaltation of Julius the Second—Character of this pontiff—Embassies from sovereigns to the new pope—His holiness permits the prince of Wales to espouse the widow of his brother—League formed by the holy father against the Venetians—He makes great preparations for war—He retakes Perouse and Bologna—Knavery of the holy father—He excommunicates the Venetians—He forces the most serene republic to submit to the Holy See—Louis the Twelfth is deceived by the pope—Agreement between Julius the Second and the Venetians—The pontiff declares war on the duke of Ferrara—He besieges Mirandola, and mounts himself to the assault, with a casque on his head and a sword by his side—He grants the investiture of the kingdom of Naples to Ferdinand the Catholic—Maximilian thinks of uniting, in his own person, the spiritual authority of the popes to the temporal power of the emperors—The Bolognese break the statue of the holy father—Assassination of the cardinal of Pavia—The cardinals convoke a council at Pisa to depose Julius the Second—The pope calls the king of Spain to his aid—Letter from the cardinals at Pisa to those at Rome—Julius lays the kingdom of France under interdict—Intrigues of the pope—Council of the Lateran—His holiness wishes to publish a crusade against the Spaniards—His death.

As soon as the funeral of the virtuous Pius was over, the cardinals were employed in making a new pope, and the same parties who had intrigued before the election of Piccolomini, rallied to obtain a triumph for their candidate, only instead of three factions, there were five. Cæsar Borgia, who had recovered his strength, took part in the elections, and on their side, the Orsini moved to nominate a pontiff of their choice. But the cardinal Julian de la Rovera intrigued so skilfully, and knew so well how to use money, threats, and promises, that he declared himself pope before the cardinals had assembled in the Vatican, having, as he said with effrontery, bought all the voices of the sacred college; and he was, indeed, proclaimed chief of the church, by the name of Julius the Second, a few hours after the conclave met. On the following day, he was submitted to the proof of the pierced chair, and was immediately after seated on the chair of St. Peter, as the vicar of God, infallible pontiff, and sovereign father of the faithful.

Varillas says that, Julian de la Rovera, in order to bring Cæsar Borgia into his support, had declared to him that he was his true father, and showed him forged letters from Rosa Vanozza, confirming this singular statement; that he pledged himself to treat him as a son, should he reach the papacy, and had finally promised him the post of grand standard bearer of the church, and generalissimo of the troops of the Holy See. Either the duke of Valentinois was convinced of the truth of the assertions of the cardinal de la Rovera, and was desirous of aiding his father, or was seduced by the hope of possessing the highest dignities of the court of Rome, since he ordered the prelates of his faction to vote for the cardinal de la Rovera. The latter had also gained to his side the cardinal Ascaguno, by pledging himself to re-establish the Sforza in Milan, and the cardinal Carvajal by promising him to place the kingdom of Naples beneath the sway of Ferdinand the Catholic; as to the other electors, his holiness, adds the historian, had bought them cheap.

If we are to credit Erasmus and Hadrian, the new pope had been a sailor, like his uncle Sixtus the Fourth; and Bandel affirms that he boasted having traversed the sea in the barque of a fisherman; not, like St. Peter, to catch fish, but as a pirate, to carry off young girls, whom he sold to the Turks, or to pillage merchant vessels.

Of a turbulent, audacious, and vindictive character, Julian de la Rovera was only known at Rome for his implacable hatred, his incredible duplicity, and his thirst for rule, so that his election was regarded as a public calamity. What mattered, however, to this priest, the love, or the hatred of men? He was pope and could employ, for the success of his plans, all the spiritual and temporal arms of the church, that is to say, fanaticism, knavery, treason, the sword, and fire.

As soon as the news of the elevation of Julius the Second to the pontifical chair was known in Europe, the sovereigns of the different kingdoms hastened to send ambassadors to congratulate him. The kings of England and Spain demanded from him, at the same time, a dispensation for the marriage of the prince of Wales, afterwards Henry the Eighth, with Catharine of Arragon, the widow of Prince Arthur. His holiness, who was very desirous of obtaining the support of these two monarchs, declared, in defiance of the canons, that a woman could marry two brothers successively; and without paying any regard to the opinions of the cardinals, which were opposed to his, he published a bull of dispensation, on the 26th of December, 1503. He was then engaged in putting his plans for encroachments in execution, and began by summoning his pretended son, Cæsar Borgia, to surrender to him the places and castles which he possessed in Romagna. As the duke of Valentinois hesitated to obey, he caused him to be arrested in his palace, and did not set him at liberty until he had surrendered his fortress to the Holy See.

Cæsar, discovering that his reign was over, left Rome and went to demand aid and succour from Gonsalvo of Cordova; but that general, as perfidious as his master, Ferdinand the Catholic, betrayed him, and instead of sending him into France, as he had engaged to do, at the moment when Cæsar was embarking for Marseilles, caused him to be arrested, and sent him to Spain, where he was confined, by the orders of the pope, in the castle of Medina del Campo. He succeeded in escaping, after a captivity of two years, and went to the court of John d'Albret, king of Navarre, his brother-in-law, who was then carrying on war against the Castilians; he wished to take part in it, and perished miserably, from a shot from an arquebuss, before the small city of Viane. Such was the sad end of him who had been on the point of placing an emperor's diadem upon his brow, and who had held in his hands the fate of the whole world. Of what avail was so much deceit, so many assassinations and crimes? to receive his death-blow upon a foreign soil, as a mercenary soldier!

Julius the Second was unwilling to follow the example of Alexander the Sixth, and proscribed the great families of Rome, but on the other hand sought to attach them to his party, and with this view married his daughter Felicia to Jourdain des Ursini, and gave to Antonio Colonna another of his daughters, named Lucretia. He did not think it necessary to use the same mode with the petty princes of Romagna; he first summoned the Bentivogli to restore Bologna to him, and on their refusal, declared them anathematised, authorised the faithful to pillage their property, to ravage their lands, and even to murder them, promising plenary indulgences, and the remission of the greatest crimes, to any one who should kill a member of that family. He then claimed the possession of the different provinces on which Alexander the Sixth had seized, and commanded the lords of Pesaro, Camerino, Piombino, Citadi Castello, and the other princes who had been restored to their domains on the death of Roderick Borgia, to hand over to him at once the cities and fortresses which belonged to them. All of them refused to obey him; they proved that their territories had been canonically separated from the ecclesiastical states by the cardinals of Alexander himself, and that they were only bound to pay an annual tribute to the church. Venice especially resisted; the most serene republic informed the pope, that it would not restore a single one of the towns it had conquered, nor pay a single Julius of gold by way of tribute.

The holy father perceived that the spiritual arm was powerless, before so formidable an opposition, and he determined to call the sovereigns of Europe to his aid, and employ their arms to subjugate the Venetians. As several of these princes had treaties with the republic, he was fearful lest they should hesitate to violate their oaths, he therefore excommunicated the Venetians, and declared all engagements, contracted with them, null; he interdicted fire and water to Loredan, their doge, to the senate, the council of ten, and the people; he loaded them with curses, and denounced them to the wrath of other people as guilty of lese-papacy, as pagans, as gangrened members of the church; he authorised all the faithful to seize their property by land or sea, and to sell their wives and daughters. In his bull he enjoined on the Venetians to restore to him on a fixed day the cities of Faenza, Rimini, Ravenna, Cerbio, and their dependencies, under penalty of interdict. Instead of obeying, the senate of Venice took energetic measures to prevent the bearers of bulls from entering the territory of the republic, and at the same time appealed from the violence of the pope to God, and a future general council. Julius immediately lanced an interdict on Venice, urged on the armaments of his allies, and prepared for war, a thing which he loved much, adds William Budé, who, in his works, constantly calls the pontiff, a sanguinary leader of gladiators.

His holiness opened the campaign in person, and marched on Perouse, the residence of Baglioni, the weakest of his enemies; although this city was defended by a numerous garrison and strong walls, it was obliged to capitulate to superior forces; Baglioni surrendered the keys of his cities, promised to comply with all the demands of the court of Rome, and gave his two children as hostages for the execution of his engagements. Julius then marched on Bologna with his casque on his head and his lance in rest; Bentivoglio dared not resist him, and opened the gates of his city at the first summons; the pope ordered him to retire at once into the duchy of Milan, and on the day after his departure, he entered Bologna in triumph; he then employed his time in changing the form of the established government, and replacing the magistrates by his creatures. "After these easy conquests," says the historiographer of Louis the Twelfth, "the holy father, fierce in his harness, thought himself redoubtable as Tamerlane, and was desirous of carrying on war against all the powers; and this bully of sixty years old, to whom the labours of war were as becoming as the dance to a monk, declared against the French, who were still redoubtable enemies, notwithstanding the reverses they had experienced in Italy."

Julius the Second, in his presumption thought himself superior to the emperor and king of France, from the force of his genius, as well as the greatness of his dignity; thus he did not hesitate to declare, that he wished to lead them to the whipping post, and after having destroyed them one after the other, to drive them for ever from Italy. It is true that these princes deserved this disgraceful treatment, for their submission to the pope, and that they had contributed to exalt his pride by their own cowardice. Though having an equal hatred to Germany and France, his holiness was most embittered against the latter country, doubtless from gratitude for the generous hospitality which it had for six years granted to him. Not only did he appear to have entirely forgotten the favours which the imbecile Louis the Twelfth had heaped on him, but he even pushed his ingratitude so far as to speak of his benefactor in outrageous terms, and to say that he had vowed an implacable hatred against him, and should never be content until he had hurled him from the throne.

An important opportunity soon occurred to allow the pope to put his threats in execution, and he did not let it escape. Genoa had risen against the despotism of its nobles, and the people were at strife with the aristocracy. Julius at once sent agents, who changed the sedition into a revolt, and Genoa, which had been a French possession since 1499, when Louis the Twelfth had conquered the Milanese, declared itself a free city, drove the French officers from the posts they held in the name of the king, appointed eight tribunes, and conferred the executive power on Paul de Novo, a dyer, a bold and resolute man, who hated kings.

Louis the Twelfth hastened, at the head of an army, to repress the revolt of his new subjects, which was not difficult to do, in consequence of their abandonment by the pope. This invasion, however, could not but give umbrage to Julius, and as he feared lest the king might determine to chastise the real author of the troubles in Genoa, he sent adroit agents to Maximilian, who skilfully excited his distrust, and taught him that Louis was an ambitious man, who wished to subdue Italy, in order to elevate to the throne of St. Peter, the cardinal d'Amboise, who was in return to bestow the imperial crown on him.

Maximilian fell into the snare, and assembled a diet at Constance, to raise formidable armaments against Louis the Twelfth. The latter, who could, with his troops, have easily executed the intentions which Julius attributed to him, feared so much to irritate the pope and emperor, that he at once disbanded his army. Notwithstanding this measure, or precisely on account of it, the emperor, none the less, hastened his preparations for war; and when he had assembled an army of thirty thousand men, he announced his intention of entering Italy, and of coming to Rome to be consecrated by the pope. He consequently demanded a passage for himself and his troops through the territory of Venice, offering, besides, to the most serene republic, to form an offensive league with it against France.

The Venetians, who feared lest this great display of force should be directed against themselves, rejected the proposals of Maximilian, and replied to his delegates, that they would form defensive alliances, but not offensive; and that if the emperor did not really intend to be crowned by Julius the Second, it was useless for him to be accompanied by an army of thirty thousand men.

This reply of the Venetians was dictated in part by the care of their own preservation, and partly by France, which had informed them that its armies would pass the Alps at once, if Maximilian entered the territories of the republic. Venice thus found herself so situated as to be unable to shun the war, and the holy father awaited with confidence the consequences of the difficult position in which his enemies were placed. It came to pass that Maximilian, wishing to force the passage, fell, with ensigns displayed, on the valley of the Trente, where he was met by Bartholomew Alviano, the general of the republic, who cut in pieces his advance guard of six thousand men, and forced him to sign a truce for a year.

Julius the Second, seeing his hopes of conquering these fierce republicans, and of recovering the cities which they had seized, vanishing, determined to strike a great blow. He laid aside for a time his hatred against the kings, and formed a league among the princes and states whom he judged it to be the most easy to deceive, to crush the republic of Venice. Most naturally the proud Maximilian, the unskilful Louis the Twelfth, the kings of Arragon and Hungary, the duke of Ferrara, the marquis of Ferrara, and the marquis of Florence took part in this confederacy, known in history as the league of Cambray, from the city in which it was made. In execution of this treaty the French invaded the territories of the republic on the side of Lombardy, the Germans and Spaniards by the valley of the Trente; the troops of the holy father, commanded by Julius in person, followed up the shores of the Adriatic, took the citadel of Ravenna by assault, and put the garrison to the sword.

Louis the Twelfth, who had under him the marshals Chaumont and Trivulzio, the duke of Bourbon, La Trimouille, and the Count Dunois, gained over the Venetians the celebrated victory of Aguadello, which endangered all the possessions of the republic on terra firma. The doge then determined on the only course which remained for him before so powerful a coalition, that of buying off the pope, by restoring to him the cities which he claimed for his see.

As soon as he had obtained their restoration from Venice, he ceased to take part in the confederacy, and freed the Venetians from the censures pronounced against them; nay, he even espoused their cause against his own allies. He declared the league of Cambray impious and sacrilegious, and fulminated anathemas against Alphonso, duke of Ferrara, who refused to break with the French. He declared him to be a rebellious son, a child of iniquity and perdition, and as such deprived of all his dignities. He freed his subjects from the oath of fidelity they had taken to him, and ordered the sentence to be posted up in all parts of the world; he then sent an armed force to seize on his estates, and threatened the French with his most terrible anathemas, if they dared to aid him.

Louis the Twelfth, always weak and pusillanimous, obeyed the pope, retook the road to France, and had even the distinguished cowardice to conclude a treaty with the court of Rome, by which his majesty recognised himself as bound to defend the Holy See against all its enemies. He moreover conceded to Julius the right to nominate to all the vacant bishoprics in his kingdom.

All these acts of submission could only augment the audacity of the sovereign pontiff, and his bitterness against the king. His holiness named, to govern the dioceses, prelates who were sold to him, and who were ready to betray the prince at his first command. "Then," says Mezeray, "the pope incited the Swiss against Louis the Twelfth, through means of Mathew Schinor, a fiery orator, whose harangues agitated this rustic people as the wind does the waves. He also inflamed the ambition of the young Henry the Eighth of England, by offering to him the investiture of the kingdom of Louis the Twelfth; and, finally, he intrigued with the courts of Castile and Germany, to induce them to enter into a league against France." His efforts with these two princes failed. Ferdinand dared not openly take the part of the pontiff, and the emperor, who had reconquered his former domains by the assistance of the French, refused to break with Louis the Twelfth; he was, besides, sufficiently occupied with his own affairs, in consequence of a defeat he had suffered beneath the walls of Padua, and the necessity he was under of reorganising his army, which had been cut to pieces by the Venetians. Notwithstanding these two checks, his holiness did not entirely abandon the plan he had formed of a league against Louis the Twelfth, such as he had made against the Venetians; he only regarded the execution of it as delayed.

We are really astonished at this enmity of Julius the Second towards France, and can only explain it from the hatred he bore to the cardinal d'Amboise, his competitor, whom he had threatened to have deposed as simoniacal, a poisoner, adulterer, incestuous person, and a sodomite; but, after the death of that prelate, his resentment appeared to be still more violent, and the pope, having nothing more to fear from this redoubtable rival, set no bounds to his warlike fury. Although it was mid winter, he took the command of his armies, which had commenced operations against the duke of Ferrara. He conducted in person the siege of Mirandola, pressed on the works, excited the zeal of the soldiery, by the promise of the sack of the city, doffed his cuirass, and visited the batteries, armed from head to foot, with his sword by his side, without troubling himself about the scandal which his conduct would give rise to. After having made a breach in the walls with his artillery, he gave the signal for a general assault, and himself mounted the ramparts, in order to enjoy the spectacle of violated females, murdered old men and children; in fine, of all the horrors which usually take place in cities carried by storm.

Whilst his holiness was directing in person the operations against the allies of France, he was continuing his intrigues in Germany and Spain, to excite these powers against Louis the Twelfth; and knowing how badly Ferdinand the Catholic desired the investiture of the kingdom of Naples, he proposed to grant it to him on the conditions which had been consented to by the Arragonese, only adding to the treaty, that the king of Castile should keep three hundred armed men at the disposal of the Holy See, to serve the church on the first requisition made for them by the sovereign pontiff. The intention of Julius was to employ these troops at once against the French in the war of Ferrara, and to bring about a rupture between Louis the Twelfth and Ferdinand the Fifth. The wary Castilian appeared to fall into the snare; he signed the treaty and accepted the investiture. The holy father immediately claimed the promised aid of the three hundred men-at-arms, and informed the prince that he would bestow on him the investiture of the kingdom of Naples on his return from the army, which he had no intention of doing. Ferdinand immediately sent Fabricius Colonna with the troops which the pope demanded, as far as the frontiers of the states of the church; but there they halted, and the general informed his holiness that he had orders to go no farther, until he had proclaimed Ferdinand, king of Naples. The pope, thus placed between two enemies equally redoubtable, having on one side the French, who were pursuing their conquests in the north of Italy, and on the other the Spaniards, who threatened to invade the south, found himself caught in his own trap, and was obliged to subscribe to the wishes of the Castilian.

Louis the Twelfth finally discovered that he was the sport of the court of Rome, and threatened to avenge himself forcibly, if the decree investing Ferdinand with the kingdom of Naples was not at once revoked. His threats and his anger only excited derision, and instead of replying to his reclamations, Julius the Second summoned him to restore the cities on which he had seized; he fulminated a terrible anathema against him, placed France under interdict, and gave it to him who could seize it; he also excommunicated all the princes who sustained the party of the king, and gave all their lands and lordships to the first occupant. An envoy of the duke of Savoy, who wished to make some representations to the holy father on this subject, was arrested as a spy, put to the torture, and thrown into the infected dungeons of the castle of San Angelo, notwithstanding the energetic protests of the duke.

The unskilful Louis being no longer able to deceive himself regarding the hostile sentiments of the pope, and not daring yet to take up arms against the Holy See, convened a national synod in the city of Tours, to authorise him to repulse the attacks of Julius the Second. Not only did the French bishops decide that the king would do right in repressing the insolence of the pope, but they even besought him to undertake the defence of the petty princes who were oppressed by the court of Rome, and cited Julius the Second to appear before a national council at Pisa, to be deposed from the pontificate. It resulted that nine cardinals, and among them the Spanish cardinal of Sainte Croix, immediately left the court of the sovereign pontiff to join the French bishops, and co-operate with them in the reform of the church. The cardinal of Sainte Croix, with the assent of Ferdinand, even caused letters of convocation to be put up in the cities of Parma, Placenza, Modena, Bologna, and Rimini. But, whilst the king of Spain was writing to the king of France, that he was ready to sustain the enterprise of the prelates opposed to the infamous Julius the Second, he was secretly protesting at Rome of his good intentions towards his holiness, and was even demanding the deposition of the cardinals who had separated from the apostolic see.

Skilful as was this policy of Spain, it only half succeeded; Louis the Twelfth having discovered what was plotting against him, detached himself from Ferdinand and proposed to the emperor to form an offensive and defensive alliance with him. Maximilian listened with the more willingness to the overtures of France in regard to the deposition of Julius the Second, as a letter addressed to his daughter, Margaret of Austria, who advised him to marry again, shows: "We do not think that at our age, one should contract a new alliance, unless for political reasons," he wrote to this princess; "and in the position of affairs, it would tend to destroy our plans of ambition, which are to unite on our own head the double crown of emperors and popes. Already has our secretary, the bishop of Gurck, started for Rome, to propose to Julius the Second, to choose between our enmity and our admission to a share in the papacy, so that after his death, we should be assured of possessing the chair of St. Peter alone. Be then warned my dear Margaret, that you will be forced to adore us on both knees, which will be very strange; this idea already excites our hilarity. It will be so, however, for the people and nobles of Rome, who have an equal hatred for the French, the Spaniards, and the Venetians, are leagued together to the number of upwards of twenty thousand, and have informed us that they would choose a pope of German origin, as soon as Julius the Second left the Holy See vacant; this cannot be long, his holiness being covered with pustules and ulcers, in consequence of his debaucheries. I have consequently made overtures to the Italian cardinals, and their suffrages will cost me about two or three hundred thousand ducats. Ferdinand the Fifth also affirms to us that his ambassadors have orders to assist our election. Written with his own hand, by your good father Maximilian, the future pontiff."

Whilst the emperor was intriguing to reach the papacy, Julius the second was still neglecting his trade of pope for that of an adventurer; he abandoned his palace of the Vatican, leaving to Michael Angelo the care of directing the work on the new church of St. Peter, whose foundations were already rising above the soil of the ancient steps, and retaking the casque and sword, went with a small escort to the city of Modena, where the pontifical troops were encamped. His holiness had already reached Bologna, when the marshal Chaumont, whom France had sent to the aid of the duke of Ferrara, and who was himself in the environs of the place, was advised by Bentivoglio, of what was occurring, and came, during the night, to surround Bologna with his cavalry. On the next morning, the consternation among the pontifical household was great, and their alarm was the better founded, since, on the one hand, it was impossible to leave the city without falling into the hands of the French; and on the other, the Bolognese, who had never been devoted to the Holy See, appeared ready to revolt, and were already talking of giving up the pope to the marshal de Chaumont.

In this extremity, the cardinals united with the Spanish and Venetian ambassadors, in beseeching Julius to treat with the French. At this overture, the pontiff fell into a violent rage, he rent his garments, blasphemed the name of God, tore the tiara from his head, and trampling it under foot exclaimed, "Perish then, with this powerless emblem, a religion of falsehood and knavery, and with it be crushed the abominable supporters who counsel cowardice to their pope. As for you," said he, turning towards the Venetian ambassador, "where are the re-inforcements you promised me in the name of your republic? I will wait for them until to-morrow, and if they do not come, then I will treat with these execrable Frenchmen; but it will be only for the purpose of burning Venice, and with your city, all the merchants who rule it. As for you," said he, turning towards the ambassador of Spain, "who have sported with me so unworthily, by causing me to grant the investiture of the kingdom of Naples, in exchange for troops, which your infamous sovereign will never send me, I will have you hung to-morrow at day-break." Then seizing his cross with both his hands, he fell on them and drove them from his presence, striking them redoubled blows.

When, however, his rage was appeased, perceiving that his violence did not remove the dangers which threatened him, he called together the magistrates of Bologna, and the chiefs of the trades; he represented to them that he had trusted to their loyalty and fidelity in coming into their city, and besought them to take up arms in his defence, promising them the remission of all imposts. His urgency did not change the dispositions of the inhabitants, and matters remained in the same state during a whole day. Towards night, news was received of the approach of the Spaniards; the threat of the gallows had produced its effect. The ambassador of Ferdinand had sent an express to Fabricius Colonna, who decided on advancing. The marshal de Chaumont retreated before the Spaniards and yielded the field of battle.

Julius the Second, thus delivered from the French, immediately uttered invectives against Louis the Twelfth; he spoke of nothing but sieges and ranged battles, and though he suffered much from ulcers, which were eating him up, he wished to go to Ferrara to bombard that place. He assisted at the first labours of the siege, but was soon obliged to return to Bologna, the physicians having declared that the disease had reached its last stages, and that his holiness had but a few days to live.

The cardinals immediately commenced their intrigues for the papacy, and caballed with offrontery in the very chamber of the dying man. They were, however, soon brought to repentance; for Julius, who was endowed with a very vigorous constitution, returned to life. His first care was to assemble the cardinals in public consistory; he heaped threats and outrages on them; he called them thieves, sodomites, simoniacs; he accused them of selling their honour, their conscience, and even their bodies; and, finally, closed the session by making a decree concerning the election of popes, in which his holiness declared as of right null, every nomination tainted with simony, whether on the part of the chosen or of the electors, proclaiming as heretical, and punishable by the punishment of fire, pontiffs who should be promoted by such means, as well as all who had concurred in their election.

As soon as the pope had recovered enough strength to sustain the movement of a litter, he determined to recommence hostilities against the duke, and started to rejoin his troops. The chevalier Bayard, who was then carrying on the war in Italy, having been advised of the march of the pope, resolved to seize him, and laid an ambuscade of an hundred men-at-arms in the environs of the small town of St. Felix, through which he knew his holiness must pass, to reach his camp. Unfortunately on that day, about an hour after the departure of the escort, there fell a heavy rain, which obliged the pontiff to turn back to seek for shelter. Bayard, who was unmasked by this movement, discovered himself and fell upon the cardinals; as he was at a considerable distance off, Julius had time to leave his litter and mount a powerful horse, on which he escaped from his enemies. The cardinals imitated his example, and Bayard could only seize some old bishops who were in litters, some domestics who were on foot, and the baggage mules.

Whilst the French were carrying on a rough war with his holiness, they were negotiating with the king of Spain to induce him to unite with Louis the Twelfth and Maximilian, who had convened a council at Pisa to depose the pope. But Ferdinand, who found his interests in these interminable discords, contented himself with playing the part of mediator, and after numerous debates, he proposed to assemble a congress at Mantua, to treat of an accommodation among all the powers. Julius the Second went to Ravenna to supervise the deliberations of that assembly, and endeavoured to gain the representatives of the princes to his side. He even wrote on this subject to the venerable bishop of Gurck, a delegate from the emperor, to come to him, in order to deliberate with him on the means of pacifying Italy. The prelate accepted the invitation of his holiness; but when he saw that the pontiff's only object was to buy his conscience with a cardinal's hat, he immediately returned to Mantua. As Ferdinand had foreseen, the meeting of the ministers of the great powers produced no result, and the war recommenced with more fury than before. Trivulzio, who had succeeded the marshal de Chaumont in the command of the army of Italy, opened the campaign by seizing in succession Concordia and Bologna; in this last city was a bronze statue of Julius the Second, one of the master-pieces of Michael Angelo. The proud pontiff was represented as standing in a warlike attitude, with his right hand raised towards heaven, as if invoking Christ in favour of the people, whom he came to punish. A very curious anecdote is related of it: "The cardinals," says the chronicle, "having informed his holiness, that the inhabitants only trembled when they regarded this terrible statue, and asked if it raised its arm to bless or curse them;" Julius replied to them, "It is for either, as the Bolognese shall be submissive or rebellious." As soon as the French entered the city, the people broke up this statue; the metal was bought by Alphonso of Este, who made a piece of artillery out of it, which he called the Julian.

The marshal Trivulzio could, beyond all doubt, have seized on all Romagna, if he had pushed on the war; unfortunately, he was prevented by Louis the Twelfth, who was alarmed at his victories over the pope, and wished to await the decision of the council which had been convened at Pisa.

Julius the Second remained still shut up in Ravenna, and was much disquieted at the turn which affairs were taking. To increase the evil, division broke out in his own family; the duke of Urbin, who was at once his nephew and his bastard, accused the cardinal of Pavia, the minion of his holiness, of having sold Bologna to the French; the latter in his turn accused him, before the other cardinals, of having endeavoured to supplant him in the good graces of the pontiff, whilst, at the same time, he was keeping up an understanding with the duke of Ferrara, whose niece he had espoused, in order to obtain a protector after the death of the pope. The duke of Urbino, furious at seeing his intrigues unmasked, conceived a violent hatred against the cardinal, and on the day succeeding the discussion, stabbed him in the street. Julius the Second was so afflicted by the death of his minion, that being unable to avenge him on his own son, he resolved to leave the city which had witnessed his assassination, and return to Rome, notwithstanding the dangers he must incur.

Two days after his return to the holy city, he convened a council in the palace of the Lateran, to oppose the synod of Pisa, whither he had been cited to hear his deposition. In his letters of convocation his holiness laid it down as a law, that the privilege of forming general assemblies of ecclesiastics pertained to the pope exclusively; he concluded as follows: "It is on this account, in the plenitude of our infallible wisdom, that we declare the call of the council of Pisa null and vain, as well as all the writings published against us by its callers, in the name of the emperor Maximilian and of King Louis of France, reproving and revoking them, and under penalty of excommunication and eternal malediction, prohibiting every one, whatever may be his dignity, be he ecclesiastic or secular, from favouring their propagation."

The holy father then fulminated his bulls against Louis the Twelfth, and threatened to break his scandalous marriage with Anne of Brittany; he then turned towards Spain, and offered the investiture of Navarre to Ferdinand, if he would arm in his behalf. This proposal was very agreeable to that king, who had long sought to despoil John d'Albret of his kingdom of Navarre. Ferdinand equipped a numerous fleet, with the apparent design of making a descent on Africa, but which was really destined to disembark an army in Italy, to surprise the French.

Louis the Twelfth, being warned of these warlike preparations, hastened to levy troops; the emperor did the same, and all the people of Europe found themselves in arms, and prepared to murder each other, to maintain the quarrel of a pope who was at once a sodomite, robber, and assassin. On their side, the cardinals who had separated from the pontifical court, and who were at Pisa, proceeded none the less with the opening of the council which was to depose the pontiff, and if the assembly did not act in this matter with the energy which it had already exhibited, we must seek for the reasons in the gentle and irresolute character of Maximilian; this prince, solely to oblige the prelates of his kingdom, dared not appear at the synod. On the other hand, the king of France was weak enough to yield to the counsels of his wife, and sent but sixteen bishops, with some proctors from the universities. It resulted, that this meeting, being composed of only a small number of prelates, lost its influence from that circumstance alone, and it was after many difficulties that the Florentines, to whom the city of Pisa belonged, decided to permit it to open its sessions.

At last the first session took place on the 29th of October, 1511, under the presidency of the cardinal of Sainte Croix. Odet de la Foix was the keeper of the council, and Philip Decius, an excellent lawyer, discharged the duties of judge advocate. As soon as the news reached Julius the Second, he excommunicated a second time the cardinals, and all who took part in this assembly; but so many blows struck him at once, that he himself believed he should not long survive. He was attacked by a violent fever, accompanied by long fainting spells, during which he showed no signs of life.

"The holy father then appeared to return somewhat towards goodness," says the historian of the league of Cambray; "he brought the cardinals about him; he accused himself of having committed great crimes, and of having published unjust excommunications; he caused them to prepare a bull revoking them, prohibiting them, however, from publishing it until after his death, because, should he recover his health, he was unwilling to have performed, he said, an act of justice which might injure his dignity." This excess of prudence was not useless, for the fever having left him, the physicians pronounced him out of danger, and he was soon able to preside in person over the sessions of the consistory.

During his convalescence, he was engaged in cementing an offensive and defensive alliance between the Holy See, the Swiss, Venice, and Ferdinand, who had finally declared himself the enemy of France. By a strange abuse of language, this sacrilegious coalition was called the holy league, and the conduct of its operations was surrendered to the indefatigable Julius the Second. It is true that his holiness alone defrayed the expenses of the enterprise; by way, however, of compensation, his allies permitted him to use their troops to bring the people of Rome to reason, who had had the audacity to chase away the priests from the apostolic city, and to desire to recover their liberty. In less than eight days, thanks to this powerful aid, the authority of the pope was re-established, and after the massacre of from twelve to fifteen thousand citizens, order was restored.

If the inhabitants of the holy city were hostile to the pontifical cause, it was not the same at Pisa, where an army of priests and monks had excited the devout people. Troubles broke out and the population took up arms, not against the pope, but against the council, which was engaged in deposing him. The disorders became so great, that after the third session, the fathers were compelled to retire to Milan to continue their sittings. His holiness was much gratified at it, but was, however, troubled by the news that the French had cut to pieces the army of the confederates, beneath the walls of Ravenna.

This victory inspired terror through the ecclesiastical states; at Rome, especially, their minds were in consternation; the cardinals crowded to the Vatican to entreat the pontiff to take pity on himself and the sacred college, and transfer his court to Spain. They represented that his position was the worse, since the Roman barons were about to join the French, and that even his own bastard, the duke of Urbin, had promised to send to the enemy two hundred lances and four thousand foot, to increase the number of soldiers whom Pompey Colonna, Robert des Ursini, Antonio Savelli, Pietro Margano, and Laurent Mancini, were engaged to furnish. Notwithstanding his excessive pride, these considerations made an impression on the mind of Julius the Second, and he appeared to yield to the necessity of retreating, when the ambassadors of Spain and Venice arrived. They combatted the reasonings of the cardinals, and informed his holiness that the danger was not as imminent as had been supposed, because the French army, though victorious, was like a body without a soul, its general, Gaston de Foix, duke of Nemours, having been slain in the battle. This information determined Julius to delay his plan of flight for some days, and soon a letter from the cardinal de Medicis caused him to abandon it entirely and restored all his audacity to him. This prelate, who had been made a prisoner on the field of battle, in which he was fighting armed at all points, wrote to his holiness, "that he had been enabled to seize on the minds of the soldiers, and had so alarmed them by his preaching, concerning hell, that they were deserting in bands with their arms and baggage, to save their souls and escape the anathemas which they had incurred; that moreover they need not be disquieted at Rome, since the superstitious Anne of Brittany had a confessor who was entirely devoted to the Holy See; that by means of the influence of this princess, they could prevent Louis the Twelfth from reinforcing his army in Italy, and that besides, Maximilian, who saw the bad condition in which the affairs of France were, appeared to desire to detach himself from its cause to enter the sacred league."

Although fortune indeed appeared to have taken the side of the holy father, the assembly of Milan none the less continued its labours, and, during its seventh sitting, pronounced the suspension of Julius the Second from the pontifical functions. The sentence was conceived in these terms:—"In the name of the Holy Trinity, the sacred general council, representing the universal church, after having taken the evils of the church into consideration, declares, that it is necessary to labour for the reform of abuses; and as it is especially important for religion that the head of the church should set an example of Christian virtues, and should not be an object of reproach an account of his adulteries, robberies, and murders, the fathers have unanimously decided that Julius the Second should be hurled from the throne of the apostle; for Isaiah saith, 'Remove from before my people all that may cause their fall;' and the apostle St. Paul, 'Eradicate every germ of evil from among you, for a little leaven leaveneth the whole lump.'

"Since we must draw the people out of the hands of Goliath and the Philistines, who pervert and oppress them, the sacred college exhorts cardinals, patriarchs, archbishops, bishops, abbots, prevosts of cathedrals, chapters of colleges, kings, princes, dukes, marquises, counts, barons, universities, communities, the vicars of the Roman church, vassals, governors, feudatories, regular and secular subjects, finally, all the faithful, whatever may be their dignities and professions, no longer to recognise Julian de la Rovere as pope, who elevated himself to the Holy See, by means of an infamous simony. We prohibit all from obeying this corsair, this gladiator soiled with Christian blood, this incestuous wretch, this sodomite, covered with filthy sores, who has infected the church by his corruption."

This decree was received in France, and its publication permitted by the letters patent of Louis the Twelfth, notwithstanding the active opposition of Anne of Brittany, who, by the advice of her confessor, even refused to share her bed with the king. Julius the Second did not otherwise appear much moved by it; he contented himself with assembling some Italian bishops at St. John of the Lateran, and caused this cabal to issue anathemas against his adversaries. By the orders of his holiness, the prelates who were in session at Milan, were declared to be heretics, delegates of antichrist, and as such, the faithful were permitted to seize their property, benefices, dignities, even to slay them. The council of the Lateran, at the same time, confirmed the censures pronounced against Louis the Twelfth, from whom it took away his title of Most Christian King. The last article of the condemnation had been dictated by Ferdinand the Catholic, who, however, exacted that the king of Navarre should be included in the sentence. Flechier, in one of his funeral orations, himself blames the conduct of the pope. "Julius the Second," says he, "abusing the power which he maintained he held from God, made religion subserve his criminal passions, and carried a sacrilegious hand against the crown of kings. John D'Albret, one of the victims of the execrable policy of this pontiff, was excommunicated by virtue of a bull, which had been solicited by Ferdinand the Fifth, and the principality of Navarre was invaded by Spanish troops, before John D'Albret dreamed of defending himself"

Whilst the creatures of Julius the Second were fulminating anathemas against France and her allies, the fathers of the council of Milan quitted that residence precipitately, in order to avoid the implacable vengeance of the pope, and took refuge at Lyons, which caused that city to be placed under interdict, and be degraded from its rank as a metropolitan see. On the other hand, the bands of the holy league, re-inforced by Spanish troops, took their revenge on the French, and seized one after another on all the cities which still held out against the pope.

To heighten these disgraces, the king of England, Henry the Eighth, who had remained, until this time, an impassable spectator of the struggle, joined the confederates, and induced the desertion of Maximilian. All Europe was thus leagued against Louis the Twelfth; the war recommenced more terribly than ever; the Germans, Swiss and Spaniards, penetrated into Italy, by three sides at once; the troops of Julius the Second invaded Romagna, and carried Bologna and Ravenna. Pressed on all sides, and borne down by numbers, the French were constrained to give ground and lay down their arms; almost all of them were cowardly assassinated, in contempt of the laws of war, and although they had obtained honourable capitulations.

Bandel, Forcadelle, and several other historians, relate that Julius the Second then invented a fable, the object of which was to render the memory of Gaston de Foix odious, and to raise to the highest pitch the fanaticism of the people of Italy against the French.—He caused to be affirmed, by numerous witnesses, that having opened the tomb of this prince, they had only found in his coffin a horrible serpent, which had flown up into the air in the midst of a thick and infected smoke. Forcadelle also says, that his holiness distributed large sums to hungry poets to make satires against Louis the Twelfth or Anne of Brittany, and that he granted the remission of a capital punishment to a great criminal, who had made a Latin distich against the French.

Two months had scarcely passed since the expulsion of the French from Italy, when Julius thought of breaking the holy league and freeing himself from his allies, who had the audacity to claim a part of the spoils.—Before putting this plan in execution, he wished to assure himself of the possession of the duchy of Ferrara, and for this purpose he wrote to Duke Alphonso of Ferrara, the husband of the infamous Lucretia Borgia, that he was willing to be reconciled to him, and only exacted that he should come to Rome, to receive absolution, according to the ordinary forms; he sent him a safe conduct signed with his own hand, to give him the greater confidence in his promises.

Notwithstanding the protestations of friendship by the holy father, Alphonso feared a snare, and replied, that he would not hazard coming to Rome, but on the solemn guarantee of the Colonna and of the ambassadors of Spain and Florence. They wrote at once, that they would pledge themselves to oppose every effort against his person; he had then no more objections to make, and started for the holy city.

Julius the Second, says an historian, received him with great demonstrations of joy, and sought to persuade him, as he had before done Cæsar Borgia, that Lucretia was his own daughter, and not that of Alexander the Sixth. This princess was then living in great honour at the court of her husband, surrounded by poets, artists, and painters; later, when age had deprived her of all her lovers, she built convents for women in expiation of her adulteries and incests.

At first Julius promised the duke of Ferrara to treat him as his son-in-law, and retained him at the Vatican; then when he supposed he could speak as a master, he brought him before the consistory, and summoned him to give up the city of Ferrara as a dependency of the church; he also claimed the payment of a tribute of four thousand florins of gold, which he was to send yearly to Rome, as a feudatory of the Holy See; and, finally, he prohibited him from sending the products of the salt springs of Comachio into Lombardy, that he might not enter into rivalry with the salt springs of the holy father.

Alphonso discovered that Julius was only waiting a pretext to arrest him; he did not, therefore, contest the equity of the demands of the holy father, but simply asked that they should give him to the next day to make his decision. During the night he fled from Rome, and regained his dominions by byways. As soon as Julius was informed of the departure of his prisoner, he burst into a rage, accused the Florentine ambassadors of having favoured his escape, and in revenge, gave orders to the cardinal of Sion to commence hostilities against France at once.

Cardonne, the Spanish general, joined the pontifical troops, seized on Prato, and forced the republic to receive the conditions which the pope chose to impose on it. His holiness re-established the Medici at the head of the government. At Milan a like restoration was accomplished, and Maximilian Sforza retook his ducal crown. Thus all political events concurred in assuring the triumph of the pope; it was only left for him to purge Italy of the Spaniards and Germans. To attain this end, his holiness offered to authorise the emperor to conquer the possessions of Venice, provided he would drive the Spaniards out of Lower Italy. Maximilian acceded to this proposal, and immediately sent the bishop of Gurck to Rome, to arrange the basis of it. The pontiff received the German plenipotentiary with great demonstrations of friendship, and appeared to have entirely forgotten their former struggles; he defrayed the expenses of his embassy with liberality, though he had three hundred persons in his train, and lavished on him honours which were usually rendered to emperors alone. All the conditions of this sacrilegious alliance were arranged on the same day; the bishop of Gurck, in the name of Maximilian, engaged to protect the court of Rome against the enterprises of Spain and France, and to lend it the aid of troops to reduce the duchy of Ferrara. In return for these advantages, Julius sacrificed his allies the Venetians, and promised to excommunicate them if they refused to submit to Germany, and to agree to the conditions which the prince wished to impose on them.

As soon as the treaty had been ratified, Julius the Second gave vent to his joy; he commanded, that on the next day, a solemn service should be performed, to celebrate the happy success of his negotiations, and at the close of the ceremony, he went with all his clergy to the left bank of the Tiber, where, in the presence of the ambassadors of all the powers, and of a numerous crowd, he cast the keys of St. Peter into the river, exclaiming, "From henceforth, the popes shall only need the sword of St. Paul."

At length his holiness, on his return to the Vatican, summoned the Spanish ambassadors into his presence, and ordered them, under penalty of the most terrible censures, to cause the bands of the pillagers who combatted with their troops, to retire from the territories of the church. As they were desirous of excusing themselves on the plea of the necessity of terminating the operations which had been commenced, Julius broke out upon them in outrageous language, and drove them from his presence. He immediately entered into negotiations with the Swiss cantons, to obtain thirty thousand troops, who were to aid him in driving out the Spaniards from Lower Italy, and conquering the kingdom of Naples. The agreement was already signed, and the war was about to break out with fresh fury, when God took pity on Italy, and delivered the earth from this abominable pope, on the 23d of February, 1513.

According to some authors, Julius died from the consequences of a fit of passion; according to others, he fell before the baneful disease which was scouring Europe; all agree in saying, that the cardinal charged to administer the last sacraments to him, having asked him what he had decided upon in regard to the prelates whom he had deposed, the dying man replied to him, "As man, I pardon them; as pope, I curse them." These words are enough to show that the papacy is, in its essence, a vicious and execrable institution, since it commands hatred, and prohibits the forgiveness of injuries.

A bitter satire is attributed to the learned Erasmus, in which Julius the Second is exhibited in the scene with the prince of the apostles; the latter refuses an entrance into the kingdom of heaven to the pope, and reproaches him with all his crimes; he accuses him of incest with his sister and daughter; of vile crimes with his bastards, nephews, and several cardinals; he calls him a perjurer, simoniac, drunkard, robber, murderer, and poisoner; and, finally, declares to him that the gates of heaven are closed against those who are infected by the disease of which he died.

LEO THE TENTH, THE TWO HUNDRED AND TWENTY-FIFTH POPE.

[A. D. 1513:]

Disorders at Rome—Election of Leo the Tenth—Coronation of the pontiff—Politics of the holy father—Louis the Twelfth submits to the pope—Leo opposes himself to the pacification of Europe—Decree of the council of Lateran on the nature of the soul—Impiety of the pope—He finishes the church of St. Peter—Marries his brother to the princess Philiberte of Savoy—Francis the First, of France, invades Italy—Interview between the king and pope at Bologna—Intrigue of the pope with a lady of the court of France—Concordat between Leo the Tenth and Francis the First—The pontiff despoils the duke of Urbin—Conspiracy against the pope—Meanness of Francis the First to gain the friendship of the pope—Traffic in indulgences—Martin Luther and his doctrines—Bull of Leo the Tenth against Luther—Edict of the emperor Charles the Fifth against the reformer—Treaty between the emperor and pope against France—Death of Leo the Tenth.

As soon as Julius the Second had terminated his execrable life, a revolution broke out at Rome. The populace, who for a long time had been restrained by the iron hand of the pontiff, flew to arms, pillaged the monasteries and the churches, and massacred a great number of priests and monks. At the close of this outbreak, the populace divided itself into two powerful factions, that of the Colonna and of the Urbins, who both sought to profit by the general confusion, in order to obtain the sovereignty of the city. Frightful disorders followed; blood flowed in torrents, and Rome offered nothing to the sight but dead bodies and houses in flames. At length the citizens discovered that they were but tools in the hands of ambitious lords, who disputed among themselves for power; they laid aside their arms, and a calm succeeded to the frightful storm which had passed over the apostolic city. The cardinals hastened to avail themselves of this apparent tranquillity, by entering into conclave. As a beginning, they passed a decree which limited the authority of the pope, and which established the precise privileges of the members of the sacred college. All swore upon the Bible to observe these rules, and immediately afterwards the intrigues commenced among the candidates for the papacy.

Among the members of the conclave, John de Medicis showed himself the most desirous for the heritage of Julius the Second. Varillas thus speaks of this cardinal: "John de Medicis had been scarcely three months reinstalled in his palace at Florence, when the news of the death of Julius the Second arrived. He immediately conceived the design of causing himself to be elected sovereign pontiff, and took the road for Rome, although he was afflicted with a violent disease, and had two enormous abscesses, which prevented him from walking, or even riding on horseback. He made the journey in a litter, the mules travelling on a walk, in order to avoid the least motion; in this manner he arrived at the holy city; but the obsequies of Julius were terminated, and the conclave had commenced; nevertheless, he caused them to open the gates of the Vatican, and took his place among the other cardinals. Already the members of the sacred college, young and old, had canvassed for their candidates, and seemed so obstinately fixed in their choice, that a long vacancy was threatened, when a very strange event suddenly changed the direction of their wishes and put an end to their intrigues. John de Medicis, though sick and tormented by sharp pains, laboured assiduously to create partizans for himself.

It happened that at the close of a day more laborious than the others, the abscesses broke and gave a passage to vicious humours, which spread through the conclave an infectious smell. The old cardinals, fearing they could not resist the baneful effects of this vitiated atmosphere, consulted physicians as to the mode of preserving themselves from the danger to their health, which must result from a forced residence in the same room with the sick man. They replied, there was no resource but to await the death of De Medicis, which must take place within a month. This opinion of the physicians created a revolution in the conclave; intrigues ceased at once, and the tiara was unanimously conferred on John de Medicis, who was proclaimed sovereign pontiff, at the age of thirty-six, by the title of Leo the Tenth.

The opening of the abscesses saved him from certain death; the corrupt humours flowed through the wounds, and he was cured of his disease.

The new pope was the son of Clarice des Ursini and of Laurent de Medicis, the same to whom Savonarola had refused absolution. At the age of thirteen he had been elevated to the cardinalship, by Innocent the Eighth. His education was entirely worldly; according to Paul Sarpi, he had no tinge of religious ideas; he even affected a silly impiety, saying openly, that religion was only good, in order to restrain the common people in obedience, and ought not to govern the actions of the powerful and rich.

Leo the Tenth, as proud and ambitious as his predecessor, was capable of committing any crime in order to obtain the desired end, but more courtly than Julius the Second, he was less rude and coarse in his intercourse with sovereigns.

His holiness, wishing to wait for the return of his strength, delayed the ceremony of his exaltation until the 11th of April, the anniversary of the battle of Ravenna, on which he had been made prisoner by the French. On the day appointed for the ceremony, clothed in garments studded with diamonds and rubies, his head covered by a tiara so glittering with precious stones that it was impossible steadily to contemplate it, he came to the church of the Lateran, followed by an escort so numerous and brilliant, that, according to a historian of the time, no emperor nor king had ever displayed so much magnificence in their triumphal processions. The Roman clergy, the magistracy, the nobility, the different orders of the monks, black, gray, and white, the different trades, the chiefs of the soldiery, clothed in glittering armour, formed an immense cortege; young maids and children, clothed in white, cast palms and flowers before the steps of the pontiff through the route. He himself advanced, mounted on an Arabian courser, having around him the members of the sacred college and his relatives, among whom, the commander of the Medici, armed at all points, was distinguished. The procession had not passed the walls of the city when a courier arrived, announcing the death of Raphael Pucci, archbishop of Florence; Leo, after having read the despatch, turned towards his cousin, and without interrupting the march, said to him with a loud voice, "My cousin, I announce to you that to-morrow you will quit the profession of arms to receive the succession of Raphael Pucci, and become an archbishop." This took place, though the commander was as much a stranger to the duties as a lawless soldier could be, whose whole life had been passed in pillaging, stealing and throat cutting.

After the celebration of the pontifical mass the holy father bestowed his blessing on the people, and retraced the road to the Vatican, where a feast awaited him worthy of Lucullus or Apicius. The expense of this feast was computed at more than a hundred thousand crowns of gold.

As soon as he was installed in the Holy See, the new pope abandoned himself to luxury and debauchery; he invited to Rome all the artists and authors of Italy, and his court soon became the most brilliant in Europe. We should render him the justice of having banished brutal debauchery, which he replaced by gallantry, a species of corruption less ignoble, but more dangerous, inasmuch as it depraves society without drawing on itself general reprobation. The court of Rome became a school of materialism, and of philosophical atheism, from the bosom of which the pontiff king directed the political affairs of the church. He at once studied the aggrandizement of his family; he placed his brother Peter at the head of the government of Tuscany, and reserved for his other brother, Julian the Magnificent, the crown of Naples, which he had decided to take away from Ferdinand the Fifth. He did not suffer this last project to be known, preferring to wait until circumstances should offer to him a certain chance of success. He was next occupied in extending the authority of the Holy See, and preserving its independence. To effect this, he refused to conclude a treaty with Ferdinand the Catholic; and he was likewise unwilling to adhere to any proposition of peace with the French, from fear of seeing them return anew into Italy. His holiness did not ratify, but in part, the engagements made with the Swiss by his predecessor, because he had felt the inconvenience of carrying on war with mercenary soldiers, who mutinied if they did not receive their pay on the appointed day, or who enrolled themselves under the banner of their enemies, if they obtained thereby an increase of pay. He was unwilling longer to remain in league with Maximilian Sforza, duke of Milan, whom he regarded as a weight upon the Holy See; nor with the emperor, who was a fickle and dangerous friend, and who had declared, on being compelled to renounce his pretensions on the papacy, that the states of the church appertained to the empire of the west, and that destiny had designed to restore to the title of emperor its ancient splendour; last of all, the holy father refused, with better reasons still, to ally himself with the Venetians, who had made a treaty with Louis the Twelfth.

Nevertheless, he sent an ambassador named Cinthio to the court of France, to assure the king of his true intentions, and to offer the respectful sentiment of the family of the Medici for Louis the Twelfth. The legate was also charged to explain to his majesty, that on reaching the pontifical throne, Leo the Tenth, having found the Holy See engaged in a vow of declared hostility to France, it would be imprudent to change its policy at once; that in consequence of it, he besought the king not to impute to any ill will the disposition he was constrained to adopt, in order to thwart his projects of conquering the Milanese. He besought him also not to be offended if he should exhort him by a brief, not to undertake any thing against Italy, under pain of anathema, interdiction, and deposition; also, that nothing would diminish the constant affection of his holiness for his person. He kindly warned him that, at his solicitation, Henry the Eighth of England, was preparing for a descent on France; also, that in spite of himself, and in obedience to the sacred college, the pope was constrained to engage Maximilian the First to attack his frontiers on the Rhine, whilst the Swiss invaded Burgundy; that, in fine, he was obliged to permit Ferdinand the Catholic to pursue his conquests in Navarre, in consequence of this king having purchased from his predecessor, for forty-two thousand crowns of gold, authority to do so.

Without disquieting themselves with these threats, the French, under the command of Louis de La Tremouille, penetrated into Italy, joined the Venetians, and recommenced hostilities. The Milanese were reconquered for the third time, and Genoa again passed under the rule of France. Unfortunately, Anne of Brittany shackled the progress of affairs, and caused her weak husband to write to Tremouille to advance no farther in the work.

Mezerai explains this subject in these words:—"The greatest enemy of the king was, beyond all contradiction, Madame the queen, on account of her scruples of conscience; she accused him of wishing to seal his everlasting damnation, by resisting the popes and assembling councils to oppose them; and, as she wearied him out with her complaints, the poor king had no other means of purchasing domestic peace, than by suspending the war at the moment he was victorious, and on the point of bringing the pope to reason."

This excessive tenderness of Louis the Twelfth for his wife, was nigh costing him his crown, for his enemies, attributing the inactivity of his general to weakness or inability, recovered their boldness. The Swiss, who were in the pay of Leo the Tenth, marched against the French, cut them to pieces at Novare, so that Tremouille could barely lead back to France some thousands of men. Almost at the same moment, Anjou was invaded by the English, Navarre by the Spaniards, Burgundy by a second army of Swiss, and the provinces bordering on the Rhine by Maximilian.

In this extremity, the king was obliged to have recourse to the clemency of Leo the Tenth; he immediately sent ambassadors to Rome with letters patent, sealed with his own seal, subscribed by himself, and expedited by his own command. On their arrival in the holy city, the envoys of France were subjected to the most humiliating ceremonials; they were introduced into the consistory, at which the pope presided, covered with ornaments glittering with gold and precious stones; they were constrained to prostrate themselves with their foreheads to the earth, in the presence of the ambassadors of the foreign courts, of the cardinals, and of numerous officers of the church, and then they humbly implored pardon for their master, promising, in his name, not to give, in future, any aid to the enemies of the Holy See, and to combat them by arms, without fraud or dissimulation. They declared that the king disapproved of the council of Pisa, that he detested the decisions made in that assembly of schismatics and heretics, that he would engage to pursue the prelates who had taken part in this assembly, to drive them from the city of Lyons, from the kingdom, from all the lands or lordships placed under his rule, and to deliver them over to the holy inquisition, if he should make them prisoners; in addition, they signed an adherence to the council of the Lateran, engaging to recognise it as the only standard, and approving of all the decrees it had made or might hereafter make.

Louis the Twelfth made peace with Ferdinand the Fifth, by promising to him his daughter Renée of France, for one of his younger sons, and by abandoning to him Navarre; he obtained the evacuation of the Rhenish provinces occupied by Maximilian, by surrendering to him the Milanese; in order to put a stop to his quarrels with Henry the Eighth of England, as he was a widower by the death of Anne of Brittany, now dead some months, he demanded in marriage the young Mary of England who was promised to him; as to the Swiss he purchased their neutrality with gold. These arrangements, which put an end to the operations of the holy league, did not obtain the approbation of Leo the Tenth, who had promised himself to prolong the war between the different princes, until Louis the Twelfth, occupied in defending himself, would not dream of re-appearing in arms beyond the Alps; and his holiness went to work to re-animate discords and lanch new anathemas against France, when he received the news of the death of the king.

A moment of calm ensued, of which the pontiff availed himself to continue the labours of the synod of the Lateran. His holiness received in a solemn session the fathers of Pisa, who came to ask pardon for their past conduct; the promoters of this meeting, the cardinals of Sainte Croix and Saint Severin were obliged to appear before the pope, clothed in the garments of simple priests, and to avow that they had been justly degraded by Julius the Second, because an ecclesiastic ought never to raise himself up against the head of the church.

During the same sitting, Leo the Tenth published a decree relative to the immortality of the soul: "We command all philosophers, professors in the universities, to combat the views which opposed the faith established by the church, in maintaining that the soul is mortal like the body, and the world is eternal."

Martin Luther affirms in his works, that Leo the Tenth denied positively the immortality of the soul, and that one day, after having listened to two skilful doctors, who were discussing this fundamental doctrine of the Christian faith, he terminated it by this singular conclusion: "The reasons which you give for the affirmative, appear to me profound, but I prefer the negative, because it is determined for us to endeavour to take care of our bodies, and to acquire embonpoint."

They passed a considerable number of decrees on various subjects of religious controversy, in the council of the Lateran; they offer, however, too little interest to be reported in detail. In the midst of his political debate, Leo the Tenth continued his projects for embellishing Rome, and continued, under the direction of Julian of San Gallo, the construction of the celebrated church of St. Peter, of which the design had been furnished under the preceding pontificate, by Francis Lazzari. Bramante, a celebrated architect, sprung from the ranks of the people, as almost all great artists are.

We should render this justice to Julius the Second, that he knew how to encourage the arts, and although the labours which he commanded, had for their results, but monuments useless to men, it is no less true, that it was to him that Rome owed the execution of a project formed by Nicholas the Fifth, to elevate, on the site of the ancient church of St. Peter, a church which should not be equalled in any city of the world. Bramante submitted to his holiness different plans, among which was one representing a cathedral with two churches, and two steeples; it was this which the pope adopted. There is still a medal of it, engraved by the famous artist Corodasso. More than eight thousand workmen were employed in tearing down the old church. Bramante laid the foundations of this new monument, and pushed on the work with such celerity, that it was easy to see that the artist wished to monopolise the glory of completing a gigantic project, which required the lifetime of several men. He threw down, without remorse, the magnificent columns of the old church, and replaced them by four grand arches, which rested on massive bases; he destroyed the ancient tombs of the popes, and the precious mosaics which decorated them. Bold and ingenious in his designs, Bramante made the arches of his building in a single casting, with a composition of lime and marble dust, tempered in water, in such a way, that they appeared to be decorated with mosaics, representing recesses with mouldings and rosaces.

Unfortunately, this great work, executed so hastily, was wanting in solidity, and the arches fell down a few years after the death of the celebrated architect. Those who re-undertook this gigantic work, Julian de San Gallo, Peruzzi, and Michael Angelo, only preserved the arches which supported the tower of the dome, and destroyed the rest.

Leo the Tenth continued to preside at the sittings of the council of the Lateran; at the tenth session two remarkable acts were committed; the publication of a decree in favour of usury, and the promulgation of a bull against the liberty of the press. In the first decrees the holy father decided that pawnbrokers were authorised to levy upon the unfortunate a greater interest than the ordinary one, provided they would pay over half the profits into the treasury of the pope; an odious calculation, and which ought the more to excite our indignation, because, under the mask of philanthropy, it aided to despoil the poor of their last resources. In the second decree, the pontiff, after enumerating at length the inconveniences which resulted to religion from the fever for instruction which had taken possession of men's minds, and which the invention of printing tended to propagate, resolved, in his wisdom, that the works of authors should be submitted to censors, and that no book should be printed for the use of the faithful, who inhabited the states of the church, which had not received the approbation of the vicar of the pope and the master of the sacred palace, and of the diocesan bishops, or inquisitors of districts in other countries, under pain of being excommunicated and judged as heretics; that is, of being burned alive! Despite these threats of Leo, whom servile historians call the restorer of letters, and who sought to thicken the darkness which enveloped the world, the press triumphed, and nothing could subdue that power which was about to break down absolute thrones, and overthrow the altars of superstition. The time had not, however, yet arrived for the people to free themselves entirely from this odious yoke, and the popes were still the pests of nations.

His holiness pursued his objects for the aggrandisement of his family, and married to his brother Julien, the young princess Philiberte of Savoy, sister to Duke Charles, and to Louisa, the mother of Francis the First, who succeeded Louis the Twelfth. The new monarch profited by this circumstance to make new offers to the Holy See, to aid him in his pretensions on Italy, and sent two ambassadors, William Budé, and Antonio Pallavicini, a Milanese lord, under pretext of complimenting him on the marriage of his brother, but, in reality, to propose to the pope to abandon to him the duchy of Milan, in exchange for a principality for Julien de Medicis, which should be composed of the states of Parma, Placenza, Modena, and Reggio, and of which the brother of the pontiff should be invested as a feudatory of the Holy See. This proposition, though very conformable to the views of his holiness, was not acceded to, because the emperor Maximilian had already made him better offers.

Francis the First, furious at finding himself pushed aside; and suspecting the existence of a new coalition against him, resolved to surprise his enemies before they had united their forces. He passed the mountains, and penetrated even to the gates of Milan, before the armies of the pope and his allies could form their junction. The Swiss alone had had time to descend from their mountains, and were ready to dispute the way with Francis. They numbered forty thousand men, an equal force with their enemy, and had, besides, the advantage of fighting in a friendly country, and were moreover animated by the remembrance of their victory at Novare.

When the Swiss found themselves before the French, they made a manœuvre to surprise them before they were ranged in order of battle; they charged on the artillery, which was vigorously defended, and by which they suffered a heavy loss; then they attacked the infantry, and had already broken the first rank, when the French cavalry, debouching from a ravine, fell upon their battalions with a horrible carnage. On both sides the combat was maintained all day with equal fury; the next day the battle recommenced, and during four hours the victory remained undecided, when the Swiss, despairing of forcing the front of their enemy, had the imprudence to change their order of battle, in order to attack them in flank, and in doing so, left between their right wing and their centre, a wide space, which the French gendarmes immediately occupied. The fate of the day was decided; the Swiss, after performing prodigies of valour, left the field of battle in possession of their enemies, and beat a retreat, having lost fifteen thousand men; the loss of the French was between five and six thousand. This victory, which was called the day of Marignan, rendered Francis master of the Milanese. Maximilian Sforza was constrained to yield it to the conqueror, and obtained in exchange for it, a residence in France and a considerable pension. A debut so brilliant, struck Italy with fright; Genoa hastened to submit; the pope himself sent an ambassador to compliment the young king upon a success which filled him with rage. Francis, vain and presumptuous, as are all kings, believed himself invincible, and neglecting the councils of wise men, concluded a treaty with the pope, and yielded great advantages to the family of the Medici.

Through a new ruse the pope did not appear eager to ratify the engagements made by his legate; and when he decided to do so, it was on condition that Francis should meet him at Bologna, to discuss the abolition of the pragmatic sanction. The king agreed to the interview, and went to the place appointed by the holy father, accompanied by an escort of six thousand musqueteers, and twelve hundred men-at-arms. The pontiff had arrived before him, and waited for him, so that, on his entry into Bologna, he was received by twenty-four cardinals, all clothed in their red capes; then he was conducted to the sound of music to the pontifical palace. Leo received the young conqueror with that obsequious politeness which characterises the priests of all ages, and overwhelmed him with praise.

"That which most captivated Francis," says an ancient chronicler, "was the graceful manner in which his holiness performed the mass; the monarch could not cease from his admiration during the performance of the sacred office, and wished himself so much to serve as a train bearer, that they could scarcely prevent him from doing so." Thus the pontiff obtained the good graces of his guest, and had the appearance of yielding to his solicitations, in restoring to the duke of Ferrara the cities of Modena and Reggio, of which the Holy See claimed possession. In return, he exacted that Francis should abandon his ally the duke of Urbino, whose estates were convenient to Julien de Medicis, inasmuch as their reunion to those of Florence would constitute a sovereignty, which would extend from the Tuscan sea to the gulf of Venice. Lastly, he drew from the weak monarch the promise of abolishing the pragmatic sanction, under the secret condition that the pope would aid him in conquering the kingdom of Naples, after the death of Ferdinand the Catholic.

Hanelot de la Houssaye relates many scandalous adventures, in connection with certain ladies of the court, who had permission to come to Bologna during the interview between the two sovereigns, and amongst others, one concerning one of the mistresses of the king, named Marie Gaudin, who was remarkably beautiful. It appears that this lady attracted the attention of his holiness, and by an agreement between him and Francis, she yielded to the passion of the pope, who gave her as a memento, a jewel of great value, which was carefully preserved in the family of Sourdias, under the name of the Gaudin diamond.

The pope and the king of France separated, mutually satisfied with each other; the former because he had gained a kingdom for his brother, the latter because he had had the honour of carrying the train of the pontiff's robes. This agreement between the courts of Rome and France so much annoyed Maximilian that he spread injurious reports against Leo, saying, "that one could look for nothing good from the popes, and that if this one had not deceived him, he would have been the first who kept faith since St. Peter." He did not confine himself to recriminations, and in order to avenge himself on the holy father, he immediately entered Italy at the head of a powerful army, which gained many advantages over the French.

His holiness, finding that fortune was abandoning his new allies, rapidly changed sides, reconciled himself secretly with the emperor, and sent to him two hundred men-at-arms, under the command of Mark Antony Colonna. Not only did the holy father refuse to furnish to the constable of Bourbon, governor of the Milanese for the king, the succour of five hundred lances and three thousand Swiss, which he had engaged to do, but even pushed his presumption so far as to cause his troops to subserve his projects on the duchy of Urbin, which he conquered in twenty-two days. Encouraged by impunity, he formed a conspiracy with those banished from Milan, with the chancellor Moran, and the Colonna, to make a new Sicilian vespers, and to destroy all the French who were found in the duchy. Fortunately the constable Bourbon discovered the plot, and advised the king of it, demanding from him authority to chastise the pope. Francis replied that he must bring back the pope by mild means, and not to come to vexatious extremes with him.

This reply so enraged the constable, that he immediately threw up his command and wrote to his prince, "that he knew well that astrologers had predicted that Leo the Tenth would make his brother Julien, king of Naples, and his nephew Laurent, duke of Milan, but that he had never supposed the king of France would aid in accomplishing the prophecy, and above all, that he would serve as a stepping stone to elevate the Medici to thrones."

From that moment Francis the First made so many mistakes, that it appeared as if he took pleasure in ruining his own affairs, in order to strengthen his enemies. He authorised the chancellor Duprat to arrange with Leo the famous concordat which destroyed all the liberties of the Gallican church; he consented to the abolition of the pragmatic sanction; he re-established the payment of tithes, not after the old taxation, but according to the real value of ecclesiastical benefices, which increased still more the revenues of the pope. In vain did the parliament of Paris, the chapters, the universities, the Sorbonne itself, declaim against the violation of canonical elections; the monarch refused to yield to the representations of his subjects, and compelled the parliament to register the concordat.

On his part, Leo published to the council of Lateran a bull to abolish the pragmatic sanction, a very rare piece, on account of the proud tone which the head of the church affects in his language, and of the pretensions which he openly makes for the universal dominion, temporal, as well as spiritual, of the Holy See. He declares that councils are inferior to popes; that all the faithful owe above all things absolute obedience to the Holy See; that the pope has the power to erase and cancel all decrees made by ecclesiastical assemblies, by kings or by parliaments, in favour of the pragmatic sanction, and that all who shall refuse to conform to his decree will be excommunicated, deprived of their honours and dignities, and their lands put under an interdict.

During the last session of the council, Leo took care to procure, through the cardinals, an extraordinary interposition of tenths, which was levied under the pretext of a crusade against the Turks. Whilst his holiness was occupied in repairing the disorder of his finances by the spoils of the people, Ferdinand the Fifth languished upon a bed of sickness, attacked by a dropsy. Always a cheat and a hypocrite, even in the arms of death, the old king caused himself to be clothed in the garments of a monk, in order to feign humility, and thus rendered to the infernal regions his execrable soul. This monster had merited the surname of Catholic, on account of his cruelties towards heretics. During his reign the inquisition had condemned almost an hundred thousand persons, who had the misfortune to be too rich or too virtuous, and an historian adds, that "in order to paint this tyrant in a few words, it would be sufficient to say, he had the soul of Louis the Eleventh and the heart of Nero."

After the death of Ferdinand the Fifth, the holy father, instead of fulfilling the promises which he had made to Francis the First relative to the kingdom of Naples, claimed possession of it for his family; and in order to insure the success of his projects, he solemnly invested his nephew, Laurent de Medicis, with the estates of the duke of Urbin; he dispossessed the cardinal Petrucci, and his two brothers, Borghise and Fabius, of the city of Sienna; he despoiled many cardinals of their property; and, at length, by his tyranny, he raised against himself so violent a hatred, that Petrucci and Bandinelli de Sauli organised a conspiracy against his life. They made overtures to many of their colleagues, on their project of ridding themselves of the pope, and even gained over the physician, who was attending his holiness for a fistula, and who engaged to poison him in a glyster; unfortunately Leo conceived some suspicions and changed his physician. This determination made the conspirators fear treason, and many quitted Rome; but as there was none, some re-gathered courage, and Petrucci determined to stab Leo with his own hand, in order to terminate the matter.

He was so unfortunate as to open his design to some cardinals, and to write to the other conspirators, in order to fix a day for the execution. The holy father, forewarned in time, placed spies about many of his enemies, intercepted their correspondence, and soon held in his hand the threads of their plot. As usual, he dissembled, the better to avenge himself; he overwhelmed with caresses the cardinals whom he doubted most; he recalled Bandinelli to his court, and promised even to re-establish Petrucci and his family in the city of Sienna. To this effect he addressed to his enemy a safe conduct, in order that he should come to discuss the conditions of his re-installation with him, and swore on the evangelists, that he had no cause to doubt any injury to his person.

Petrucci fell into the snare and came to Rome. The moment he entered the Vatican, the sbirri strangled him; others of the conspirators who were without the holy city were condemned to exile, and deprived of their property and honours. His holiness then published that he would pardon those who offered to the Holy See a sum of money, in expiation of their crime, which was in accordance with the enormity of their guilt. Many cardinals had the imprudence to trust to the promises of the pope, and came to treat of their ransom; without further procedure, the sovereign pontiff caused them to be arrested. Some were poisoned in their prisons, others were beheaded, others quartered; in fine, the cruel Leo not having spared any of his victims, it resulted that he was obliged to make a promotion of thirty-one cardinals, to fill up the vacancies which he had made in the ranks of the sacred college.

It was not only in Italy that the pope found a formidable opposition. In France all people of property levelled their opposition against the bull which overthrew the pragmatic sanction. Parliament openly resisted the king, and refused to register the concordat. The university of Paris protested with the same vigour, and the rector caused them to affix in all the streets of the capital, a command, forbidding booksellers or printers, to sell or print a single copy of the concordat, under penalty of being driven out of the body of the university; even more, the doctors assembled in a consultative conclave, and drew up an act of appeal to a future council, declaring the synod of the Lateran a cabal of simoniacs. They declared that the pope was neither sinless nor infallible, and that it was the duty of the faithful to resist him, whenever he commanded the performance of unjust acts. Some preachers, animated by the same sentiments, thundered from their pulpits against the pontiff, the chancellor Duprat, and Francis the First, whom they denounced as an execrable tyrant, who, not content with burthening the nation with taxes, wished even to oppress their consciences. His majesty immediately commanded the first president Olivier, to condemn the priests who dared attack his royal person; but the feeling of reprobation against the loose monarch was so strong, that the parliament refused to obey him.

In Germany, Spain, England, and even Switzerland, they protested with more violence still against the abuses of the court of Rome, and publicly accused Leo the Tenth of being more ambitious, debauched, and despotic, than any of his predecessors ever had been.

His holiness, seeing the disrepute attached to the papacy daily increasing, determined to re-brighten the lustre of the tiara, by making the pontifical court the first in the world for its luxury, splendour, and magnificence. But the prodigious expense soon swallowed up the treasures amassed in the coffers of the Vatican, and ordinary resources becoming insufficient, Leo the Tenth was obliged to have recourse to extraordinary means. To effect this, he revived the ancient tax on crimes, levied by John the Twenty-second, and which was shut up in the archives of the chancellor's office. He changed some articles, added others, and caused a large number of copies to be printed and circulated throughout Europe, by which Christians were informed that the pope sold absolution for rape, adultery, incest, sodomy, bestiality, or assassination, and that for money, one could purchase pardon for any crime, even parricide!!!

His holiness in the next place, published a crusade against the Turks, in order to levy the tenths; this last mode, however, which had been a source of wonderful profit to his predecessors, failed him; the nuncio sent into Spain was driven from it in disgrace, by cardinal Ximenes, the regent of the kingdom.—Other agents, disseminated through the other countries, returned also empty handed.

Leo the Tenth discovered that this mode was exhausted, and that he must hit upon some new expedient, in order to bring in money, which was becoming very necessary, as his creditors threatened to make a grand explosion. Then it was, that he organised on a vast scale the speculation in indulgences; in every province he appointed farmers general, who kept their offices in churches or monasteries, and sold indulgences for the living and the dead; and in order that no village or hamlet should escape his rapacity, he sent legions of Dominican monks, who traversed town and country armed with bulls, and who levied contributions on the inhabitants. The following is the tenor of one of these singular forms of absolution, delivered by Arcoembold, one of the farmers general in Saxony:—"As our Lord Jesus Christ absolves you by the merits of his passion, I, by his authority, and that of the blessed apostles, St. Peter and St. Paul, and that of our most holy father, absolve you from all ecclesiastical censures under which you may have fallen, from all sins, delinquencies, or excesses which you may have committed, or shall commit hereafter, how great soever they may be, and I make you a partaker in all the spiritual merits acquired by the church militant or its members. I restore you to the holy sacraments, to the unity of the faithful, to purity and innocence as of an infant newly born who comes to receive baptism, so that the gate of hell shall be shut against you, and that of paradise opened to you on your death.—Amen!"

John Tetzel, another bullist, who also op-

nated in Saxony, was so impudent as to spread about obscene circulars, by means of which he outdid his colleagues in obtaining dupes. He entered into the most cynical details of the sins he could absolve, and ended by this singular allocution, "Yes, my brethren, his holiness (the pope) has conferred upon me a power so great, that the gates of heaven would open at my voice, even before a sinner who had committed the worst crime which thought can conceive." This miserable instrument of the pope granted indulgences called personal, by means of which a Christian could remit the crimes of ten persons of his selection, ninety-nine times a year. He sold the power of delivering as many souls from purgatory as one should enter or come forth from a church during the twenty-four hours which elapsed between the first and second days of August every year. For a small sum he diminished, by eighty thousand years, the pains of purgatory, to those who visited a church consecrated to St. Sebastian; and four thousand years to those who went at certain epochs into churches dedicated to the Virgin; he even sold, for a rather larger sum, the power of constraining the mother of the Saviour to come in person to announce to the faithful the day and hour of their death. But that which, beyond all contradiction, brought most money to the Holy See was a bull, by virtue of which Leo decreed that banditti could so settle matters with the pontifical commissaries or their delegates, that by surrendering a part of their spoils, they could enjoy at peace the fruits of their rapine. His holiness granted them full and entire absolution, even though they were assassins, or despoilers of the widow and the orphan, or even carried off the property of hospitals or pious legacies destined for the endowment of poor young girls, or robbed families of their inheritance by means of false titles or forged wills, or though they had pillaged churches and monasteries; the pope excepted nothing but robberies committed on the Holy See.

The Dominicans, the pedlars of the apostolic bulls, acquitted themselves admirably in their mission, and announced to the faithful that it was better for them to die of famine in this world, than lose the chance of purchasing their eternal safety in the next. As for themselves, they led a gay life, passing their days in playing at dice or cards, and their nights in swilling wine in the public taverns. "These braggarts, these porters of absolutions, of relics, and of rogations, these hypocrites, who speculate in pictures of saints and images of the Lamb, these rogues who flatter their dupes in order to pick their pockets, and who rob the simple even to their shirt," says the ardent Catholic, Oliver Maillard, "I have heard them boast of having drawn from a poor village even a thousand crowns for indulgences, without counting the hundred pounds they had paid to the curate for his good will."

and most orthodox men of this time, thus expresses his opinion of the bullist in his sermons: "Behold these robbers, sent out by the pope, see how they decoy the poor people; they travel over hill and plain, despoiling the simple of their last penny, and in order to rob at their ease, they make a bargain with the priests. 'We carry the indulgences,' they say, 'curate, assemble thy flock, we will pick them together, and have a frolic under the very beards of the imbeciles;' and these infamous priests, these concubine-keeping, drunken, and mercenary curates, in order the better to fill their bellies and keep their mistresses, enter into a compact with these porters of bulls, extort, pillage, and rob the idiots who open their purses to deliver their souls from purgatory. They then take their pastimes together, and say, 'Let us have a good time, let us enjoy our lechery, and make a feast, a bull will pay for it all.' O my God! who can recount the horrid acts these Dominicans commit in this shameful traffic of indulgences."

In the mean time, the measure of the scandal was full; an universal cry of indignation was raised against the Holy See; on all sides they attacked the colossal statue with the feet of clay; bold men cried out to the people, "Draw away from the dominion of the popes, those shameless thieves who have made the temple of Christ a cave of robbers." Among the reformers who then arose, one became remarkable from the boldness of his denunciations, the masculine vigour of his mind, his obstinate perseverance in the strife, and the profundity of his thoughts. He placed himself at the head of the religious movement, and made the schism, which was about to dispute the empire of the world with the papacy, to glitter. This reformer was Martin Luther.

This indefatigable enemy of the pope was born in Saxony, on the 10th of November, 1484, at Eisleben, in the county of Mansfeldt, of a family of poor labourers. His father worked in the mines, and he himself aided him in his rude labours.

Soon the young Luther, yielding to a supernatural impulse, quitted the paternal roof, and came to Eisenach, where he attended on the public instruction. Matthew Dresser says, that the poor student, destitute of resources, laboured assiduously all day and begged at night, or endeavoured to excite the compassion of the faithful by singing psalms. At length his energy triumphed over all obstacles; his aptitude for study caused him to make such rapid progress in the sciences, that at the age of eighteen he aspired to the honours of the doctorate.

Martin Luther was about to pass his examination as a lawyer, when a terrible event changed his destiny. Whilst he was walking with one of his brother students, a storm arose and the lightning struck his friend by his side. This accident operated powerfully on his young imagination; he regarded it as a warning from God, who ordered him to renounce the world. The next day but one he entered into a convent of the Augustins at Erfurt, from whence he was afterwards sent to Wittenburg to study theology. In this last city, his talents caused him to be chosen a professor. In 1510 Luther was deputed to look after the affairs of his order at the court of Julius the Second. "I was a witness," says he, in one of his works, "of so many scandalous acts, that on the day of my departure, I resolved to labour during my life for the overthrow of the papacy, and the reform of abuses which had been introduced into religion by avaricious priests or depraved pontiffs."

An ardent imagination, a mind strengthened by profound study, a natural eloquence which religious enthusiasm rendered still more enchanting, a sonorous voice, an unwearied breast, an impetuous character, a robust body, such were the principal traits which characterized the apostle of reform. "It is the trumpet or rather the thunder," said Calvin, "it is the thunderbolt which has awakened the world from its lethargy. It was not Luther who spoke, but God himself who crushed the pope by his mouth."

Behold how Luther sounded the trumpet of alarm against the court of Rome, on his return from the holy city. "People, listen! I come in the name of the Most High, to point out for your execration the abominable pontiff who presses you down; I come in the name of Jesus Christ, to command you not to yield him any mercy, to launch a poignard into his bosom, and to treat all his adherents as brigands, be they kings or emperors. Oh, if I were chief of the empire, I would soon make a package of the pope and his cardinals, and cast them together into the Tiber. This bath might cure them of the baneful maladies which consume them."

This debut announced the approach of a violent struggle, which was sustained on both sides, by the Roman priests as well as by the reformers, with an obstinacy of which we have not even to this time witnessed the like. Luther, starting from this principle, that God alone had the right to impose laws on men, attacked the monstrous power which the popes, in declaring themselves infallible, had claimed; he exposed the wheels of their policy; he dragged from their face the mask of hypocrisy and imposture, which had concealed from the eyes of the faithful the hideous wrinkles which their debaucheries had stamped upon their forehead; he thundered against the sluggishness, and called down reprobation on the legions of monks who covered Italy, France, England, Switzerland, and Germany. Disclaiming all the affected forms of language, Luther made for himself a popular eloquence, employing very frequently expressions which were vulgar, trivial, and even cynical, but which had the advantage of rendering his ideas distinct to the masses, and of exciting them. Besides, we should not forget that this language, harsh, cutting, incisive, was that best adapted to his audience, and that the reformer only followed the plan of the most celebrated preachers of the time.

We will cite some passages from the sermons of the Cordelier Thomas, and of Oliver Maillard, two holy and orthodox ecclesiastics of the time, in order to give an exact idea of the morals of the clergy, and of the indignation with which these virtuous men resented them. "How long shall we be scandalized by your adulteries and your incests, ye unworthy priests? cried the monk Thomas from the gallery of the cathedral of Bordeaux. When will you cease to fill your gross stomachs with dainty food and sparkling wine? When will you cease to steal money from the poor in order to have a concubine in your bed, a fat mule in your stable, and all by the grace of the crucifix, and taking the trouble to say, 'Dominus Vobiscum?'"

"I know well you will reply, what matters it to you if the poor shall fall famished at your gates; nevertheless, have you no shame in selling the sacraments and devouring the goods of widows and orphans, under pretext of soul-caring souls in purgatory? Curses upon you, ministers of Satan, who seduce young girls and married females, and who learn from them at confession the means of drawing them into sin. Shame on you, priests of Lucifer, who dare to use the ascendant which your character gives you over credulous minds, in order to initiate the young into foul pleasures. Shame on you, who make of your parsonages, houses of infamy, where you rear young girls and young boys for lust and infamy! Shame on you who do not fear to show to your friends the mysteries of these new seraglios, and to gorge yourselves in them with wine, viands, and luxury. Have I not heard, with my own ears, the curate James boast before an assemblage of infamous ecclesiastics, that he played, swore, drank, and fornicated better than any of them."

Maillard, who had been preacher to Louis the Eleventh, thundered with still more force against the disorders of the priests: "I see," said he, "abbots, priests, monks, and even prelates, heaping up treasures on treasures, accumulating prebendaries and benefices, and decoying Christians, like pickpockets. I see the cape, the frock, and the pallium entering taverns by day and night, for the purposes of debauch. Canons or clerks, elevated to dignities, themselves govern places of prostitution; they sell the wine and hold the pledges as the bullies of the girls. I have seen others who walk about insolently disguised as soldiers, or clothed as dandies, with their beards fashionably trimmed, with women of pleasure lounging on their arms. I know a bishop who is every night served at supper by young girls entirely naked; and I know another who keeps a seraglio of young girls, whom he calls prostitutes in moulting."

"Shameful as all these things are, there exist others still more infamous. Bishops no longer give away livings but at the request of females, that is to say, when the mother, sisters, nieces, or cousins of the candidate, have paid the price of them with their honour."

"Speak, ye infamous bishops and priests—ye blessed simoniacs—ye blessed concubine-keepers—ye blessed drunkards and bullies—ye blessed procurers, who gain orders by rendering foul services? Go to the devil ye infamous wretches! At the hour of your death will you dare present yourselves before Christ, full of wine, holding in your hand the gold which you have stolen, and having on your arm the prostitutes whom you have kept, or your mistress servants, or your nieces, who are most frequently your bastards and your concubines, or the girls whose dowry you have gained for them by impurity, or the mother from whom you have purchased the virginity of their daughters? Go to all the devils, cohorts of thieves and pilferers!

"I know well that in exposing your crimes, I run the risk of being assassinated, as has already happened to those who have desired to reform chapters and monasteries; but the fear of your daggers will not chain my tongue, nor arrest the lightning of my indignation; I will tell the whole truth. Come forward then ye women, who abandon your bodies to official persons, to monks, priests, and bishops. Come forward ye who wear chains and robes with trains, and who say, when I blame your luxuriousness, 'Why father, we have seen other women still better dressed than we are, who are neither richer nor nobler than we. Besides, when we have no money, the prelates give us as much as we could earn by the sweat of our body.'

"Come forward ye female drunkards and robbers, ye priestesses of Venus, who dare to say, 'if a priest gets me with child, I will not be the only one.' Come forward nuns and beguines, who people the cisterns and ponds of the convents with the dead bodies of newborn children. What frightful accusations would you not hear, if all those children which are cast into closets or pits could name their executioners or their fathers. Shall not the rain of fire, which formerly destroyed the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah, fall on these convents? Shall not all these priests and bishops be swallowed up as were Korah, Dathan and Abiram? Yes, my brethren, the time is approaching in which God will do justice on all this brood of idlers, of mute dogs, of ignorant wretches, of lechers, robbers, and murderers."

These texts show us in what the sacred eloquence of the period consisted, and prove that it was necessary for a reformer to employ energetic language, in harmony with the education of his hearers.

During the early period of his professorship Luther produced theses, contrary to the received belief in the church on penance, purgatory, and indulgences. John Tetzel, the grand inquisitor of Saxony, who received his share of the profits arising from the sale of the indulgences, naturally undertook the defence of the pope, published a libel against the reformer, and burned publicly the theses of Luther. Luther, who found himself sustained by the college of Wittemberg, and by the elector of Saxony, used reprisals in turn, and burned the work of his adversary. The Dominicans immediately sided with the inquisitor, and made several efforts to assassinate their enemy. As he was on his guard, they were compelled to renounce their plan, and contented themselves with writing to Rome, to beseech Leo the Tenth to summon him as a heretic before his tribunal. The pope informed the elector of Saxony that he wished to interrogate Luther concerning his doctrines, and besought him to place him in the hands of the cardinal Gaëtan, his legate in Germany.

The elector replied that he would not consent to the request of the holy father, since the reformer could be interrogated in his own country, as well as at Rome. Leo the Tenth, obliged to designate one of the cities of Germany, as the place for the trial of his redoubtable adversary, fixed on Augsburg, and sent several of the most learned doctors of his court to that city, to assist his legate.

Luther did not recoil before so solemn an opportunity of professing his doctrines; he only took care to fortify himself with a safe-conduct from the emperor, and went to Augsburg. On the day succeeding his arrival the tribunal opened its session under the presidency of the cardinal Gaëtan. They sought at first to reduce him by brilliant offers; they tendered him honours and wealth if he would abandon his belief; then, as he appeared to be inaccessible to seduction, they sought at another sitting to intimidate him by threats, and summoned him to abjure his errors, under penalty of the most frightful torments. Luther protested the orthodoxy of his belief. He proved that his words and sentiments were the simple and natural explanations of texts of scripture, and of the sacred books, and cast back on the abominations of the Holy See the causes of the offences which afflicted Christendom.

Such resistance convinced the legate that there was only one way now of stopping the schism; it was the arrest of Luther. Fortunately the latter remembered the fate of John Huss and of Jerome of Prague, arrested in defiance of the laws of nations, condemned and burned alive; he fled from Augsburg and escaped the scaffold.

The treachery of his enemies, however, far from intimidating him, increased his boldness; he continued the war against the papacy with new energy; he consecrated all his days to preaching, and all his nights to labouring against the Holy See; his prodigious fecundity multiplied his thoughts under every form, and he inundated all Europe with his works.

Ulrich Zwingle, a curate of Zurich, emboldened by the example of Luther, preached in Switzerland, on monastic vows, the saints, the ecclesiastical hierarchy, the pontifical despotism, the sacraments, and especially that of penance; he even attacked the real presence of God in the eucharist, a dogma which afterwards placed him in opposition to the German reformer. It was in the midst of these circumstances that a Milanese Capuchin, named brother Sancho, arrived in Switzerland, charged with the sale of indulgences. Notwithstanding the violent preaching of Zwingle, this monk still found dupes, so deeply was superstition engrafted in their minds, and he carried off with him more than a hundred and twenty thousand ducats.

The Swiss were not, however, long in recovering from their taste for spiritual favours, and regretted the gold which the Roman court had wrenched from their credulity. The indulgences were every where an object of reproach among the faithful; but what cared Leo the Tenth for the blame of virtuous people; gold was necessary for his luxurious tastes; he needed it for his political intrigues; it was necessary for his debauches, and the sale of indulgences was a true Pactolus, which drifted into his treasury all the gold of Christendom. As he feared lest the preaching of the reformers might arrest in some countries the enthusiasm for indulgences, he published a new decree, providing that the sovereign pontiff, in his capacity of successor of St. Peter, and vicar of Jesus Christ, was irresistibly empowered to remit, by virtue of the keys, the guilt and penalty of sins; that he remitted guilt by the sacrament of penance, and temporal punishments by means of indulgences, representing the superabundance of the merits of Jesus Christ and the saints. The pope added, that belief in these articles was indispensable for an orthodox Christian, and that those who believed or taught a contrary doctrine should be cut off from the communion of the Catholic church; he declared them to be anathematised and denounced them, as well as their adherents, or those who granted them asylum or protection, to the inquisitors, as heretics.

This ill-timed decree had a very different effect from that which Leo the Tenth expected; a general reprobation awaited the bulls of the Roman court. Luther published a terrible work against the popes; he attacked the pontifical infallibility, and proved that the successors of the apostles were not exempt from common imperfections, since St. Peter himself had erred, and had been reprimanded by St. Paul, for having abused his authority and oppressed the faithful; he appealed from all the pursuits of Leo the Tenth, to a general council lawfully assembled, and representing the whole church; he also protested against all excommunications, depositions, or interdicts, until judgment had been pronounced by the fathers.

Notwithstanding the violence of Luther's attacks, such was the blindness at the court of Leo, that no one answered the reformer; his holiness changed none of his modes of action, and pursued his plans of family aggrandizement. Julian de Medicis having died at Florence, from the consequence of sickness contracted in camp, left, as the only heir to his immense fortune, a bastard, named Hippolyte; the pope immediately took him to Rome, and reared him in the pontifical palace like the son of a king. He sent Laurent Medicis, his nephew, to the court of Francis the First, to espouse Madeline de la Tour d'Auvergne, as had been arranged by his holiness and the king of France—in the treaties of Friburg and Noyon.

This marriage, which was to be so fatal for France, since from it sprung Catherine de Medicis, was celebrated at Paris with great rejoicings, for which, as usual, the poor people paid. Nine months afterwards Madeline died in giving birth to a daughter, named Catherine. Laurent de Medicis survived his wife but a few days, and died on the 28th of April, 1519. This death profoundly afflicted the pontiff, who thus found himself the sole legitimate descendent, in a male line, of the elder branch of the Medici, and who saw himself constrained to renounce his hopes of conquest and aggrandizement.

God had sported with the calculations of the ambitious Leo, and had permitted that of this powerful family of Medici, there should only remain some off-casts of the younger branch, whom the pope hated, and some bastards of the elder branch. This frightful accident was the more terrible for his holiness, since he was on the eve of culling the fruits of his policy, and saw an imperial crown, the constant end of all his efforts and of so many years of knaveries, escape from his family, at the very moment in which he had but to stretch out his hand to place it on the forehead of a Medicis. Maximilian the First, was at the point of death, near Luitz, in Austria, leaving no male heir, his son Philip having died some years before, and the succession was about to be disputed by different competitors.

The kings of France and Spain were competitors for it, and sought to gain the electors to their side, by promising them considerable advantages. But Leo, who feared equally these two princes, whose power threatened his own, and might destroy his preponderance in Italy, Charles already possessing the kingdom of Naples, and Francis the First the duchy of Milan, determined by his counsels the electors, who themselves were not disposed for either the king of France or the king of Spain, though the latter was of the German race, and had possessions in Austria, to give their suffrages to Frederick, duke of Saxony, the warmest supporter of Luther. This prince, who had been initiated by the great reformer into the sublime theories of a republican government, refused the throne which was offered him; he made a magnificent speech in the electoral assembly, and sought to demonstrate that the people had no need of masters, and that Germany ought to form a republic. Unfortunately progressive ideas had not yet sufficiently entered their minds, and Frederick was obliged to renounce the hope of sharing his opinions with the electors. He then pronounced between the two candidates, and declared that if Germany were to choose an emperor, it were preferable to take the archduke Charles, the king of Spain, and grandson of Maximilian, and reject the king of France, whose despotism and licentiousness rendered him a true scourge for the people; he moreover, induced them to decree, not to give the crown to Charles of Spain, until after they had limited its power. Up to this time, the states had only exacted from the supreme chief of the empire, a vague and general promise to maintain the privileges of the Germanic body; this time, before pronouncing for the king of Spain, they caused his ambassadors to sign an agreement, which the prince at once confirmed; he was then proclaimed emperor by the name of Charles the Fifth.

His holiness having been unable to hinder the election, was at least desirous to cause the opposition, which he had made to the king of Spain, to be forgotten; he sent an embassy to the young emperor, and demanded from him his friendship, and assistance in extinguishing the new heresy which had invaded all Germany. The pope also engaged to give his aid to the cruel Christian, king of Denmark, the brother-in-law of Charles the Fifth, in subjugating the Swedes, who had had the audacity to combat the troops of their enemies, and to drive off Trolle, archbishop of Upsal, who had wished to sell them to Christian. This audacity of the Swedes, and especially the gold of the king of Denmark, had determined the holy father to fulminate a bull of excommunication against them. Christian, finding himself sustained by such authority, then assembled new troops and laid siege to Stockholm; but he experienced a still more vigorous resistance than the first; Stenon Sture, the administrator of the states of Sweden, defied his army, and drove him in disgrace from its territory.

The king of Denmark, thanks to the aid in men and money, which Charles the Fifth sent him, found himself, a third time, in a condition to recommence hostilities; instead of exposing himself to the chances of battle, he followed the advice of the apostolic nuncios who accompanied him, and had recourse to perfidy, the ordinary arms of kings. He demanded an interview with Stenon Sture, and promised to present himself almost alone, if they would give him the hostages whom he himself designated, and among whom was Gustavus Vasa. The proposal of Christian was accepted. As soon as the felon monarch had in his hands the hostages, who all belonged to the first families of Sweden, he caused them to be bound, and sent to inform the administrator of the kingdom, that he must surrender Stockholm, if he did not wish to see the hostages hung in sight of the citadel; to strengthen this threat, he advanced his troops and pushed the siege of the capital vigorously. The Swedes at first opposed superior courage to that of their enemies, and inflicted on them terrible losses; but the heroic Stenon Sture having been killed in a sortie, discouragement replaced enthusiasm, and the place capitulated.

Christian entered Stockholm in triumph, and leading in his train the unfortunate persons on whom he had so traitorously seized; on the next day he convened the prelates and senators in an assembly, and caused them to recognise him, by an authentic act, as hereditary king of Sweden, and he was solemnly crowned by the infamous Trolle. After the ceremony of his consecration, he gave the chiefs of his army feasts, which lasted a whole month, and during which, all the officers and soldiers of his army were permitted to violate the daughters and wives of the Swedes.

As such disorders could not fail to raise the people, the nuncios of the pope and the archbishop counselled the king, in order to frighten the citizens, to an act of atrocious barbarity; it was simply to murder the nobility and burghers. The nuncios, the prelate Trolle, the confessor of the king, and his barber proposed different modes of execution; the advice of the barber prevailed, and his majesty prepared his state blow as follows:—By virtue of the bull of excommunication fulminated by Leo the Tenth, all Sweden having been declared heretical, the king prepared a list of proscription of all those whose influence over the masses he feared, and under pretext of obeying the orders of the pope, he caused them to be arrested, and judged at once by a commission of priests and inquisitors. On the day fixed for the punishment, soldiers occupied the streets of Stockholm, and prevented the inhabitants from showing themselves at their doors or windows; the prisoners were led out on the great place, and the heads of ninety-four nobles fell beneath the axe of the executioner. This first butchery was but the prelude to greater atrocities; on the next day gallows were erected, and a double number of burghers and nobles were lanced into eternity; on the third and fourth days, the executions continued, only the mode was changed. On the first day they had been beheaded, on the second hung, on the third day they flayed the sufferers, on the fourth quartered them, on the fifth burned them alive; finally, when the great square was covered with dead bodies and bones, and the population had been reduced one-fifth, Christian quitted Stockholm to visit the other cities of Sweden, in which the same scenes of barbarity were renewed. He left every where bloody marks of his passage, murdering women, children, and old men, even his satellites themselves, when they allowed sentiments of pity to appear for the unfortunates whom they were constrained to torture.

Frightful as were these executions, advised by the court of Rome, they do not approach, neither in the number of victims, nor the refinements of punishments, the cruelties exercised by the Spanish priests in Mexico, who murdered several millions of Indians, in the name of the God of Peace, and by virtue of a bull of his holiness Leo the Tenth: whilst the fanatical and cruel Spaniards were reducing a new world to the Catholic religion, the doctrines of Luther were preparing the emancipation of Germany. It was not the elector of Saxony alone who protected the illustrious reformer; he was sustained by powerful lords, illustrious generals, renowned captains, nobles who reclaimed the possession of wealth on which convents and churches had seized; by the burghers and the people, who were all tired of seeing their spoils pass into the hands of the agents of the pope. Every one listened with enthusiasm to the preaching of Luther on religious liberty, the despotism of the bishops of Rome, the splendour of the pontifical court, the corruption of the clergy, and the dissoluteness of monks and nuns.

Leo the Tenth finally discovered, by the rapid strides which the reform ideas were making, that the struggle was a serious one, and that he had not an instant to lose in arresting the evil, and striking a great blow. He then wrote to Charles the Fifth, that he must arrest the preacher Martin Luther, to be judged and condemned by the holy inquisition. But the thing was not so easy as the pope had imagined; the emperor replied, that it would be imprudent at that time to make an attempt on the freedom of a citizen of Germany without some motive; that it was not in that country, as in Spain or Italy; and that, moreover, he had not yet received the imperial crown, and could not, consequently, exercise any jurisdiction. He promised, however, that as soon as his coronation was over, he would convene a general diet to judge the reformer, and he pledged himself to have him condemned, and given up to the officers of the inquisition. Charles besought the pope to fulminate, as a preliminary step, a new bull of anathema against the doctrines of Luther, so as to strike dread into the minds of the German nobles, and render his condemnation still more certain. His holiness followed the advice of the emperor, and published the famous bull which commences with these words of the psalmist: "Arise my God and defend your cause. . . ."

After this exordium the pope addressed the apostles Peter and Paul, to demand their aid, and terminates by this appeal to the faithful: "An enraged heretic rends us furiously, and blasphemes the holy pontiffs, our predecessors; like the serpent, he spreads the venom of calumny by his bite, so that the feeble, whose minds have been blinded by his falsehoods, are unwilling longer to believe in the gospel of Christ, and have taken the side of this innovator, or rather, have enrolled under the banners of the devil. It is on this account that we have judged it important for the safety of Christendom, formally to condemn forty-one propositions drawn from the writings of this reprobate, as being heretical, false, scandalous, contrary to Catholic truth, and capable of seducing the simple. We consequently prohibit, under penalty of excommunication and deprivation of the sacraments, belief in these propositions, their maintenance, preaching, and tolerating others to teach them, directly or indirectly, in public or private, tacitly or in express terms. We also order complete and exact search for the books which contain them, to be made in all the provinces, and that they be solemnly burned in the presence of the clergy, and before the people, under penalty of the most terrible censures of the church." In this bull Leo the Tenth defines the condemned propositions, and relates, in all their details, the efforts which had been made to bring back Luther to the true light, and pluck him from the abyss into which he had plunged.

This bull was a subject of controversy and criticism on the part of men of letters and politicians in Europe, not only for its judicial formulary, but even for its obscure style, for his holiness had not feared to use sentences which contained more than four hundred and fifty words. All powerless and ridiculous, as was the decree of the pope, the reformer penetrated his intentions, and from that time threw away all restraint in his preaching. He declaimed against the pontiff and his adherents; he called down the curses of the people on them, and not content with exciting Germany by his powerful language, he inundated Europe with his satirical writings; finally, in a public discourse, he tore the bull of the holy father; he called it an execrable production of antichrist, "and even let Satan excommunicate me," said he, "I anathematise him in my turn, and as they burn my writings at Rome, I give to the flames the bulls and decretals of this prince of darkness, and I adjure all men to come to assist me in casting into the same funeral pile, Leo the Tenth and the pontifical chair." At the same time he caused a brazier to be brought, and burned the bull of the pope. 1513-1522

Thus, this step of the holy father only resulted in showing to the nations what an immense progress the reform had made, since a mere monk could publicly annihilate the bulls of a pope, an act of unheard-of audacity, and which no emperor had even dared to do.

Leo the Tenth did not, however, regard himself as conquered. Charles the Fifth was about to convene a diet at Worms to condemn Luther, and the legate Jerome Aleander, charged with sustaining the accusation, had promised to take such measures, that their enemy, in any case, condemned or absolved, could not escape them.

Notwithstanding the entreaties of his disciples, who all besought him not to go to Worms, the intrepid reformer persisted in demanding a safe-conduct from the emperor, that he might appear before the assembly; and, as his friends objected to him that the dangers he had incurred at Augsburg should make him dread fresh treason, he replied, "Though I were certain of finding at Worms as many devils as there are tiles on the houses, I have determined to face them." He, however, consented that a hundred gentlemen, armed at all points, should escort him. He entered with them into Worms, mounted on a chariot, and followed by a prodigious concourse of people, whom his reputation had attracted. On the day succeeding his arrival, the diet opened its sittings, and the Roman legate pro ceeded to interrogate Luther. The latter replied to all the questions, avowed himself to be the author of the criminated works, and offered to defend his opinions in a public conference.

At this proposition the cardinal Jerome Aleander expressed surprise; he pretended that the scandal was great enough already; that the debates should be secret, and that the accused should only be allowed to speak before his judges. Luther replied, that he had come without fear into the midst of his enemies, to justify himself in the face of day from the accusations brought against him, and not cowardly to defend his doctrine, in darkness and mystery. In vain did the legate, and Charles the Fifth himself, endeavour to gain him to the cause of the pope, by offering him enormous benefices, a bishopric and a cardinal's hat: it was all useless. They then determined to place him under the ban of the empire, and not daring to arrest him among a population enthusiastic for reform, nor to make an attempt on his life, they gave him twenty-one days in which to leave the German states. Luther, however, did not quit his country; he took refuge in the castle of Wartzburg, near Eisenach, where the elector Frederick concealed him for nine whole months.

The emperor published an edict, in which, after having explained that it was the interest of kings to protect Catholicism, and stifle heresies, he added: "that to satisfy his obligations to God and the pope, with the consent of the electors, princes, and states of the empire, and in execution of the bull of Leo the Tenth, he declared and held Martin Luther as a heretic, and commanded him to be regarded as such by all the subjects placed beneath his rule, ordering them, under the most severe penalties, to seize and imprison him, and to pursue his accomplices, adherents, and favourers; prohibiting, besides, from printing, transcribing, reading, or having any of his books, or the abridgments published in various languages; and proscribing also engravings in which the pope, cardinals, and prelates were represented with ridiculous habits, or in cynical postures; finally, the prince formally prohibited the printing of any book on religious subjects, without having first submitted it to the ordinary, or censor, of the pope."

This edict of Charles the Fifth, had no more influence over the minds of men than the bull of Leo the Tenth, and did not stop for a moment the progress of the reform; nay, more, this new persecution gave rise to thousands of apostles, who associated together for the great work of religious emancipation; and soon the papacy had to combat enemies the more to be dreaded, as they devoted their lives to the cause of the people, and had determined to overthrow the pontifical colossus, though they should be crushed beneath its ruins. The clergy then uttered a cry of alarm from all sides; from the east, west, north, and south, kings, nobles, monks, priests, bishops, cardinals led about the torches of fanaticism, armed themselves with daggers, and prepared to struggle against an enemy who threatened to destroy for ever their execrable power. All accused the pontiff of weakness, pusillanimity, incapacity; all reproached him for his pompous life of worldly pleasures, the chase, spectacles, concerts, banquets, and Saturnalia; all called down the curses of God on the pope, who had left the door of the sanctuary open to the enemy, and who had not defended the theocratic edifice.

In that, Leo the Tenth was not exempt from blame, and the energy which his holiness had displayed in the beginning of his pontificate, was prodigiously modified since the death of his brother and nephew. Having no longer the aggrandisement of his family to occupy him, the pope had passed his time in pleasures; the chase, says Paul Jovius, was especially his favourite exercise; he knew its laws better than those of scripture. He punished with blows, says the historian, those who, by imprudence or want of skill, allowed the beast to escape, and his humour was so ill when the hunt was unsuccessful, that his minions and mistresses dared not even speak to him. But when his blows had struck down the beast, when he had killed a tall stag or vigorous wild boar, his joy resembled delirium, and at these moments he never refused the favours and benefices which were asked of him.

The nights passed in interminable festivities, in which the luxury of lights and of the table service surpassed every thing in the most opulent courts of Europe and Asia. No emperor, king, or pope ever carried his epicurism so far as Leo the Tenth; thus the highest employments awaited the invention of a new ragout. His holiness had four masters of the art occupied in inventing unheard-of dishes; it is to their care that humanity owes sausages stuffed with slices of peacocks, and in return for this useful invention, the faithful had only to pay seven millions a year for the table of the pope.

In the festivals of the Vatican, numerous buffoons were employed to enliven the guests by their gay sallies, to which Leo the Tenth replied, to show the fancy of his mind, and strove with them in cynicism in language, and frivolity in ideas. Young girls and handsome boys clothed in oriental costumes, and expert in the arts of debauchery, had orders to caress the guests, and these festivities were terminated, almost always, by orgies only excelled by those of the Borgias.

Still, amidst these revels, the pontiff did not entirely forget the interests of the throne of the church, and followed the policy of his predecessors; for at the very time that he was selling to Francis the First authority to conquer Naples, he was demanding six thousand ducats from Charles the Fifth, to grant him the right to style himself king of Naples and emperor of Germany, notwithstanding the bulls of the pontiffs, which prohibited the two crowns from being placed on the same head. He also pursued his conquests in Romagna, carried the cities of Modena and Reggio by assault, and thought of seizing on Ferrara, the capital of the states of Alphonso of Este. This last effort failed; a plot which he formed to assassinate the duke, met with no better success; he then had recourse to spiritual thunders, and fulminated a terrible sentence of anathema against Alphonso, placed his states under interdict, and ordered his generals to recruit new troops, to retake the offensive, and crush his enemy.

The war already embraced Upper Italy; on one side, Charles the Fifth, aided by the English and the pope, was laying claim to the duchy of Milan, as a fief of the empire, as well as the county of Burgundy, which he pretended had been fraudulently united to France by Louis the Eleventh; on the other side, Francis the First, aided by the Swiss and Venetians, was demanding the restitution of Spanish Navarre, and threatening to make good his pretensions on Naples. But the French, inferior in numbers to their enemies, suffered several checks, and were constrained to abandon most of the cities they had recently conquered, and retire into Milan.

This news caused such joy to Leo the Tenth, say several chroniclers of the times, that the blood flowed back on his heart and suffocated him. According to another version, the holy father died of poison; historians do not designate the author of the crime, but merely say that Charles the Fifth knew how to turn this event to his advantage. Still the blow was so sudden that they could not administer the viaticum to the holy father. He died on the 1st of December, 1521, aged forty-four years, after having occupied the Holy See eight years, eight months, and twenty days.

ADRIAN THE SIXTH, THE TWO HUNDRED AND TWENTY-SIXTH POPE.

[A. D. 1522:]

Election of Adrian the Sixth—His history before his pontificate—Entrance of his holiness into Rome—He wishes to introduce reforms among the clergy—His opinion of his predecessors and of pontifical infallibility—Diet of Nuremberg—Charles the Fifth compels the pope to grant him various privileges—Hatred of the Roman clergy to the holy father—He is poisoned by the priests—Singular eulogy on the pontiff by a cardinal.

AFTER the death of Leo the Tenth, the pontifical troops left the army of Charles the Fifth, which so weakened the Spaniards, that notwithstanding their reverses, the French would have been able, beyond doubt, to have retaken the offensive and re-established their affairs in Italy, if, at the moment in which they were about to open the campaign, a Roman chancellor, named Morono, had not raised the fanatical population by means of the preaching of an Augustine monk. At his call, the Italians rose in mass, ranged themselves under the banner of Morono, and forced the French to repass the Alps. The cardinals hastened to profit by the circumstances in which they were placed, to form a conclave, without fear of being disturbed, and for their greater security, they gave the command of the troops to Constantine Comming, duke of Macedonia. They conferred the government of Rome on Vincent Caraffa, archbishop of Naples, and the guardianship of the palace on Hannibal Ramigo, bishop of Spoleto. The vacancy in the Holy See appeared, however, to be prolonged, from the intrigues of the different competitors, and the absence of the cardinals de Medicis, Cortona, Ferrier, Cornaro, and Cibo; at last these prelates arrived successively, one after the other, and raised the number of the members of the conclave to thirty-nine. The scrutiny was then opened, and for eight days the balloting was between the cardinals Farnese, de Medicis, Jaconocci, and Wolsey, the minister of the king of England, who spared neither promises nor money to secure his election. On the ninth scrutiny, there arose a new party in favour of the cardinal Adrian, Florent d'Estutzen, bishop of Tortosa, of whom no one had appeared to think. A member of the conclave, devoted to the emperor, seeing that his colleagues was tired of all this strife, proposed to choose as pope the cardinal Adrian, who dwelt in Spain, and showed skilfully the advantages which would accrue to them from the exaltation of the old preceptor of Charles the Fifth. The cardinal of St. Sixtus supported the proposal, and gave him his voice; thirteen prelates, whose votes had been bought in advance, followed his example and drew others after them, so that the election became so unanimous, that it was regarded as miraculous by the uninitiated, who were ignorant with what skill the matter had been brought about.

The election of Adrian was not, however, approved of by the Romans, who wanted an Italian pope; the people even pursued the cardinals when they left the conclave, heaping hisses and insults on them; all the Italian priests declaimed equally against it; the canon Berni, a burlesque writer, made it an occasion for a satire on the cardinals, whom he called traitors, asses, robbers; he sent them to the devil for having chosen a stranger as pope and invoked Mahomet to free Italy from the holy father and the sacred college. Nothing justified this hatred against the new pope, unless it was that he was too virtuous to govern a corrupt and simoniacal clergy, addicted to every vice and impurity.

Adrian was born at Utrecht, in 1459; his father's name was Florent Boyens, and was an honest ship carpenter, according to Valere Andres; other historians maintain that he was a weaver, whilst others give him the trade of a brewer or upholsterer. Be his trade, however, what it may, it is certain, that his poverty not permitting him to educate his son, he solicited and obtained for him a fellowship in the college of the Porcians at Louvain, at which a certain number of poor scholars were admitted. The young Adrian made surprising progress in the sciences, and particularly in philosophy and theology; he showed no taste for the study of eloquence or poetry, not caring, he said, to clothe falsehoods with elegance. His assiduity, talents, and good conduct procured for him an important curacy, unsolicited by him; he afterwards obtained the cap of a doctor, and was successively canon of Louvain, professor of theology, dean of St. Peter, in the same city, and vice chancellor of the university. He then conceived the plan of reforming the morals of the clergy, who were dependents on his deaconry, and preached to them at length, both by word and example. His zeal was powerless to arrest the evil, and was almost fatal to him; a devotee, who was the mistress of a canon, gave him a poisoned draught, and he only owed his life to the promptness with which remedies were administered to him. In 1507, he was appointed preceptor to Charles the Fifth. After the death of Ferdinand he was elevated to the see of Tortosa, and appointed, in conjunction with the cardinal Ximenes, regent of the kingdom of Castile, which procured for him a cardinal's hat; the subsequent retirement of the cardinal Ximenes, left him alone at the helm of state.

In this high post he obtained the reputation of a skilful governor; he repressed the dangerous factions which threatened to overthrow Spain; repulsed different invasions by Francis the First, and recovered several cities which the French had conquered in Navarre; finally, when he abandoned the government to place the exercise of the sovereign authority in the hands of Charles the Fifth, he merited to receive from the people shining testimonials of regret and admiration.

Such was the venerable prelate whom the intrigues of the emperor had elevated to the Holy See, not out of gratitude for the great services he had received from him, but to use him in order to obtain universal dominion, the constant aim of all his efforts.

Notwithstanding the established usage of the church, the new pope was unwilling to change his name on his advent to the pontifical throne, and was consecrated by the name of Adrian the Sixth; he then embarked from Tanagone and came to Genoa, which he found ruined by the pillage it had undergone when Charles the Fifth captured it. The senate gave the holy father as magnificent a reception as their circumstances would admit, with which he evinced his satisfaction. When, however, Francis Sforza, the new duke of Milan, Prosper Colonna, and the marquis of Pescara presented themselves to kiss his feet, and beseech his absolution for having ordered the sack of Genoa, he repulsed them with his hand, and replied to them with severity, "I cannot, I ought not, I will not."

His holiness went from Genoa to Livorno, where several Tuscan prelates awaited him, amongst others Medicis, Ridolfi, Salviati, the cardinal of Cortona, Petrucci, and Piccolomini; the venerable pontiff reprimanded them mildly, because they wore beards and moustachios after the Spanish fashion, enjoining on them to abandon their mundane customs, and not to go to balls and spectacles with swords by their sides and daggers in their girdles, which was only proper, he added, for bullies and soldiers. Finally, after having visited Livorno and Civita Vecchia, the holy father passed up the Tiber with eight galleys, and made his entrance into the Vatican.

On the day of his arrival, the works on the decorations destined for the day of his coronation, were suspended by his orders; he prohibited triumphant arches from being erected in his honour, and even caused one, which was far advanced, and on which more than five hundred ducats of gold had been spent, to be levelled. The virtuous Adrian declared to his cardinals, that he wished the money of the people to be spared, and that God having chosen him to govern the church in the capacity of the faithful, he would never be their oppressor. The ceremonies of the consecration took place in the church of the Lateran, without any pomp or solemnity, and immediately after he convened the members of the sacred college in consistory, to remedy the evils of the church. It was a measure of great urgency, since the pontifical chair was attacked on all sides by formidable enemies. The finances of the Holy See were exhausted; the ecclesiastical states were in frightful anarchy; simony, debauchery, robbery, and murder were part of the morals of the clergy; the patrimony of St. Peter was threatened with an invasion by the dukes of Ferrara and Urbino, and the family of the Malatesta. Italy was on the eve of a general combustion, in consequence of the wars which had been kindled between the emperor and Francis the First; and Germany, as well as Switzerland, had almost entirely separated from the communion of Rome.

In the midst of such disastrous circumstances, Adrian perceived that he must root out the evil, and attack the abuses which had drawn on the Catholic church the anger of the people. He associated with himself in this great work of reform, John Peter Caraffa, and Michael Gaëtan, of Thielna, two prelates, whose learning and talents were honoured by all. They commenced by taking from the Minor Brothers the privilege of preaching the indulgences; they then suppressed the scandalous traffic in the employments and offices of the Roman court; they diminished the taxes of the datary; they abolished coadjutorships and administrations, and installed a commission, appointed to distribute the vacant benefices among ecclesiastics, whose conduct was exemplary, prohibiting them from granting more than one office to the same titular. His holiness set the example of a rigorous observance of this rule, by refusing for his own nephew a considerable post which was offered him, maintaining that men should be given to benefices, and not benefices to men; and that, moreover, his nephew was rich enough with a revenue of seventy crowns of gold.

Notwithstanding the efforts of the pontiff to bring about a useful reform among the clergy, things remained in the same state, the execution of his orders being unceasingly counteracted by the cardinals and principal officers of his court, who sought to persuade him that apostolic times had passed away from the church, that the father of the faithful should exercise his temporal authority over his states in all its plenitude, and renounce spiritual sways; that consequently, he must sustain himself by corruption, the basis of all monarchical government; and, finally, that perseverance in a reform, which must necessarily expose the hideous sores of the ecclesiastical body, would be the annihilation of the church.

Adrian, convinced of the truth of these remonstrances, suspended for a short time the execution of his plans; reflection then exhibiting to him into what an abyss of evils humanity was plunged, in consequence of the disorders of popes and priests; he was seized with a feeling of sublime indignation, and was desirous of abjuring a religion which was so fatal to the nations. He immediately convened the cardinals in consistory, and declared to them, that having discovered his want of power, as chief of the church, to do good to men, he had resolved to go to Germany, to study the doctrines of Luther, and that should he lose the tiara, he would become a convert to the new belief, and labour with the reformer in overthrowing the theocratic edifice, and leading the church back to the worship of the true religion of Christ.

As soon as this determination was noised abroad, a concert of curses rose against Adrian from all sides; the Roman priests, who were almost all of them atheists, simoniacs, usurers, and sodomites, exhibited the most hostility to the holy pontiff, and as they could not prevent him from publishing his bulls, they determined to arrest their effects by assassination. The first effort failed; the murderer, who was a priest of Placenza, named Marius, was arrested at the moment in which he was drawing his dagger from his robe to strike the pope. A second effort, though better arranged than the first, was not more successful; the ceiling of the pontifical chapel, which was to fall on the holy father when he came to celebrate mass, crushed but six or seven Swiss who preceded him. Several cardinals of his suite, who were behind, dared to express their regret that Providence appeared to have taken Adrian under its protection.

To embitter the people against the venerable pontiff, ignoble satires were scattered around, in which poetaster priests sought to turn him into derision, by accusing him of sordid avarice, by reproaching him with limiting his expenses to twelve crowns a day, with drinking beer instead of wine, with remaining only half an hour at table, with eating bad-dock on account of the cheapness of this fish, with having no more taste in the choice of his food, than judgment in the administration of the church; and, finally, with being addicted to magic, and with shutting himself up whole days in the laboratory of the Vatican, seeking for the philosopher's stone.

The statues of Pasquin and Marforio were daily checkered with the verses of buffoon poets, who had lost their Mæcenæ in the person of Leo the Tenth, and who loaded his successor with their epigrams. Their insults became so violent and outrageous, that the pontiff was desirous to put an end to them, by casting the two statues into the Tiber. But the duke of Sessa, the Spanish ambassador, dissuaded him from it. "Do you believe then, holy father," he said, "that these rhyming priests will not croak any more, when these two statues shall be in the Tiber? Be undeceived; the pasquinades which these two stones shall no more transmit to us, will be repeated by living mouths."

The statues remained on their pedestals; Adrian ceased to pay attention to the calumnies of his clergy, and bestowed all his cares on the realization of his plans of reform. As a first step, he relieved the duke of Urbino from the censures inflicted on him by Leo the Tenth, and gave him the investiture of his duchy; he also admitted Alphonso of Este to his communion, and recognised the lawful possession of the states of Ferrara to be in him, as well as the boroughs of St. Felix and Final, on which that prince had seized during the vacancy of the Holy See.

His holiness then sent Francis Cheregato, bishop of Tera, as his legate, to assist at the diet of Nuremberg, convened by Frederick of Austria, for the last day of November, in the year 1522, and which was to be engaged with the question of reform. Adrian sent by his ambassador the following letter, addressed to the members of the assembly:—

"I deplore with you, my brethren, the difficult situation to which the crimes of the clergy and the corruption of the morals of the Roman pontiffs have led us; for some years we have found nothing but abuses, excesses, and abominations in the administration of spiritual things; the contagion has passed from the head to the members, from pontiffs to prelates, from these last, to mere clerks and monks, so that it would be difficult to find a single priest who was exempt from simony, robbery, adultery, and sodomy. I hope, however, by the aid of God, to reform this deplorable condition, and regenerate the Roman court; I solemnly pledge myself to it. But the evil is so great, that I can only walk step by step to the cure."

Unfortunately, the legate did not conform with the wise instructions he had received.—On the very day of his arrival at Nuremberg, he exhibited so much pride, that he was driven from the assembly. Ferdinand of Austria and the other princes who assisted at the diet, troubled themselves no more about the court of Rome; they passed several important decisions on the great question of reform, and decreed, that the only remedy for the abuses, was the convocation of a general council in Germany.

The insolence of a prelate again destroyed the hopes of Adrian, who had counted on his spirit of tolerance bringing back the church of Germany to a good understanding. The Lutherans declaimed against the audacious pretensions of the bishop of Teramo, and their vehement preachings, sustained by facts, which were known to all, drew a large number of the faithful into the new doctrines.—Like an immense fire, the Reformation covered Germany, Sweden, Denmark, and Switzerland; it penetrated into Flanders, and even into the heart of France; monks were every where seen quitting their convents, casting aside the frock and marrying, to become fathers of families; priests were renouncing their works of iniquity, to embrace professions or situations, which no longer rendered them a charge to society; even bishops were abandoning the impurities of celibacy for family pleasures.

The decisions of the diet of Nuremberg, which contained not less than an hundred complaints against the court of Rome, and which re-produced the entire letter of the holy father, which cast the causes of the schism which troubled Europe, on the disorders of the clergy, exasperated the cardinals against his holiness, and induced them to accuse him of wishing to destroy religion, and of labouring in this work of iniquity, in order to subject Rome to the empire, and the throne of St. Peter to that of Cæsar.

These reproaches, which nothing in reality justified, had, however, the appearances of truth; for Adrian, very different from Julius the Second and Leo the Tenth, who used kings for their political designs, was himself, without knowing it, the tool of Charles the Fifth. This prince had induced him to issue a bull, which annexed for ever to the crown of Castile, the government of the order of Calatrava, and of the other orders established in Spain, and rendered the post of grand master hereditary. He had also obliged the pope to declare openly against France, and had caused the cardinal Soderini, suspected of intriguing to introduce the French into Sicily, to be judged guilty of lesé-majesty. Finally, the holy father, still at the instigation of the emperor, had published different decrees, which invested the king of Spain with exorbitant authority.

The cardinals availed themselves of these acts of weakness, to render the pontiff odious to the Romans, and to prepare the people to receive joyfully the news of his death. One morning, it was rumoured through the holy city, that the pope was sick, and three days afterwards, on the 14th of September, 1523, that he had expired. The priests did not even take the pains to dissimulate the causes of this sudden death, and in the night garlands and crowns were suspended to the door of his physician, and these explanatory words were traced in large characters, "To the liberator of his country."

The cardinal Pallavicini has made this singular eulogium on Pope Adrian: "He was a pious, learned, and disinterested man, who was sincerely anxious for the good of religion; he was, however, an ordinary pope, for he knew nothing of the suppleness of the art of reigning, nor how to accomodate himself to the morals of the Roman court. A pontiff like him, he adds, who had forgotten flesh and blood, could but illy govern the church."

x P. 200.

As soon as the obsequies of Adrian were over, the cardinals, to the number of thirty-six, entered the conclave. For six weeks the suffrages were divided between Medicis and Colonna; after a thousand intrigues renewed and broken, Julian de Medicis bought off his competitor, by the title of vice chancellor of the church and the gift of his palace, one of the most magnificent in Rome, as a recompense, and was then proclaimed sovereign pontiff. His holiness took the name of Clement the Seventh, though a pope had already borne this name in the city of Avignon, during the great western schism.

Julian de Medicis, was a posthumous bastard of Julian de Medicis, duke of Florence, assassinated by the orders of Sixtus the Fourth, in the conspiracy of the Pazzi, and of a young girl named Floretta Grini. His uncle, Laurent de Medicis, having escaped the daggers of the assassins, had taken him to his own house with his mother, whom he made his mistress. Destined at first to the profession of arms, the young Medicis had been made a knight of Rhodes; then when his cousin Leo the Tenth was elevated to the chair of St. Peter, he quit- ted the casque and sword to follow the eccle- siastical career, and as his birth, tainted by illegitimacy, was an obstacle to his entering the sacred college, he paid false witnesses, who affirmed, under oath, that Floretta had not yielded to her seducer, until she had ob- tained a promise of marriage from him, which, according to the custom of the Roman church, was enough to legitimatise a bastard.

During the reign of Adrian the Sixth, the cardinal de Medicis had been enabled, by means of intrigues, to seize on the direction of all business, and supplant the cardinal So- derini in the confidence of the pope. As he was absolute master of the Vatican at the time of the death of the pope, we can cast on him, without danger of striking an innocent man, the greatest share in the accomplishment of a crime which opened to him the road to the pontifical throne.

After the ceremonies of his consecration, which were accompanied by a pomp and mag- nificence truly extraordinary, Clement em- ployed himself with the great question of the Reformation, which was upsetting Germany, and threatening to wrest half Europe from the pontifical yoke. His holiness endeavoured to prevent a new diet from being held at Nurem- burg, and at which the electoral princes were to take decisive measures against the court of Rome. He even offered to yield some points to the heretics, provided they would not con- test his right of jurisdiction over the churches, and would not trouble his agents in the col- lection of his revenues. All his efforts were useless, the Germans persisted in their plan of a diet, and as the day for opening its sit- tings approached, he decided to send an en- voy to Nuremburg, to prevent, what he feared the most in the world, the convocation of a general council.

His ambassador, the cardinal Laurent Cam- peggio, was one of the most skilful diploma- tists of his court. The holy father recom- mended to him to affect a great desire to remedy the abuses which had been pointed out in the hundred articles of the petition be- fore sent to the court of Rome, in what con- cerned the Teutonic clergy, and be careful how he discussed a plan for a general refor- mation.

In accordance with his instructions, the wary cardinal appeared before the electors, demanding, in the name of his holiness, that they should proceed with the reform of the lower clergy of Germany, and that they should remedy, as promptly as they could, the grie- vous abuses which existed in the different sees and convents; he did not speak of the churches of France, Italy, or England. As the prince of Saxony was about to observe, that the interests of religion called for a prompt suppression of the disorders of the Roman clergy, the legate imposed silence on him, and declared that the mere enunciation of such a proposition constituted the crime of heresy. This strange restriction of the cardinal opened the eyes of the least clear sighted; they perceived what were the secret intentions of the pope, and, during the sitting, the assembly resolved on its conclusions, which were published on the 18th of April, 1524, in the following decree:—

“We decide that the emperor and pope shall assign a time for holding a council, with the least possible delay; for the necessity of an œcumenical assembly is perceived daily more and more, in order to arrest the disorders which overwhelm Christendom, and to save social order from the abyss into which infamous Catholics, debauched priests, and dangerous innovators, threaten to plunge it.”

It must be admitted, that the fever of reform was such, that it gave rise to good and bad doctrines. By the side of Luther and Melancthon, who were the first to unfold the flag of the emancipation of the people, extravagant men were engaged in ridiculous disputes about dogmas. The sacramentarians denied the real presence of Christ in the eucharist, and for this had separated from the Lutherans; other enthusiasts, Nicholas Stork, Mark Stubner, Thomas Muntzer, and Balthazar Hubmayer, preached the old doctrine of the Donatists, Pelagians, and Catharines; they denied the efficacy of infant baptism, and maintained that this sacrament should be administered to adults, which led them to be called anabaptists; they preached absolute equality, real and natural, as well as community of goods and the emancipation of women.

This last sect increased formidably, especially in Suabia. Fifty thousand peasants, converted by Thomas Muntzer, rose in mass to urge on the triumph of their cause, and committed frightful massacres, until they were themselves exterminated by the Lutherans, the sacramentarians, and the Catholics.

Clement the Seventh, far from showing any affliction at the deplorable situation in which Germany was, and of acceding to the just demand of the electors in regard to the convocation of a council, took measures which increased the disorders, and refused to assemble the bishops. He maintained that it was a crime of lese-divinity to give judges to a pope, and to submit his acts to the examination of men. His opinion was sustained by the cardinals, who dreaded, as much as his holiness, a reform in morals; and the members of the sacred college formed themselves into a permanent consistory, to treat of affairs of urgency. They erased the decisions of the diet of Nuremberg, and decreed that letters should be addressed to the emperor, to put in execution his edicts of Worms against Luther and his adherents; that at the same time the kings of France, England, and Portugal should be summoned to break off all commerce with the free cities of the interior of Germany, if these refused to obey the court of Rome; that the legate of the Holy See, Laurent Campeggio, should induce the Catholic princes to prevent the assembly which was to be held at Spire, or at least, should enjoin on them to protest against its deliberations, in order to maintain the rights of the pope; that in regard to the convocation of a council, his holiness declared, that by virtue of his omnipotence, he regarded this measure pernicious and baneful, and should consequently formally oppose it; finally, that in regard to the redress of grievances presented by the Germans, the decrees of the council of Lateran righted them, and that if they were not sufficient, they should be provided for by a commission specially appointed for this matter.

Whilst Clement was seeking, by a thousand expedients, to avoid holding a synod, the emperor was making a treaty with Henry the Eighth, to crush France beneath the united forces of England, Spain, and Germany; the imminence of the danger compelled the pontiff to suspend his struggles with the Reformation, in order to place reins on the plans of Charles the Fifth, whose ambition was a subject of grave apprehension to him. He sent an ambassador to him charged with a letter, in which he represented to his Catholic majesty, that he should be content with his immense dominions, and leave to Francis the First the duchy of Milan, which of right belonged to him. His exhortations did not produce the effect he expected; all that the legate could obtain was, to be reconducted to the frontiers, with the honours due his rank, without having had the gratification of an audience. His holiness then secretly warned the king of France of what was plotting against him, and urged him to march into Italy at the head of an army, to be beforehand with his enemy, and rout the imperialists before they had effected a junction with the English. Francis followed the advice of the pope, assembled an army in less than six weeks, crossed the Alps, and presented himself before Milan, which yielded without a blow. He then went to besiege Pavia, which was defended by two of the imperialist generals, Lanoy and Pescara. They, finding themselves taken by surprise, and having no hopes of being succoured in time by the emperor, proposed to sign a truce of five years with France, and recognise her by treaty as the lawful possessor of the Milanese. These conditions were, unfortunately, rejected by the king, who yielded in it to the fatal influence of the admiral Bonnivet, one of those courtiers who are the scourges of the people.

Hostilities continued between the French and the imperialists; but as Francis was gaining ground daily, the pope was in hopes of soon securing command as master in Italy, and thought of assuring himself of his protection by a treaty of alliance. He made him promise to succour the Holy See against all its enemies, to protect the house of Medici and the state of Florence. Clement the Seventh reciprocally engaged, as did the two Medici, Alexander and Hippolyte, both bastards, and the only props of his family, not to afford any succour to imperialists during the life of the king, and without its being necessary to confirm this transaction, even after the conquest of the duchy of Milan. His holiness, moreover, promised to give free passage to the armies of Francis to attack the kingdom of Naples.

In execution of this treaty, Francis detached from his army a body of troops, which entered the states of the church, whilst he himself pushed the siege of Pavia with vigour. Unfortunately, the place opposed a longer resistance than he had imagined, which gave time to the constable of Bourbon, a French prince, who commanded the imperialists, to come to the aid of the besieged. Thus the troops of the king were in their turn blocked in between a hostile city and an army superior to them in numbers. In this extremity Francis assembled his council, and asked his captains what they should do, whether to retreat or to give battle. The old generals represented that, in the circumstances in which they were placed, a single defeat might be sufficient to annihilate the power of the French in Italy, and that it was not to be concealed that they had to combat formidable, numerous, well disciplined adversaries, who were led by a captain to whom, notwithstanding his treason to his country, they could not deny great military talents; they consequently advised a retreat.

As soon as the admiral Bonnivet, who was the personal enemy of the constable, heard his rival praised, he rose from his seat, and spoke at length on the disgrace which would attach to the name of Francis, if he fled before his enemy; he recounted the combats in which courage had supplied the place of numbers, and concluded by beseeching the king to give battle. This appeal to the vanity of the king, produced the result the admiral anticipated. His advice prevailed; the two armies joined battle on the 24th of February, 1523, the day of St. Mathias: baneful day! for the French were cut to pieces, and left more than six thousand dead on the field.

The two authors of this disastrous day received the punishment of their fault; Bonnivet was slain, and the king made prisoner. It is said that the constable of Bourbon, on seeing the dead body of the admiral, exclaimed, "Wretch, thou hast caused the ruin of France as well as mine." Francis was immediately conducted to Spain, where he treated for his ransom with Charles the Fifth, by surrendering to him the finest provinces of the kingdom.

This defeat produced the consequences which the old generals had foreseen. As soon as the news was spread through Italy, the cities which still held for the French opened their gates to the conquerors. Clement the Seventh abandoned his ally, and sent the bishop of Capua to congratulate the constable on the day of Pavia, and immediately proposed to the emperor a treaty of peace, in which he imposed, as a condition on Charles the Fifth, the recognition of Francis Sforza as the lawful duke of Milan, offering him in exchange a sum of an hundred thousand crowns, to be levied on the city of Florence. His holiness besides, reserved to himself the right of selling the products of his salt works in the Milanese territory, to the exclusion of all other salt, and according to the tariff of Leo; he still further exacted the restitution of the cities of Reggio and Rubiera, which belonged to the duke of Ferrara, as well as the free disposal of the benefices of the kingdom of Naples.

Charles the Fifth was too much irritated by the last treason of the pope to listen to his proposals; he received the ambassador very badly, and dismissed him, telling him to inform his master that the hour of justice had come, and that he knew how to punish those who had basely gone over to his enemies in the time of trial.

This threat deprived the pope of all hopes of being reconciled with Charles, and determined him to form a league against him, in order to place himself beyond the reach of his vengeance; for this purpose he entered into secret negotiations with various Italian princes, who hated alike Ferdinand and the Spaniards. He first addressed Ferdinand Francis d'Avalos, marquis of Pescara, who was in the service of Spain, and offered him the sovereignty of Naples, if he would consent to turn his arms against Charles the Fifth, which he agreed to do. He then brought into the league Duke Sforza, the republic of Venice, and the regent of France. All was succeeding well, when the marquis of Pescara was seized with panic terror, and revealed the plot to the emperor. Charles the Fifth ordered him still to dissimulate, and to place garrisons in the Milanese cities; when the latter had made all the arrangements necessary for the success of their plans, he invaded the Milanese with an army, pursued Sforza from place to place, and constrained him to shut himself up in the castle of Milan. The treason, however, did not profit the marquis of Pescara; he fell dangerously sick, was obliged to quit his camp, and died at the end of two months.

Although the secret of the league had been discovered, the Venetians persisted none the less in their determination to combat the emperor, and declared that they preferred being buried under the ruins of their city, rather than consent to a cowardly abandonment of their ally, Duke Sforza. If Clement the Seventh had shown the same firmness, it is probable that Charles the Fifth would have been obliged to propose an arrangement which was advantageous to the confederates; but the astute pontiff wished to follow the crooked policy of the Holy See, and was yet the dup of the Spanish monarch. Whilst appearing to approve of the energetic resolution of the ambassadors of France and Venice, he sent the cardinal Salviati to Madrid to treat with the emperor, and as soon as he heard that the principal articles which he proposed to his Catholic majesty had been accepted, he broke off the conferences with the Venetians and French, and was unwilling to hear any thing more said about the league. The pope was not long in repenting his precipitation; for when the duke of Sessa, the delegate of Spain at the court of Rome, presented to him the copy of the treaty to obtain his ratification, he discovered that they had drawn it up in such equivocal terms, that it was easy to understand that they wished to reserve the interpretation of it in different modes, as might suit circumstances. Clement refused to sign the treaty, and expressed his surprise that so little pains had been taken in drawing it up; the delegate appeared to experience the same surprise, and protested that it could only be the effect of chance and ignorance in the copyist, but that his holiness could have another drawn up, and he would take his solemn engagement to obtain the signature of the emperor in less than two months, provided that, during that interval, the court of Rome shunned all intimacy with France and Venice. This delay was necessary to Charles the Fifth, to enable him successfully to conclude a treaty which he wished Francis the First to agree to, and by which his prisoner admitted France to be a tributary of the empire.

Things, however, did not turn out precisely as he wished, and from his own fault; instead of sending back his prisoner without ransom, he stipulated for such an enormous price for his liberty, that he gained the reputation of being avaricious, which disaffected all the princes of Germany towards him. Instead of keeping up his affectionate relations with the English minister, the celebrated Wolsey, cardinal of York, whom he was accustomed to call his father or his cousin, in letters written by his own hand, he was imprudent enough, after the victory of Pavia, to cease his correspondence, and send him letters drawn up by his secretaries; this displeased the cardinal, and determined him to unite himself to France. He also displeased the duke of Bourbon, by refusing him the hand of his sister, which he had formally promised him. The latter left the court of the emperor, returned to the Milanese, gained an ascendancy over the troops he commanded, and thought of seizing on the kingdom of Naples for himself. Finally, his duplicity rendered him suspected by all Europe, and his allies, following his example, broke the treaties they had made, as soon as their interests were jeopardised.

Francis the First had scarcely escaped from his captivity, when he forgot his oaths to Charles the Fifth, not to take up arms against him. He went to Cognac, and reinforced the sacred league, of which the republics of Venice and Florence, Switzerland, and England were a part. The war was rekindled in Italy with new vigour, and the confederated armies of the holy father and Venice opened the campaign, whilst waiting the reinforcements which France and England were to send.

Charles the Fifth, dreading the consequences of a general war, then set to work to break up the league, and, as he dared not declare openly against the pope, he used the hatred which the Colonna bore to Clement the Seventh, to embarrass him seriously. By his orders, the governor of Naples offered to Pompey Colonna, who had been exiled by his holiness, to re-establish him at Rome in his honours and dignities, if he could constrain the pope to quit the sacred league. The cardinal accepted the proposal which was made to him, and marched immediately on Rome, at the head of eight hundred horse, and three thousand foot soldiers. By aid of the intercourse he had kept up with the place, he made himself master of three gates, and all was done so rapidly, that the holy father had scarcely time to retire to the castle of San Angelo. Without stopping, Pompey Colonna caused this fortress to be invested, and urged the siege so vigorously, that Clement, who had with him but few troops, and no provisions, found himself reduced to the last extremity, and demanded to capitulate.

Muncade, in accordance with the instructions he had received from Charles the Fifth, then stepped forward as mediator, and went himself to confer with the holy father. He represented to him, that if he wished to save Rome from pillage, nothing was left for him but to give himself a protector, by abandoning the league, in order to treat with the emperor. Clement consented to sign a truce for four months, and pledged himself to go to Madrid, to confer with Charles on the conditions of a permanent alliance.

The courts of France and England, wished to oppose this last convention. Their ambassadors represented to Clement, that he was exposing his liberty, and even his life, to great dangers, by placing himself in the power of the perfidious Charles the Fifth, and they induced him to renounce his journey, by presenting him with thirty thousand ducats of gold, which he wished to employ in levying new troops, to avenge himself on the Colonna. He excommunicated all the members of that family; declared Pompey Colonna deprived of his dignity of cardinal, caused their possessions to be ravaged by his bands, and even ordered the count de Vandemont, the general-in-chief of his army, to push on up to the very frontiers of Naples, so as to excite the partisans of the old Angevine faction in favour of Francis the First.

Notwithstanding the apparent success of his troops, the pontiff was grievously disquieted by the progress of the imperialists in Upper Italy; he feared especially, lest Charles the Fifth should take a fancy to capture Rome, and assemble a council to depose him. His terrors became the more lively, when he was informed of a circular which the emperor addressed to the members of the sacred college, and which was as follows:—

"In placing himself at the head of a league, the pontiff has troubled the peace which was established between our kingdom and France, which he could not have done but after mature deliberation with his cardinals. You have thus committed a grievous fault my fathers; and for holy prelates, we think you conduct too earthly. How has it happened, that you have had the audacity to prefer threats against us, who are so well disposed towards the Holy See, and who have constantly refused to believe the accusations brought against the ultra montane prelates at the diet of Worms? Did we not also prevent a diet from being held at Spire, because Germany wished to accuse the Roman court, and separate from its communion?

"It is true, his holiness has forgotten all the services we have rendered him; however, as our vengeance will strike you, as well as your pope, we urge you to change his sentiments towards us; otherwise, if he does not yield to your sage remonstrances, we will be constrained to convoke a council to save religion, and to use all the remedies which we shall judge necessary, to arrest the progress of the evil."

This circular did not produce any great sensation in Rome. As the pope, however, was tired of supporting two armies, which he was obliged to pay on the appointed day, and which compelled him to levy onerous taxes, he commenced negotiations with the viceroy of Naples, to obtain a truce of eight months. The latter made it a primary condition, that Clement should pay sixty thousand ducats to the constable of Bourbon, and an equal sum to Frondsberg, the leader of those bands which has committed such horrible cruelties on the Catholics of Lombardy, and who had left every where on their passage marks of their ferocity. This fierce warrior carried at his saddle-bow, a cord of gold and silk, which he should use, he said, to strangle the pope. His soldiers, worthy of marching under his orders, wore as collars, the virile organs which they had cut from the ultra montane priests, and said boldly, that they were going to Rome to eat the pope.

Notwithstanding the imminence of the danger, Clement the Seventh, restrained by his avarice, hesitated to conclude the treaty on conditions so onerous; finally, when overcome by the remonstrances of his cardinals, he decided to publish the truce, it was too late; Frondsberg, it is true, had died of apoplexy, but the duke of Bourbon had taken command of the imperial troops, and as Charles the Fifth left him without money, in order to weaken his army and diminish his influence, he had resolved to lead his troops to Rome, and surrender it to them to be pillaged. Seconded by the Colonna, the constable approached the holy city rapidly, invested it immediately, and mounted to the assault in person. At the moment in which he was stepping on the breach, a shot stretched him cold dead.

This event took place on the 6th of May, 1527. The prince of Orange who was the second in command of the army, concealed the death of the constable, and continued the attack with so much vigour, that in despite of the cannon of the castle of San Angelo, which kept up a terrible fire on the imperialists, the place was carried. Clement, instead of escaping from Rome by the gate of the Vatican, which was still in the power of his people, shut himself up in the castle of San Angelo, with his cardinals, the ambassadors of France and Venice, and some chosen troops.

The holy city was then abandoned to the mercy of the conquerors, and the sack commenced. It is difficult for the imagination to conceive the scenes of barbarity and ferocity which this unfortunate city witnessed for two whole months. The Spanish Catholics and German Lutherans, of whom the army of Charles the Fifth was composed, appeared to endeavour to excel each other in cruelty.—They first pillaged the palaces of the cardinals and ambassadors; they laid waste the churches and monasteries; they fell upon the houses of rich citizens and mere artisans: they then tore the nuns from their retreats, dragged them entirely naked to the public squares, and assuaged their lust upon them. Women and young girls who had sought an asylum in the temples, were violated, even in the sanctuary; young boys even were used for the horrid pleasures of the soldiery of the emperor; men were submitted to the most frightful tortures; they hung them by their feet and lighted braziers beneath their heads, which consumed them slowly; they lacerated them with leaded thongs; they tore from them their eyes, nose, and ears; they fastened them in heated chains, having thousands of sharp points. And all these atrocities committed by Spaniards upon Christians, were intended to force their victims to discover the places in which they had concealed treasures, that only existed in the imagination of the executioners. The terror which these satellites of the Catholic king inspired, was so great, that the inhabitants threw themselves from their windows to avoid falling alive into their hands.

When the imperialists could find nothing more to pillage in the houses, they fell upon the tombs, and like hyenas, tore the dead bodies from their coffins, to seize the jewels which were buried with them, and devastated all the tombs of the churches. It was especially against the tombs of the popes that the German Lutherans were bitter. They pried into them, carried off all the ornaments they contained, and cast the dead bodies on the flag-stones. They also opened the shrines of the saints, even those of the apostles, St. Peter and St. Paul, and used their skulls instead of bowls, without respect for these pious relics.—They transformed the pontifical chapel into a stable, littered their horses with the bulls of the popes, and the books of the church; and, finally, as if they had not committed sufficiently great sacrileges, this soldiery, drunken with wine and lust, used the sacred vases for the vilest purposes, and committed rapes upon young virgins and boys, in the sanctuary, in the holy of holies, on the very altar at which the pontiffs solemnly officiated.

Then, tired of murdering, the Lutherans proceeded to other scenes of profanation; they clothed themselves in the sacerdotal ornaments, travestied themselves into priests, bishops, and cardinals, clothed one of their number with a tiara taken from a dead body, mounted him on an ass and led him through the streets, they also mounted on asses, holding in their hands holy pixes full of wine, and shouting forth bacchanalian songs in honour of their pope. After this they returned to the Vatican, assembled in conclave, and proclaimed Luther sovereign pontiff, amid acclamations so deafening, that they were heard by Clement the Seventh, who from the top of the towers of the castle of San Angelo, was coldly contemplating the disasters he had brought on Rome.

The holy city was not the only theatre on which unfortunate human beings were slaying each other. Pavia was carried by assault by the French under Lautrec, and he, by way of reprisals, and to avenge the Romans, murdered, pillaged, violated, burned, as if the tortures of the one could soothe the sufferings of the others, and as if dishonour to the women of Pavia, could restore their virginity to the young girls violated by the imperialists.

In Germany it was still worse, the reformed, moved by religious fanaticism, pursued the sect of the anabaptists with the utmost rigour, and exercised such frightful cruelties towards them, that the hair rises on the head when we read the recitals that historians have given us. Instead of being intimidated by tortures, these new martyrs surrendered themselves to their executioners; they were seen mounting the funeral piles singing the praises of God; the most delicate females sought the most cruel torments to give proof of their faith; young virgins walked to punishment more gaily than to the nuptial ceremony; the men evinced not the least sign of fear, when contemplating the terrible instruments of torture; they sang psalms whilst the executioners were tearing off their flesh with red hot pincers. Even when their bodies were half consumed by the fire, their members broken, and the skin torn from their skull was hanging about their shoulders, they exhorted the assistants to become converts to their doctrine. Never had any sect shown such extraordinary constancy in persecutions; thus, the admiration which their courage inspired, drew a great number of Catholics and Lutherans into their ranks.

If the excellency of a religion could be proved by the testimony and number of its martyrs, as the Catholic priests maintain, the sect of the anabaptists would doubtless be superior to any other, since it had, in less than a year, more than a hundred and fifty thousand martyrs, which is more than the martyrologists count during the long persecutions of the pagan emperors.

Notwithstanding these bloody executions, the anabaptists still held up; they were, however, persecuted for many years, now by the Catholics, now by the Lutherans, and ended by succumbing. Unfortunately, no work of these sectaries on their principal dogmas remain to us; perchance, because they wrote nothing, being content to preach, combat, and die. Our only notions about them have been transmitted to us by their enemies; amongst other things, they accused them of wishing to establish a community of women and property, an allegation which is the more doubtful, as it comes from their executioners.

Clement the Seventh, still shut up in the castle of San Angelo, fired upon the enemy who dared approach its walls, and Benevenuto Cellini, the celebrated sculptor, who was charged with the management of the batteries, acquitted himself so well, that, thanks to him, a considerable number of Spaniards remained on the field. It is even believed that he killed the duke of Bourbon, and that it was a cannon pointed by him that wounded the prince of Orange, and cut in two a Spanish colonel, of whom the pontiff was very fond. Benevenuto Cellini, in a relation which he has left us of that siege, says, that the holy father, charmed by his address, called him to compliment him, but that being ignorant of what his holiness could have to say to him, he fell on his knees before Clement, to beseech him to absolve him from the homicides he had been compelled to commit in his service. "At this demand," adds the celebrated sculptor, "the good pope Clement raised his hands, and having traced a great cross on my figure, not only blessed me for the murders I had committed, but even promised me plenary indulgences, if I should continue to do as well and slay the imperialists."

The skill of the sculptor Cellini, as a marksman, sufficed to keep off the assailants from the castle of San Angelo, without, however, arresting the massacres in the city. The plague at last put an end to the butcheries, by killing at least a third of the victors.

Charles the Fifth received the news of the sack of Rome by his army, says Mazerai, on the same day on which the empress gave birth to a son, who was afterwards Philip the Second; he feigned to suffer great grief at the bad position of the pope; he pushed his hypocrisy so far, as to prohibit an illumination in celebration of the happy deliverance of his wife; he put on mourning, and ordered public processions to be made, to ask from God the liberty of the pope, whilst he was sending, at the same time, orders to conduct him as a prisoner into Spain, as soon as he had capitulated. The nuncio, who was not the dupe of these demonstrations, presented himself in mourning, and followed by ten archbishops, to beseech the emperor to withdraw his troops from Rome, and to set Clement the Seventh at liberty. The hypocritical Charles replied, that he desired more than they did to see tranquillity restored to Rome, but could come to no decision without consulting his generals. The duke of Alba, as had been arranged between them, then spoke:—"No, my lord, you must not pardon the pope; it is time for this priest to learn not to meddle with the temporal affairs of Europe, and the longer he shall fast in his castle of San Angelo, the wiser will he become; he should be reduced to such a condition, that he will no longer be desirous of troubling the peace of the world." His holiness was in fact compelled to fast from want of provisions, and to increase the evil, the pest broke out in the fortress.

Clement the Seventh discovered that he had to choose between dying miserably or capitulating; he preferred to treat with his enemies, and demanded a conference with Lanoy, the viceroy of Naples, who was a Catholic. This satisfaction even was refused him; the army, having no confidence in the viceroy, refused to accept any treaty which was not made by the prince of Orange, and the holy father was constrained to receive the law from a heretic. The capitulation contained, among other articles, "That his holiness should pay the army four hundred thousand ducats, to wit, one hundred thousand down, fifty thousand in two days, and the remainder at the end of two months; that for the payment of this ransom, Clement should levy an extraordinary impost on all the ecclesiastical states; that he should, moreover, place in the hands of the emperor, the castle of San Angelo, Civita Vecchia, Citadi Castellana, Parma, Placenza, and Modena; that he should remain a prisoner in one of the towers of the castle, with thirteen cardinals of his suite, until he had paid the first hundred and fifty thousand ducats; that he should then be conducted to Naples, or the city of Gaëta, and there wait the orders of Charles the Fifth; and that, finally, he should absolve the Colonna from all censures pronounced against them, and should appoint a legate to govern the church in his absence, in connection with the tribunal of the Rota." These articles having been signed and approved of by Clement, a Spanish captain, named Alarçon, the same to whom the custody of Francis the First had been confided, entered the castle of San Angelo with six companies of Spaniards and Germans, to fill the part of jailer to the pope and his cardinals.

He remained more than six months kept out of sight, and submitted to ignominious treatment; at last, as he could see no end to his captivity, he determined to become reconciled with the Colonna, and by their aid he managed to escape from his prison, disguised as a hawker. From the city of Orvieto, to which he had retired, Clement wrote to the marshal Lautrec, that he was unwilling to execute a treaty, whose terms had been imposed on him with a dagger at his throat, and besought him to undertake his defence. But the emperor had already renounced his plan of keeping the pope in prison; master of his strong places and his treasures, the holy father was no longer a formidable adversary to him, and he had even sent an order for his enlargement, when Clement escaped from Rome. This return of Charles the Fifth to pacific sentiments, had an object, for the Spanish monarch was not a man to pardon the knaveries of others, without sufficient reasons.

The following was his: Henry the Eighth of England, tired of Catharine of Arragon, the aunt of Charles the Fifth, had determined to break off a marriage which had become odious to him, because his wife was barren and especially because this union prevented his possession of a young girl, named Anne Boleyn, who had inspired him with a violent passion. This plan of a divorce had a natural antagonist in the emperor, who counted on governing the kingdom of England in the name of his aunt, if Henry died without children. The Spanish monarch then sought a reconciliation with the pope, to induce him to enter into his views; for this purpose, he removed his troops from Rome, and permitted Clement to instal himself in the Vatican and resume the exercise of his authority.

His holiness had returned to his palace but a few days, when he received two English ambassadors, Cassalis and Knight, who came in the name of Henry the Eighth, to beseech him to annul his union with Catharine of Arragon; on the next day, arrived, in their turn, deputies from the emperor, who informed the pope, that if he should dare to authorise the divorce of the king of Great Britain, that the imperial armies would immediately invade the territories of the church.

Clement the Seventh, placed between two rivals whom he dreaded, and not daring to accede to the request of Henry the Eighth, nor obey Charles the Fifth, resolved to temporise, and replied to the English ambassadors, that he would give the prince authority to be divorced, if the clergy of Great Britain should first declare his first marriage null. They replied, that their master had no need of such a declaration, and that if the holy father had no other reply to give, they were instructed to inform him that the king of England would break off all intercourse with the court of Rome. The pope replied, that the matter rested entirely with the English sovereign, since he might proceed by the authority of the legate, his prime minister Wolsey, and have a sentence of divorce granted. "There is no theologian who can resolve better than the king, your master," added he, "whether his marriage is unlawful. As soon as the sentence shall have been pronounced, we will authorise our dear son Henry to re-marry; at the same time, if he will address our see to ratify the proceedings, we will not be wanting in reasons to justify his conduct. Then such one of our cardinals as the king shall designate, shall go to London and ratify all that shall have been done."

As soon as Henry was apprised of the reply of the pontiff, he divined the secret motives which actuated him, and in order to force him to declare between him and Charles the Fifth, he threatened him anew to separate himself from the Roman church, if he still persisted in refusing him the bull of divorce. Clement, pushed to the wall, and seeing besides that the affairs of the league were taking a bad turn, decided on a rupture with the king of England. "Well," said he, to the ambassadors, who urged him to give a categorical reply, "since I am between the anvil and the hammer, I declare that I have done for Henry the Eighth more than I ought to do, in permitting him to have as judges in his cause, two legates who were devoted to him, and that I will never consent openly to sacrifice the emperor, the archduke his father, Catharine of Arragon, and the interests of the Holy See."

This reply enlightened the English deputies, and showed them that they would obtain no new concessions from Clement the Seventh, and that the king must be content with having his divorce pronounced by the legates. They, however, made a last effort, in conjunction with the ambassadors of Venice, France, and Florence; all represented to the pope, that it was both for his interest and dignity to unite frankly with them, and to launch the thunders of the church against Charles the Fifth. His holiness, who had obtained from the Spanish agents the promise that the republic of Florence should be placed beneath the yoke of his family, declined following the advice of the ambassadors of the league; he excused himself on a resolution taken by the sacred college, to renounce all temporal matters, that they might solely engage with the reformation of the church, and the extinction of the numerous heresies which had arisen in Germany and France. Clement gave the Florentines in particular, a formal assurance, that he wished to interfere in no way in their government; that he only desired the republic to recognise him as pope, and not as temporal prince, and that he asked as a favour, that they should leave the armorial bearings of his ancestors on the monuments they had reared.

Notwithstanding these positive assurances of the pope, of his desisting from all authority over Florence, on the very same evening, Antonio de Leva arrived at Rome, with full powers from the emperor, and signed a treaty with him, of which the following are the principal articles:

"His holiness shall go immediately with his court to Bologna, there solemnly to crown Charles the Fifth. After the ceremony of his coronation, his imperial majesty shall send a powerful army before Florence, and shall force the most serene republic to recognise Alexander de Medicis, the bastard of Clement the Seventh, as its sovereign. Alexander de Medicis shall engage to marry Marguerite, a natural daughter of the emperor, as soon as she shall have reached a marriageable age. The cities of Cervia, Ravenna, Modena, Reggio, and Rubiera, shall be restored to the Holy See. The duke of Ferrara shall be abandoned to the clemency of the pope, as well as the duke of Milan. On his part, his holiness shall furnish eight thousand men, to besiege Florence in conjunction with the imperialists; he shall grant to the emperor and his descendents for ever, the right of nomination and presentation to eight archbishoprics of the kingdom of Naples, to wit, Vernides, Luciano, Matera, Otranto, Reggio, Salerno, Frani, and Tarentum, as well as to sixteen bishoprics. He shall confer the investiture of the kingdom of Naples, exacting, for his right of sovereignty each year, the transmission of a white hackney, richly caparisoned, and carrying a pulse of six thousand ducats; and, finally, he shall grant to the imperial armies, the right of way over the territories of the church, and shall give absolution to all who participated, directly or indirectly, in the sack of Rome."

After the ratification of this treaty, the pontiff prepared for his departure, and published a decree, which enjoined on the cardinals to assemble at Rome, and no where else, to choose a successor to him, should he die during the journey. He then left the holy city, accompanied by sixteen cardinals, thirty-six bishops, and the officers of his court, and preceded by the holy sacrament, which he caused to be borne at the head of the cortege, by a prelate clad in his sacerdotal garments. The emperor entered Bologna some days afterwards, and immediately went to the church of St. Peter, where the pope awaited him. As soon as he entered the church the hypocritical monarch knelt before his holiness, and from a mixture of baseness and superstition, wished to kiss the feet of him whom he had retained a prisoner against the laws of nations; the two despots then exchanged presents. Charles the Fifth presented the holy father with rich caskets of silver, filled with gold medals, weighing twelve pounds, and in exchange he received an eagle of massive gold, of enormous weight, and covered with precious stones.

In this first interview the prince spoke of the necessity of assembling a general council in Germany to arrest the progress of the heresy, by regulating the connection of the churches of that country with the Holy See, and to reform the morals of the clergy.

"Never," replied the pope, "will we convene a synod in a place where its deliberations can be independent; and we are surprised that a prince, who is so wary and great a politician, solicits an assemblage whose decisions may at once break his throne, and overthrow the papacy. We call you emperor, and ourselves pope, by divine right; we should not then submit the examination of our privileges to men, for they may ask us to verify our titles, and in truth, neither you nor I can do it."

"Be assured that the electors and people of Germany have only embraced the heresy, to seize on the ecclesiastical property placed under your sway, and then to free themselves from your dominion. It is not the excellency of the new religion which attracts them to the party of the reformation, it is an ardent thirst for liberty. Do not then hope to arrest the disorders, by permitting the Lutherans to discuss the new doctrines in a council."

"What matter these dogmas to us after all? What we want is passive obedience; what we ought to desire is, that the people should be for ever submissive to the yoke of priests and kings; and to reach this end, to prevent revolts, to arrest these flashes of liberty which overthrow our thrones, we must use brute force, make executioners of your soldiers; we must light the funeral pyres; we must kill, burn; we must exterminate the learned; we must annihilate the press. Be assured then, that your subjects will return to orthodoxy, and will adore your imperial majesty on their knees."

The justness of these representations of Clement appeared to strike the emperor, and the question of the council was abandoned. They agreed only to assemble at Augsburg a general diet of the empire, in order to make a last effort to reunite the Catholics and Lutherans. The pontiff then proceeded to the coronation of Charles the Fifth, and immediately afterwards the two allies marched on Florence, to reduce the republic beneath the tyranny of the bastard of Medicis.

The Florentines, not knowing to what power to have recourse, to save their liberty, conceived the singular idea of appointing Jesus Christ gonfalonier of justice, and of placing themselves beneath his protection. They even agitated the question whether they should declare him king, and on the proposal of Nicholas Cappoti, they opened a ballot for his election. The citizens, however, had such a repugnance to the name of king, that of a thousand votes, more than nine hundred were in the negative. Whether Christ wished to punish the Florentines for their irreverence, or whether, rather, it was impossible for a population, suddenly attacked, and destitute of munitions, to defend themselves against two formidable armies, the city was compelled to surrender.

In the capitulation, the holy father pledged himself to treat his fellow citizens with tenderness and affection; he solemnly promised to pardon all offences which the Florentines might have committed against him or his. But as soon as he was master of Florence, and supported by his victorious troops, the infamous pontiff was not content with changing the republican government; in contempt of the treaty he had signed, he caused those who were denounced to him as hostile to his ambitious projects, to be arrested, and put them to death. The venerable Father Benedict, of Foiano, a Dominican, who had constantly exposed himself on the ramparts, to excite the enthusiasm of the besieged, was one of the first victims of his cruelty, and was put to frightful tortures, in expiation of his admirable devotion.

When Clement had exhausted his vengeance, he proceeded to the coronation of Alexander de Medicis, and made grand duke of Florence, a bastard whom he had by his amours with a servant girl at an inn, whose favours he shared with a muleteer, and who thus became the origin of the powerful family of the dukes of Tuscany; a new example, which confirms this already established truth, that there exists scarcely any family of kings, dukes, or nobles, which does not owe its estates, or its titles, to infamy and prostitution. Charles the Fifth, after having aided the pontiff to reduce Florence, left Italy to go to the diet which was to be held at Augsburg on the 8th of April of the same year, 1530.

This assembly presented to the monarch an extremely remarkable profession of faith, which had been drawn up by Melancthon, under the inspiration of Luther, and which became the creed of protestanism. It contained twenty-one articles on the divinity, original sin, the incarnation, justification, an evangelical ministry, the church, the administration of the sacraments, baptism, the eucharist, confession, penance, the use of sacraments, the ecclesiastical hierarchy, rites, &c.; and seven articles on the abuses of the Roman church in the communion, the marriage of priests, mass, auricular confession, the distinction of food, religious vows, and ecclesiastical jurisdiction; the protestants concluded by demanding the convocation of a general council to put an end to the differences which divided Christendom. The cardinal legate Campeggio, who assisted at the diet in the name of the pope, made useless efforts to bring back the Lutherans to orthodoxy, and as it was impossible for him to refuse the wishes of the assembly, he declared that the pope was in favour of the convocation of a general council, on condition, however, that the period should be left for him to fix, and that the emperor should enter into a solemn engagement to defend the pontifical authority against his enemies.

His holiness, whilst appearing to yield, had reserved to himself a mode of putting off, indefinitely, a meeting that he dreaded, and in the interval he proposed to act with so much rigour, that he hoped no one would dare to claim the execution of his promise. He first published a decree ordering the grand inquisitor of the faith at Ferrara and Modena, to pursue to the utmost the partizans of the reformed ideas which the Germans had spread in Italy during the late wars. He then wrote to the emperor, to show him the dangers to which they would not fail to be exposed by public discussions on dogmas, which were the key of the arch of the theocratic edifice, and which prevented men from entering upon an examination of the causes which submitted them to the authority of the popes, as well as that of kings. He produced, on this subject, such powerful reasons, that Charles the Fifth determined to finish the protestants, and published an edict, by virtue of which his imperial majesty ordered all his officers to re-establish the Catholic worship and ritual in all the provinces of Germany, and enjoined on all his subjects to believe in the real presence, and the virtues of the celebration of mass, under penalty of being pursued as heretics. He moreover ordered them to baptize children, to confirm, to administer extreme unction to the dying, to light candles in the churches in honour of saints, to restore to convents and churches the property which had been taken from them, whether it had come from donations or pious legacies, without inquiring into the wrong families might thereby suffer. Finally, his majesty terminated his decree by a threat of exile and confiscation against all priests who had married, and who did not immediately separate from their wives.

But, instead of intimidating and weakening the reform party, this tyrannical edict exasperated the Lutherans; their danger caused them to perceive the necessity of union, and an assembly was soon after held at Smalkald, in Franconia, of the protestant princes and electors, at which it was decided that they should mutually aid each other in resisting the attacks of the emperor.

This result, which Charles the Fifth did not foresee, caused him to regret having followed the councils of the pope, and became the subject of reproaches, which caused a bad feeling in their intercourse. A new event soon embittered matters, and paved the way for a rupture between the courts of Rome and Madrid. The grand master of the order of the knights of Malta had presented an Italian, named Thomas Bosio, with the episcopal see, become vacant by the death of the titular, and Clement the Seventh approving of it, had written to the emperor, asking for the decree of investiture for the protege of the grand master. Charles the Fifth replied, through his ambassador, that he was attending to the business, and shortly afterwards he sent his consent to the promotion of Thomas Bosio. But in the interval his holiness, whether he had taken offence at the irreverence of the emperor, or whether he had changed his mind, had nominated the cardinal Ghinucci to the bishopric of Malta. When Bosio came to Rome to receive the ring and the cross, the insignia of his dignity, he learned, with astonishment, of the new choice made by the pope, and immediately informed the grand master of it. As the latter feared to be enveloped in a conflict between Clement and Charles, and had an equal interest in being on good terms with both, he dared not decide the question, and merely informed the emperor of the new choice by the pope. The ambassador of Spain immediately received orders to address a protest to the court of Rome on this subject, and to cause the nomination of the cardinal Ghinucci to be revoked. His holiness refused to obey, and replied insolently to the ambassador: "Your master should know that the appointment of bishop of Malta belongs to us, since the island has passed under another government than his own. Besides, this lesson should teach him, that in like circumstances, our requests are orders."

Francis the First, being informed of this incident, wrote immediately to his delegates, to use all the tricks of policy to induce a rupture between the two allies, and to raise all obstacles, he demanded the hand of Catherine de Medicis, the niece of Clement, for his son Henry, duke of Orleans. This alliance, to which his holiness would never have dared pretend, and which surpassed all the reveries of his ambition, decided him at once to quit the party of the emperor to embrace the interests of the crown of France.

Charles the Fifth no longer preserved any restraint in his conduct towards the pope, and as much to expose the treasons of the Holy See, as to repair the fault which his imprudent decree against the Lutherans had committed, he signed a treaty of peace with the confederate German princes, which was called the treaty of Nuremburg, by which his majesty recognised in the protestants the right of professing their doctrines with entire freedom, until the decision of a general council, which placed the pope in the alternative either of renouncing the government of the church in Germany, or of submitting his authority to the examination of a general council. Clement the Seventh wished to use his influence over Charles the Fifth, to break the peace of Nuremburg, and solicited an interview with him. The emperor yielded to his request and went to Bologna, the city designated for the conference. This step of the holy father had no favourable result, and all his eloquence only strengthened Charles in his determination to assemble a general council. "Still," replied the monarch, to each of the pontiff's objections, "I prefer seeing the chair of St. Peter sunk in the abyss, rather than the throne of my ancestors."

Another event equally baneful for the pope, took place in England. King Henry the Eighth, tired of waiting for his bull of divorce, had determined to drive the Roman legates from his kingdom, and even dismiss his prime minister Wolsey, to break with the court of Rome. The more so, as he had secretly married Anne Boleyn, and had had a law passed by both houses of parliament, to take away from the pontiffs, the rights of annates, pallium, and the investitures of bishoprics which they claimed in the kingdom. Clement fulminated a terrible brief against this prince; he summoned him to retake Catharine of Arragon and separate from his concubine Anne Boleyn, under penalty of anathema, interdict, and deposition. The war thus commenced between the courts of Rome and England, the reply was not long waited for; Henry, whose character was extremely violent, tore up the pontifical bull in full parliament, and made a decree, by which he prohibited all his subjects, under penalty of death, from recognising by speech, in writing, or by actions, the authority of Rome, and declared the English church independent. The parliament approved of this decree, and ordered that the collectors of Peter's pence should be driven from the kingdom, and that in future the metropolitan of Canterbury should confer the bishoprics of England, and that the clergy should pay to the king a hundred and fifty thousand pounds sterling for the defence of the state.

Whilst these events were transpiring in England, the sovereign pontiff was conducting his niece, Catherine de Medicis into France, who, though scarcely fourteen years old, had been already initiated into the most infamous debauches. Francis the First, accompanied by his son Henry and all his court, came to receive his holiness, and the marriage was celebrated there immediately. They relate, that after the nuptial ceremonies, Clement the Seventh gave the young couple his benediction, and said to them, "Go and multiply." Alas the womb of Catherine was but too fruitful!

Brantome, the historian of gallant anecdotes, relates a very piquant adventure which took place during the sojourn of the pope at Marseilles, and which we relate as illustrative of the license which prevailed in the courts of that period:—"The ladies of Chateaubriant, Châtillon, and the bailiwick of Caen," says the historian, "presented a request to the duke of Albania, a grand dignitary of the apostolic court, to obtain permission not to be deprived of flesh during Lent. This lord feigned that he did not entirely understand their request, and introduced them to his holiness, saying, 'Most holy father, I present to you three young ladies, who desire to have the privilege of keeping company with men during Lent; they beseech you to grant their request.' Clement immediately raised them, kissed their handsome cheeks, and said to them, laughing, 'What you ask from me is not most edifying; I, however, authorise you to do so three times a week; it is enough for the sin of luxury.' The ladies blushing, cried out, and represented to his holiness, that what they had solicited was a dispensation to allow them to eat flesh during Lent. At which the pope laughed heartily, kissed them again and dismissed them."

Before quitting France, the holy father exacted from the king the promulgation of ordinances, which reconstituted the tribunals of the inquisition, and which were especially to strike the reformed. The two allies concerted between them different measures, which were intended to destroy the power of Charles the Fifth. Finally, after having received magnificent presents, and a sum sufficient to defray his expenses, Clement the Seventh returned to Italy. On reaching Rome, the pope was attacked with violent pains in his stomach. He languished several months, and died on the 25th of September, 1534, at the age of fifty-six. Some authors accuse the cardinals of having poisoned the pontiff, because they feared the consequences of his cruel character and profound dissimulation; but there is nothing to justify this assertion; except precedent which is not proof.

THE funeral ceremonies of Clement the Seventh were not yet over, when already had Alexander Farnese, cardinal of Tusculum, bought up almost all the voices of the sacred college; but the cardinal Trivulzio, the cardinal of Lorraine, and some of their partizans, who intended to sell themselves to Charles the Fifth for more than they thought Alexander Farnese could pay, caballed and endeavoured to defeat his election. They spread reports against Farnese and his son Peter Louis, they accused them of being more infamous in their morals than the Borgias, of being addicted to the most shameful debauchery, of practising magic, of publicly professing astrology and necromancy, and of boasting in their disbelief in God and the saints.

The adversaries of the Farnese also reproached him with his gluttony, which was so great, that in his orgies, when his stomach was filled with food and wine, he brought on vomitings, and thus supped three times.—They accused him of having made his daughter Constance, his mistress; of having committed another incest with his sister Wilhelmina, her whom he had prostituted to Pope Alexander the Sixth, to save himself from the gibbet. They also added, that allying cruelty to infamy, he had killed five Roman gentlemen, who shared with him the favours of his daughter and sister. Finally, the cardinals concluded in these terms, "Now if being informed of the crimes charged on the cardinal Farnese, those of our colleagues who permitted themselves to be seduced by this abominable man, persist in giving him their voices, we do not fear to say, that they deserve to be spit upon by all Christendom."

Notwithstanding the violence of these attacks, the agents of the Farnese succeeded; they represented to the malecontents, that their candidate was sixty-six years old, that he was in bad health, and that they could not deny to him a political skill, which would contribute powerfully to re-strengthen the pontifical throne; finally, they offered to Trivulzio and the cardinal of Lorraine, four palaces in Rome, richly furnished, garnished with vessels of gold, and containing fifty thousand ducats.—From that time all opposition ceased, and on the first scrutiny thirty-four cardinals chose, as vicar of Christ, him whom they had pointed out to the hatred of the people as a sodomite, a committer of incest, an assassin, and an atheist!

Alexander Farnese was born in Tuscany, in the city of Carino, of Peter Louis Farnese and Janelle Gætan. In his youth he had been entrusted to the care of Pomponius Loetus, one of the most learned men in Italy, who initiated him into a knowledge of the ancient authors; Albert Pigglius taught him mathematics, and gave him even notions of astronomy, judicial astrology, and black magic. Farnese excelled in making Latin verses; his letters to Erasmus and his epistles to Cardinal Sadolet, are remarkable for vigour of style and profoundness of thought. Become pope, he proved himself so perfidious, that Mendoza said, in several letters, addressed to Charles the Fifth, that he would rather confide in a greyhound, than in the word of Paul the Third. "He was always shod backwards," adds the Spaniard, "so that one might imagine he was going on, whilst he was turning back. He covered himself with the mantle of piety, when he had a crime to commit, and employed Corsican bullies to rid himself of those who opposed his plans. He regulated all his movements by the conjunctions of the planets, which he consulted in even the most insignificant actions; and when events did not agree with his predictions, he fell into violent bursts of passion, and uttered horrid blasphemies.—He even pushed his impiety so far as to affirm, that Christ was none other than the sun, adored by the Mithriatic sect, and the same God as Jupiter Ammon, represented in paganism under the form of a ram or a lamb. He explained the allegories of his incarnation and resurrection by the parallel which St. Justin had made between Christ and Mithra; that the Bible, like the sacred books of the magi, was produced in the winter solstice, that is, at the moment in which the sun commences to return towards us and increase the duration of our days. He said, that the adoration of the magi was but an imitation of the ceremonies in which the priests of Zoroaster offered to their god, gold, incense, and myrrh, three things consecrated to the God of Light; he objected that the constellation of the Virgin or rather of Isis, which corresponds with this solstice, and which presided over the birth of Mithra, had been also chosen as an allegory of the birth of Christ; which, according to the pope, was sufficient to demonstrate that Mithra and Jesus were the same God. He dared to say, that there was no document of irrevocable authenticity, which proved the existence of Christ as a man, and his own conviction was, that he had never existed. Finally, that even the tiara, he maintained was an imitation of the head dress of the Persian sacrificers. Thus, this abominable pope, who was, however, clothed with a character of infallibility, proclaimed himself a priest of the sun, and glorified sabeism."

We will not accompany this passage of the correspondence of Mendoza with any commentary; we will leave the mind free to follow the opinion of the Spanish ambassador, and condemn Paul, or to adopt the belief of the pope, and abjure the Christian religion!

The new pontiff, in his political system, appeared entirely opposed to the course of his predecessor; instead of recoiling before the convocation of a council, he affected to be more anxious for this measure than even the protestants themselves; and the better to deceive Europe, he assembled the sacred college in consistory, in the presence of the ambassadors of the different courts. He represented that, in the state of disorder in which Christendom was, the holding of an œcumenical council could no longer be deferred, and he fixed the 16th of October, in the year 1534, as the time of its opening; he even appointed a committee of cardinals to regulate the preparations for this important meeting, and to arrange in advance the different questions which were to be agitated. Finally, he addressed severe remonstrances to the prelates and officers of his court, to induce them to reform their morals, and abstain from the debaucheries which scandalised the faithful. They were not long in discovering that the holy father wished to trifle with the Lutherans; when the period which had been fixed for the opening of the council approached, he found pretexts to put it off to the following year; he pretended that it was necessary above all other things to reconcile the Christian princes who were at war, or at least obtain from them a suspension during the sitting of the synod. In fact, he sent nuncios to treat with the courts of France, Spain, and England, and to inform them that he had chosen the city of Mantua for the place of the conferences.

In the absence of his legates, Paul gave no more thought to reform, than if the church had been in its days of peace and prosperity. He was occupied in establishing his bastards, and pushed nepotism farther than Sixtus the Fourth, Alexander the Sixth, and Leo the Tenth had done. He gave a cardinal's hat to Guy Ascanius Sforza, of Santa Fiore, a youth of sixteen years, born from the amours of his holiness with his daughter Constance; he granted the same favour to Alexander Farnese, who had scarcely attained his fourteenth year, but who was the child of Peter Louis, at once the bastard and the minion of the pope; and as several of his officers exclaimed that these new cardinals, from their youth, could not understand the duties of their dignity, the pope replied with a cynical allusion, "that his experience was great, and that he would take care to initiate them into all of which they were ignorant."

A few days afterwards Paul created seven other cardinals; this time his holiness chose persons of real merit. "It is not for them, but for myself, that I appoint them," he said to his daughter Constance, who was complaining on seeing old long beards preferred to her pages and favourites; "I wish to annihilate the reformed religion by force or negotiations, and for that purpose I need the assistance of skilful men." Paul had discovered the danger which threatened the throne of St. Peter, and had determined to employ all his efforts to avert it. It was a difficult undertaking; for since the peace of Nuremberg, Denmark, Sweden, Norway, Germany, and Switzerland had declared for reform, and driven away the legates of the Holy See. Still more, fifteen electoral princes, and the deputies who had been sent by thirty protestant cities to Smalkald, had informed the apostolic nuncios, that they would accept none but a free council, held in their province, composed of all classes of the faithful, and in which their theologians should have deliberative voices, without being submitted to the power of the pope; and, finally, they reserved to themselves the right to judge the Roman pontiff, and to depose him, if he were condemned.

The Lutherans had not only acquired great influence as a religious sect, but even as a political party, and since their resistance to Charles the Fifth, the sovereigns of Europe sought their alliance. Francis the First had made proposals of an alliance with them, through his ambassador William du Bellay de Langey, and told him to say to Melancthon, Pontamus, Sturmius, and other protestant theologians, that he was ready to become a convert to their doctrines, if they would join his. The ambassador affirmed that his majesty did not believe in purgatory; that he recognised no other character in the papacy than that of a human institution; that he had determined to abolish the monastic vows in his kingdom, to cause the priests to marry, and re-establish the communion under the two kinds. The king of England gave them the same assurances, to contribute with all his power to the propagation of the new doctrines, if they would declare openly against Charles the Fifth.

But, as it is the essence of royalty to be always knavish and hypocritical, at the very time at which the two sovereigns of France and England were humbling themselves before the Lutherans of Germany, Francis was publishing decrees of arrest against the reformed of France, and the barbarous Henry, himself a schismatic, was persecuting the Lutherans of his kingdom with such cruelty, that historians maintain that he surpassed the sanguinary Charles the Fifth. His religious furies could not, however, place him beyond the reach of the anger of Paul the Third, who, to punish him for having withdrawn from his obedience, fulminated a terrible bull against him. He released all the English from their oaths of fidelity, enjoined on the ecclesiastics to leave the kingdom, and ordered the nobles to take up arms against the king. He declared Henry deprived of his throne, gave his kingdom to the first occupant, placed an interdict on England, and prohibited other nations from having any intercourse with the English, under the severest penalties. Finally, he annulled all the treaties which sovereign princes had concluded with Henry, either before or after his marriage with Anne Boleyn; he condemned all their children, born or to be born, as infamous and bastards, and permitted the faithful to fall on him and his.

This bull did not embarrass the king of England in the slightest degree; the people treated the menaces of the pope with contempt, and things went on as before.

In Germany, the brilliant offers and seductions of all kinds which had been used to gain Luther to the party of the Roman court, had met with no better success. The papacy had lost its prestige—its time was passed. In Italy, even in the holy city, Paul had to defend himself against the attacks of the commission appointed to examine the abuses which had been introduced into the church. The cardinals Caraffa, Sadolet, Pole, Contarini, and Thomas Badia, the master of the sacred palace, had dared to publish the result of their deliberations, and to cast on the unmeasured extension of the pontifical power, all the evils which afflicted Christendom. They also accused the popes of having erected their wills into laws, and of having substituted the caprices of their imaginations for the ancient traditions of the gospel.

Amongst the abuses which these prelates pointed out, and which they had divided into two categories; the one concerned the religious administration, to the number of twenty-four, the others the civil administration, to the number of four. They held up to the indignation of the faithful, the plurality of benefices, the sales of expectatives, dispensations, and indulgences, the contempt into which the ancient canons had fallen, the ignorance and depravity of the priests of Rome, the licentiousness of the fifty thousand courtizans who inhabited the holy city, the prodigious quantity of monasteries for females, which had been transformed into so many seraglios, for the use of the prelates who directed them, and the infamous habits of the cardinals, who publicly maintained handsome youths in their palaces, by the titles of minions or pages.

Instead of taking into consideration the remonstrances which were addressed to him, the pope brutally ordered the members of the commission to stop their sessions at once, and threatened them with all his wrath, if they dared to offer the least blame. But the blow was struck; the protestants, who had already received copies of the report of the cardinals, and who waited for the decision of Paul, to judge of the sincerity of his first manifestations, were no sooner informed of this new tacking about in his ideas, than they broke out into violent reproaches against him. They proclaimed him the most cowardly and deceitful of men, and drove his legate Vergerius with ignomy from Smalkald. The latter, on his arrival at Rome, was recompensed for the insults he had undergone; he received the investiture of the bishopric of Capo d'Istria, his country, and immediately afterwards he started for Naples, to induce the emperor, who was in that city, to come to Rome, to confer with his holiness on the measures to be taken to bring back Germany beneath his sway.

Charles the Fifth yielded to the solicitations of the ambassador and went to Rome; the interview between the two sovereigns took place in the palace of the Lateran. Paul displayed, but uselessly, all the resources of his eloquence, to induce the prince to use his armies against the heretics. The Spanish monarch, who was on the point of recommencing hostilities with France, refused to place on his arm a religious war, of which it was impossible to foresee the end and the result. His Catholic majesty even profited by his sojourn at Rome, to give more éclat to his declaration of war against Francis the First. It was in the consistory, in the presence of the ambassador Velli and of the cardinal du Bellay, that he defied the king of France to single combat, adding, that he regarded him as a traitor, a perjurer, and a coward, and that from that day he would pursue him to the utmost. Francis declined accepting the duel which was proposed, and which Charles the Fifth did not care to have accepted. Their armies moved on each other, and thousands of men murdered each other for the quarrel of these implacable tyrants.

As soon as the pontiff saw that Italy was about to become the theatre of the war, he no longer hesitated to convene the general council, and issued a bull which fixed the opening of it for the 23d of May in the following year, (1537), and designated the city of Mantua as the place of meeting. His holiness sent a circular to all the prelates of Christendom to come to the assembly; he addressed particular letters to Charles the Fifth, to the king of France, as well as the other sovereign princes, asking them to assist in person at a council, and to contribute to the repose of the church. He even wrote to Henry the Eighth, through Cassalis, his former legate in England, to exhort the monarch to restore union to his kingdom. The pontiff counted the more on the success of this step, since Anne Boleyn, the cause of their dissensions, had been beheaded by Henry the Eighth.

His attempt failed here; the king received the overtures of Cassalis very badly, and published a law, which condemned to the penalty of death those, who should only dare to propose the re-establishment of the authority of the bishops of Rome. His majesty accompanied his decree by a long protest against the bull of the pope, maintaining that the right of convening the universal assemblies of the church belonged to the emperors, or in default of them, to the other Christian princes, and not to the pontiffs; that, moreover, the bishops of Rome having no authority in England, they could not lawfully convoke its bishops to a general council; he declared that he would permit none of his subjects to assist at a council which had been convened at a period when it was impossible for foreign prelates to make the journey, on account of the dangers of war; he therefore protested in advance against all the decrees and decisions of the assembly of Mantua, and persisted in his schism, in order to maintain in his kingdom the purity of the Christian religion.

This opposition of the king of England gave a rough shock to the pontifical authority; what was still more fatal, was the appearance of a work entitled "The Christian Institution," which attacked not only the primacy of the See of Rome, but even the authority of general councils and that of bishops and priests. The author rejected the necessity of baptism, and the communion for the safety of men; he declared the sacrifice of the mass an abominable impiety, and called the worship rendered to saints idolatry. This man, who since his appearance in the strife, had placed himself at the head of a new sect, was John Calvin, a bold innovator, whose calm character contrasted singularly with the fiery impetuosity of Luther.

Calvin was born at Noyen, in Picardy, of very poor parents, who could not give him any education; fortunately he found, in the family of Claude d'Hangest, abbot of St. Elvi, protectors, who furnished him with the means of study. At twenty years of age, he had obtained, thanks to the solicitation of his friends, several benefices, whose revenues he received, in accordance with the customs of the age, without being obliged to discharge the duties and even before he was in orders; this enabled him to continue his studies at the university of Paris.

In this city, the young Calvin heard for the first the preaching of the new doctrines, which were then beginning to spread through France; they struck his imagination forcibly, and determined him to abandon the study of theology for that of law. In 1532 he resigned his benefices and attended the course of Michael Cops, the rector of the university. In the following year the latter was brought before the tribunal of the inquisition, to explain a discourse which he had delivered at a public session in favour of the reformed doctrine. Calvin, who was suspected of connivance in this dereliction, on account of his intimacy with the rector, was also brought to the bar of the tribunal to be judged.

As at that period the good king Francis the First was pitilessly burning all reformers, the two friends were unwilling to await the judgment of the inquisitors, and left the kingdom secretly. Calvin then joined the reformers, and published his famous work "Of The Christian Institution;" in which the doctrines of the French protestants were exposed. He attacked, especially, King Francis; exposed his hypocrisy, and unmasked the Machiavelian policy of that tyrant, who was making thousands of victims mount the funeral pyres, at the very time he was offering to the Germans to embrace their doctrines, as the price of their alliance.

Whilst the Reformation was making great strides under the burning inspiration of Luther and Calvin, and was threatening to crush the papacy, a society of fanatical devotees were sharpening their daggers in the dark, and were preparing to exterminate the protestants. This society, which was to envelope the whole world in its thousand cords, which was to clasp thousands in its iron arms, and which was to cause rivers of blood to flow in all parts of the world, before being itself spit upon, chased and driven from the earth, was the company of Jesus.

Its founder, Ignatius Loyola, the descendent of an old Spanish family, was born in 1491, in the castle of Loyola, in the province of Guipuscoa. His early youth was passed at the court of Ferdinand the Fifth, and, according to the custom of the nobility, he learned to drink and fight. As soon as he was old enough to wear armour, he entered the service, and distinguished himself at the siege of Pampeluna by his fierce character. In this campaign he had his right leg broken by the blow of a stone, which compelled him to quit the theatre of his sanguinary exploits, to have the succour administered which his wound required. A young inexperienced surgeon operated so unskilfully, that after his cure, it remained a prominent deformity to him. Ignatius, who was very desirous of preserving all his physical advantages, called in a new doctor, and asked him if there was any way of making the protuberance disappear; the latter replied, that it could only be done by breaking the limb a second time, and by sawing the bone which formed the projection. Ignatius immediately submitted to this painful operation, and after nine months of dreadful suffering, an entire cure was made; the prominence no longer existed, but it was found that one of his legs was shorter than the other. He recommenced a new treatment to elongate his bad limb, and remained for more than seven months bound down in an oaken box, with his foot bound to iron splinters, in order to draw out the sick leg. All his efforts were powerless, and Ignatius Loyola was satisfied he must remain lame for life.

Then, whether his vanity could not accustom itself to the idea of reappearing at court with such an unpleasant infirmity, whether his mind had been forcibly impressed with what he had read, during his sickness, concerning the punishments of the first martyrs of Christianity, it produced an entire change in the conduct of Ignatius; this man, who had endured horrible operations to preserve his good looks, no longer took any care of his body, and one morning he left his castle, and retired into the monastery of Montserrat, where he practised all the austerity of the anchorites of the Thebais. His religious exaltation, and especially his fastings and macerations, soon produced restlessness and hallucinations. The poor insensate imagined that he saw visions; he maintained that the devil had appeared to him in person, and that at the moment when he wished to seize on him, Mary, the divine mother of Christ, arrived and put the evil spirit to flight. In gratitude for the service which the Virgin had rendered him, he resolved to consecrate himself entirely to her service, and to take her for his lady and mistress.

According to the custom used at the reception of knights, he watched his arms before the altar of Mary, and prayed until the next day; on the second day, he suspended his sword to a pillar of the chapel, and then passed all the night in prayers; on the third day, he put off his rich garments, clothed himself in rags, and took a vow to serve his lady during his life. Finally, the madness of Ignatius reached its height; he sold his property, and gave the proceeds to his convent, allowed his beard, nails, and hair to grow, soiled his face with hog's dung, and left the abbey of Montserrat to beg. His exterior, which necessarily inspired disgust and alarm, rather than compassion, caused him frequently to be refused alms, and subjected him to long abstinences. Hard as was this life, Ignatius found it too delicate and effeminate, and he retired to a den, in which he passed seven days and seven nights without taking any nourishment. He was drawn from it by some mendicant monks, whom chance had led that way, and who hearing the groanings of a man who appeared about to die, had drawn him from the cavern in which he had shut himself up, and after having given him some drops of wine, had borne him to the hospital of Manresa.

Ignatius remained eight days without recognising any one, plunged in a profound lethargy; when he returned to life, he affirmed that angels had carried him to heaven, that he had distinctly seen the Trinity, the Virgin, and especially Jesus Christ; that the Saviour had ordered him to found a mysterious society, which should labour in the propagation of his faith. When he was entirely cured, he went to Barcelona to study grammar and to prepare himself to execute his work.

As he sought to make proselytes, the inquisitors conceived suspicions as to the orthodoxy of his principles, and took him prisoner, but they soon discovered his madness, and set him at liberty. Ignatius left Barcelona, and visited in succession Alcala, Salamanca, and Paris. Having arrived in the latter city, he determined to enter the college of St. Barbe to study Latin. The singularity of his life, the exaltation and oddness of his ideas, finally attracted attention to his person; he gained the confidence of some devotees. Peter Favre, his tutor, Francis Xavier, professor of philosophy in the college of Beauvais, became his disciples, as well as four Spaniards, who were Lanez, the presumed author of the rules of the order of the Jesuits, Alphonso Salmeron, an obscene writer, whose works were afterwards interdicted, Alphonso Bobadilla, and Simon Rodriguez.

This new society held its meeting on the day of the Assumption, 1534, in the subterranean chapel of the abbey of Montmartre. Favre, who was a priest, celebrated mass, and his companions communed; they then pledged themselves by a solemn vow, pronounced upon the host, to offer their services to the pope, and to second him in every work he should undertake for the good of religion; after this, they separated to traverse the world and recruit new disciples. They indicated Venice as the place of a second meeting, and towards the close of the year 1536, they found themselves in that city with three new proselytes. From Venice they went to Rome, where they issued an exposition of the principles of their society. Paul the Third, who knew how important it was for the Holy See to have a fanatical soldiery ready to combat those who should be pointed to them, whatever their rank or power, received Ignatius and his companions with distinction, induced them to draw up statutes, to organise themselves into a society, and authorised them to propagate their doctrines every where.

Whilst the disciples of Loyola were elaborating the foundations of that institution, which was one day to make popes and kings tremble, political events were following their course. The duke of Mantua, at the instigation of Francis the First, refused to allow the council to be held in his capital, under the pretext that his holiness had trespassed on his rights by designating his city without his permission; he said also that his finances would not permit him to keep on foot an army large enough to guarantee the quiet of the assembly. This late opposition appeared the stranger to the pope, since the duke of Mantua permitted the bishop of the city to enjoy an absolute authority over his clergy, and the families and concubines of the priests. He discovered that his enemies had gained the duke to their side, and he determined then to designate the city of Vicenza, a dependency of the republic of Venice, as the place where he would hold the council, whose meeting he put off to the 31st of May, 1538. In the interval, he published a bull, which conferred on his bastard, Peter Louis Farnese, the dignity of grand standard bearer of the Roman church, the lordship of Nepi, and the title of duke of Castro.

This last decree excited a general discontent in all the cities of Italy, and showed the least clear sighted, that his holiness aspired to place a royal crown on the brow of this wretch, whose infamous morals recalled Cæsar Borgia so well. Like the son of Alexander the Sixth, he had in his pay purveyors, who seized beautiful children in the streets of Rome, and like him, as soon as he had used them in his horrible debaucheries, he had them cast into the Tiber; only when the rank of the family of his victim compelled him to observe some restraint, he contented himself with violating them, and then sent them back.

A few days after the publication of the bull in favour of his son, the pope went to Nice, in Savoy, where the emperor and king of France came to meet him, in order to consult with him as to the mode of stifling the heresies of the protestants in Germany, and the reformed in France.

For fifteen days, Charles the Fifth and Francis the First, though lodged in adjoining palaces, refused to see each other, and the pope was obliged to serve constantly as an intermediate, and to go from one to another, to arrange the negotiations; finally, thanks to his cares, the two monarchs concluded a truce for ten years. Brantome after having given an account of the conferences which took place at Nice, and of the political questions which were debated, relates some very singular adventures, which show how far the licentiousness of morals in sovereign courts was carried at that period; he says, among others, that one day, Madame d'Uzes, jealous that several noble young women of the suite of Francis the First, had been received by the pontiff at a private audience, and that he had not even deigned to look at her, resolved to attract his attention, and obtain his favours. "One night," adds the historian, "she procured admittance to the chamber of the pope by bribing a domestic, and when Paul the Third entered to go to bed, she cast herself at his feet in a charming dishabille, her chemise permitting her beautiful shoulders and rounded neck to be seen. She humbly demanded pardon of him, that being one of the maids of honour to the queen, on the voyage of the pope to Marseilles, she had covered the pillow of his holiness with a fine napkin she had used in her private toilette, so that contact with this object might inspire him with love. This repentance pleased the pontiff so much, that he at once absolved the beautiful afflicted, and even granted her unlimited indulgences."

The conferences of Nice having terminated, Paul returned at once to Rome, to push on the preparations for the festivals which were to take place on the marriage of Octavius Farnese, the son of his bastard Peter Louis, with the natural daughter of Charles the Fifth, the beautiful Marguerite of Austria, the widow of Alexander de Medicis. His holiness had obtained from the emperor, as the marriage gift to Octavius, the city of Novare and the title of marquis; on his side, he gave the young spouses the duchy of Camerino, which he had bought from Hercules Varano. The pontiff was then engaged in providing for the other members of his family; he married the third son of Peter Louis to Diana, a natural daughter of Henry the Second, king of France, and gave him as an appanage, the duchy of Castro; he made Ranucius, the fourth child of his bastard, a cardinal, though he was then scarcely fifteen years old; and, finally, as he desired above all things, to assure for himself a powerful party in the sacred college, he also gave the hat to Renand Capodi Ferro, or the head of iron, and to Crispus, two of his natural children, who were light horsemen and passed for his minions. He, moreover, divided among these three cardinals the immense revenues of the vice chancellorship, the offices of camerlingo and grand penitentiary.

Whilst Rome was resounding with the noise of festivals and rejoicings, given in honour of the bastards of Paul the Third, the king of England was publishing a manifesto against the convocation of the council of Vicenza, and was burning the relics of Thomas à Becket, assassinated during the reign of Henry the Second, and who had been canonized by the name of St. Thomas of Canterbury. As soon as the news of this profanation against the dead reached Rome, the pontiff lanced a new bull of excommunication against Henry the Eighth. But his wrath was powerless to arrest the effects of the royal decree, and he was constrained to adjourn the council to an indeterminate period. Paul, though humbled, did not regard himself as conquered; Ignatius Loyola came to submit to him the plans of his new congregation, and he counted on using the satellites which this fanatic should recruit for him, to pull down kings. He first appointed a commission under the presidency of the master of the palace, to examine each article of the constitution of Ignatius; then when the cardinals, who made a part of this species of consultative chamber, had terminated their labour, he himself revised it, bestowed great eulogiums on its author, and adhered completely to the foundation of this society. It was difficult, in fact, for any thing to be more agreeable to a pope, than the institution of a soldiery which was to combat for the propagation of the faith, and was to employ all its force in the maintenance of Catholicism.—Paul hastened to convene the initiated at Rome, for the ceremony of their installation.

On that day Ignatius Loyola entered the holy city, accompanied by his disciples Francis Xavier, Simon Rodriguez, Claude le Jay, Pasquier Brouët, Nicholas Bobadilla, le Liebre, Laney, and several others whose names have not come down to us. His holiness caused them to be introduced into a mysterious hall of the Vatican, which had no furniture but a seat and a table, on which were a Bible, a crucifix, a tiara, and some daggers. Then took place a strange scene of which no one has known the details; it is only known that the assistants took frightful oaths, and swore on the crucifix to make the tiara triumph, and blindly to obey the popes in all their orders. On his side, Paul the Third pledged himself in his own name, and the name of his successors, to protect with all his power the new religious order, who took the name of the company of Jesus. In this sitting, it was agreed to appoint a perpetual superior, who should take the title of general, and who should reside at Rome, to be at hand to receive constantly the orders of the holy father. Ignatius was the first who was invested with this important dignity. Thus, was constituted, that redoubtable society of Jesuits, who were one day to rule all mankind, and to cause kings and popes themselves to tremble on their thrones.

In accordance with the regulations of the charter which had been granted to the disciples of Ignatius, it was specified that no one should be admitted into the bosom of the society, without having first taken the vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience. Besides these three vows, the neophytes were to take a solemn oath to the reigning sovereign pontiff, or to those who should succeed him in the capacity of vicar of Jesus Christ, and to pledge themselves to obey him in all things, and to go wherever they should be ordered, whether among Christians or infidels, and to execute, unhesitatingly, all that they were ordered to do.

The members of the society were divided into four classes; the first, and most elevated, was composed of those who had made a profession; it was necessary that they should be educated, and priests; the second class was composed of coadjutors, who had been admitted to second the society, in spiritual and temporal affairs; the scholars formed the third class; in the fourth were admitted those whom the society reserved to carry into the higher classes, for before being received to make profession, or even to pronounce the simple vows of a coadjutor or a scholar, the aspirant was subjected to a novitiate of two whole years; scholars did not reach a superior grade until a year after they had completed their studies, and the novice himself had to submit to a time of proof.

The neophyte was first admitted by way of hospitality, or alms, for twelve or fifteen days, that he might learn the obligations of a novice; if he persisted in his resolution he belonged to the society. The only requisitions for a novice were, that he had not been separated from the Roman church, that he had not renounced the Catholic faith by adhering to any schismatic communion, and that he had not been condemned as a heretic; they also exacted that the postulants should not have worn a religious garb in another order, that they should not have been engaged in the bonds of marriage, nor in those of lawful servitude, nor should not be afflicted with any serious infirmity; moreover, when the aspirant was not in any of these cases of reprobation, he was obliged to reply to a series of questions concerning his birth and connections, as to his private affairs and his inclinations, as to his capacity and his religious conduct, public and private. He was to declare that, in matters of faith, he would conform to the decision of the society; he was to take an oath that he had determined to quit the world to follow Jesus Christ.

When the aspirant had replied to all these questions in an affirmative and satisfactory manner, the examination was continued, and he was taught his obligations towards the society; he was informed that the brethren only admitted among them men entirely freed from the affections of flesh and blood; that it was then necessary to make a personal denial of all his sentiments; that to commence the sacrifice, he must live subjected to several superiors in one of the colleges of the order; that he must rid himself of the property he possessed, and renounce such as might fall to him; that this distribution should be made to the society rather than his family, to show that he was freed from all earthly affection; to close his heart against his relatives, to isolate him completely, and render it necessary for him to persevere in Jesuitism. He was further informed that he could not carry on any communication, or correspondence, without the express permission of his superiors, who would read to him the letters which should be addressed to him, and who should be permitted to burn them, or give them to him, as they should judge proper, by virtue of these words of Christ: "He who hates not his father, his mother, or even his own soul, cannot be my disciple." They asked him if he consented to die to the world, and live for the pope; if he consented to humble his pride, so that his errors and his faults should be pointed out to his superiors by other brethren; and that he also should unveil the faults, the errors, and the actions of others, as should be required of him. Finally, he was to submit, in advance, to all the corrections which might be inflicted on him, as well as to the usual proofs.

These proofs were six principal ones; the first consisted in passing some months in spiritual exercises, in examining his conscience, and in exercising himself in mental or vocal prayer, in meditation on the mysteries of religion, in detesting his sins, and in making a general confession; the second was in serving for a month in a hospital, in nursing the sick, and tending on those whose sores were the most infectious, and the most hideous; the third consisted in travelling for a month without money, and in begging from door to door, to accustom themselves to refusals and privations; the fourth was in filling the vilest offices in one of the houses of the society; the fifth, in catechising children and uneducated persons, in public and private; the sixth obliged the neophyte to be ready to preach and to confess, according to the exigency of time, place, and persons. The most severe sickness did not free the novice from the duties he was to discharge.

All these proofs gone through, they asked the postulant if he was a graduate in the arts, in theology, or in the canon law; if he possessed memory enough to learn well, and to retain what he learned; if his mind conceived with rapidity; if his taste led him to study, and if his health did not suffer from constant application. Finally, if he thought himself strong enough to support the labours required by the society, in study, preaching, or teaching. When the Jesuit aspirant was clothed with the sacerdotal character, he was to lay it aside during his novitiate, and he was to interdict himself from the celebrating mass in public, until he had learned from the superiors of his order how he was to celebrate it, in accordance with the ritual of the society.

Whatever were the rank and knowledge of the postulant, the lowest duties were given to him to discharge, until he was promoted to the grade of temporal coadjutor. The coadjutors were of two kinds; those in orders were called spiritual coadjutors, and the laity temporal coadjutors; all, whether learned or not, could only exercise manual employments in the society. The coadjutors and scholars, after two years of novitiate, were finally admitted into the society, and could no more separate themselves from it; if, however, they deceived one of their superiors, they reserved to themselves the right of sending them away, and from that time they were entirely discharged of their obligations to the company, and freed from their vows. Such were the fundamental points which constituted the code of the Jesuits. Important modifications were afterwards introduced into the rules of the society, and the Jesuits professed doctrines so subversive, that popes and kings were constrained to place a rein on their ambition and immorality.

Whilst his holiness was organising the sacred soldiery, who were to carry the banner of pontifical despotism into all the countries of the world, the inhabitants of Perouse had revolted, and driven away the Roman collectors, as well as the legate. Peter Louis Farnese, in his capacity of gonfalonier of the church, immediately marched against the rebel city, at the head of an army of banditti, who ruined the provinces, burned the farm houses, murdered the cultivators, rooted up the fruit trees, and maimed the beasts. After a siege of two months, the inhabitants, destitute of provisions and munitions, laid down their arms, and surrendered at discretion to the bastard of the pope. This monster, instead of showing clemency to the conquered, arrested all the notables, whom he ordered to be beheaded, hung, or burned; he caused the women and girls to be violated by the soldiers, and reserved the young boys for his own debaucheries. Then, to prevent a return of another such revolution, he built a fortress, as if walls or towers could guarantee tyrants from the hatred of the people, and as if a determined man did know how to defeat those who reduced his country to servitude. The plans of the castle were executed by Michael Angelo, the last of the pleiades of great artists who had survived the Medici.

Brantome, Raphael, San Gallo, had already been mowed down by death, and Michael Angelo alone remained to replace, and to render the reign of Paul the Third illustrious. His admirable genius sufficed for so difficult a task; and by tripling himself, if we may so speak, he created three master pieces in painting, sculpture, and architecture. He made his sublime picture of the last judgment, the statue of Moses on the tomb of Julius the Second, and the designs of the church of St. Peter, of which he modified the old plans and reduced it to the form of a Grecian cross. To these titles to the admiration of posterity, Michael Angelo joined the purest disinterestedness, and refused a salary of six hundred Roman crowns, which the pope had assigned to his functions, as architect of the cathedral. He laboured for seventeen years without emolument, in the construction of the cupola of St. Peter's, and had the glory of finishing the most magnificent monument which past ages have bequeathed to us.

As for Paul the Third, for whom Catholic writers claim a part of the admiration of men for these glorious works, he was simply occupied in promulgating bulls which authorised the institution of the Jesuits, notwithstanding the active opposition of some cardinals, who regarded a religious order organised in accordance with such principles, as the most antichristian of all the orders of monks. The holy father was not disturbed by the murmurs of these prelates; he considered that these fanatics could render immense services to the Holy See, and he protected them with all the force of his authority.

The papacy had indeed great need of aid and assistance. England had entirely broken the yoke of Rome; scarcely any vestige of Catholicism existed in Germany; Luther and Melancthon daily added to the number of the protestants; Switzerland, Piedmont, Savoy, and all the neighbouring countries, were converted to the doctrines of Zwingli and his disciple Oecolampadius; Calvin, though retired to Geneva, was inundating France with his writings, and reforming all the southern provinces, and his doctrines were propagated with surprising rapidity, even beyond the Alps, in the heart of Italy itself.

Paul the Third immediately lanced forth his cohorts of Jesuits; he sent them into every region, into both the hemispheres; some he commissioned to introduce themselves into courts, to become confessors of kings, to obtain for him state secrets; he commanded others to preach to the people, to become instructors of youth, so as to corrupt their morals, and to make of them new satellites devoted to the theocracy. The Jesuits sought to increase their ranks every where, and they multiplied in a prodigious manner; but although they had already obtained sufficient influence over Charles the Fifth to induce him to convoke a diet at Ratisbon, and to take energetic steps against the Lutherans, they could not arrest the progress of the Reformation in Germany.

Notwithstanding the efforts of Gaspard Contarini, the legate of the pope, and of the Jesuits who accompanied him, the assembly at Ratisbon refused to come to any determination against the Lutherans. Furious at this disappointment, and not knowing on whom to avenge themselves, the Jesuits accused Contarini with having betrayed the cause of Catholicism, by recoiling before energetic measures, and they wrote secretly to Paul to denounce the legate. When the cardinal returned to Rome, he was submitted to a severe examination, and gave such explanations, that his holiness was obliged to agree that the Jesuits were infamous calumniators, and that the vigorous measures which they proposed against Germany, were of a character to compromise the existence of the papacy, instead of saving it. He did not, however, address any reproach to them; on the contrary, he wrote to such of the society as remained near Charles the Fifth, to supervise his conduct, that he loved them even more for what they had written concerning Gaspard Contarini; that their accusations against that prelate were so many new proofs of their zeal in the service of religion; that he besought them to use their influence over the emperor, to render him docile to the Holy See, and to inspire him with the idea of soliciting from the pope the favour of an interview at Lucca; to consult upon the means of extirminating the heretics, and to decide upon the fitness of a new crusade against the Turks.

Thanks to the interference of the confessor of Charles the Fifth, events took place as the pope desired; the conferences were held at Lucca, in the apartment of his holiness, and the emperor adopted the resolutions which it pleased Paul to propose to him. The two sovereigns then separated; the pope returned at once to Rome, and two days after his arrival, caused a jubilee to be proclaimed through all the cities in the ecclesiastical states, with the distribution and sale of ordinary and extraordinary indulgences, to call down the protection of Heaven on the person of the emperor, and to obtain success for his arms in the strife in which he was about to engage against the enemies of the Christian faith. He issued, at the same time, a bull for the convocation of a general council, and designated the city of Trent as the place of meeting. His holiness, in his decree, ordered patriarchs, metropolitans, bishops, all those who from their rank or dignities had a deliberative voice in oecumenical assemblies, to be there on the first of November, 1542, in order that they might treat successfully for the union and harmony of princes, people, and the church, as well as for the means of opposing the enterprises of heretics and the infidel.

The sovereign knew well, that the period for the convocation of the council, agreed with that which was fixed for the rupture of the peace between Francis the First and Charles the Fifth. The Jesuits, attached to the courts of these princes, had also informed him that the king of France had concluded an alliance with Gustavus Vasa, king of Sweden, and that the dauphin would march on Perpignan, whilst the French armies would invade at once Piedmont and Flanders. On the other side, his holiness knew that the emperor was to send troops to the threatened points; he hoped that the German prelates would not dare to leave their dioceses, either from fear of falling into the hands of their enemies, or from the necessity of not leaving their churches in such disastrous circumstances, and that thus he would acquire a majority.

Paul was unwilling to prorogue the opening of the session, though urged to do so. At the appointed period he sent to Trent as his legates, Peter Paul Paris, John Moron, and Reginald Pole, commissioned to sound skilfully the opinions of the ambassadors and prelates who should present themselves at the council, without, however, passing any opinion themselves. They were enjoined to report at once to Rome, and to do nothing without new instructions. But it happened that the Germans, on whom his holiness had not counted, were present in great numbers, and were very urgent in demanding the opening of the council. The pontiff, informed by his legates that there were fears that his adversaries were the strongest, they came to a final determination, and put off the opening of the synod to a remote period. No one was duped by the tactics of the holy father; and this measure, which showed that the court of Rome feared a defeat, was the reason why a great number of the faithful renounced Catholicism to embrace the reformed religion.

Among the papists who deserted the ranks of the Roman church, historians name Bernardin Ochino or Okini, general of the Capuchins, a man of exemplary life, who, tired of preaching uselessly against the disorders of convents, and of beseeching the pope to come to some determination on this grave subject, abjured Catholicism and retired to Geneva, where he married a young girl of Luda. They also cite Heugman, metropolitan of Cologne, of the illustrious family of the counts of Werden, who, despairing of the safety of the church, brought the protestant preacher, Martin Bucer, near him, and established him in the city of Bonn a dependency of his diocese. In the following year he brought about him Melancthon, Pretorius, and some other celebrated Lutheran doctors to aid him in the propagation of the new doctrines; but as a great number of Jesuits were already scattered through the province, his plan of reform met with great opposition on the part of the clergy and chapter of Cologne, who appealed to the pope and the emperor from the ordinances of the archbishop.

Paul addressed a letter of congratulation to the ecclesiastics of Cologne, and exhorted them to persevere in the good way, and to prevent him who called himself the archbishop of their city, from infecting the inhabitants with errors: "Do not recognise him," he added, "as your pastor, but as your enemy; and rise up against him, as David did against Goliath."

Charles the Fifth also congratulated the chapter of Cologne on its resistance to the errors of the prelate; he did not, however, attach much importance to this affair, being himself occupied with carrying on hostilities against France, for the possession of the dutchy of Milan.

As neither Francis the First, nor Charles the Fifth, were willing to abandon their pretensions on this rich province, the pope hoped to be able to profit by their disagreement, and seize, for his nephew, on the dutchy in dispute.

He first opened his views to Francis the First, who did not seem indisposed to yield his claim on the payment of a good price; he then asked for an interview with Charles the Fifth at Busseto, to treat with him for it. These two sovereigns had several conferences, but the emperor rejected some entreaties that the holy father made to him, to surrender this state to his son-in-law, and his natural daughter. He was also unwilling to hear of either a peace or a truce with Francis the First, whom he called a miserable coward, destitute of courage, faith, and loyalty; and when his holiness desired to represent to him how much good might result to religion from their agreement, he replied, they must expect nothing good from a prince, who was pitilessly exterminating the reformed in his own dominions, while he was treating with the Lutheran princes, and even the Turks, to the great scandal of Christendom.

Paul the Third remarked, mal-adroitly, that the king of France reproached him with the same things, and accused him of deceit and cruelty. Charles broke out at once on the holy father; he heaped invectives upon him, and ordered him from his presence. All negotiations were at once broken off; the emperor returned to his dominions, drove the Jesuits from his court, signed a treaty of alliance with Henry the Eighth, the irreconcilable enemy of the Holy See, and published, at the diet of Spire, an edict in favour of the protestants, prohibiting any person from being troubled in Germany on account of their religion. He, moreover, made an ordinance, providing that the two parties, Catholics and protestants, should peacefully enjoy the property of which they were in possession, provided they would use it in founding schools for children, and asylums for the poor. It was further specified that the judges of the imperial chamber should be selected equally from Catholics and protestants. Paul the Third caused his legate to enter a protest against the diet of Spire, and wrote, with his own hand, a vehement letter to Charles the Fifth, in which he said, that his edict in favour of the protestants would insure the destruction of his soul, since it belonged to the Roman church, exclusively, to decide on questions of faith; that he had thus become guilty of usurpation against the Holy See, by making a decision in regard to church property, and by reinstating rebellious prelates in their honours and dignities. He finally threatened him with employing severe measures against him, and with excommunicating him, if he persisted in his desire to govern the ecclesiastical affairs of Germany.

This missive produced no satisfactory result; the emperor merely replied to the deputies who brought it to him, that when he was at leisure, he would inform his holiness of his intentions. It became, however, necessary to arrive at some determination with regard to the heretics; the pope wished to press the opening of the council of Trent, which had been already prorogued; and, in order to make a powerful party for himself among the pre-ates who were to compose it, he entered into an active correspondence with the Jesuits, who were to act in secret on the consciences, and to gain partizans for the pope. Notwithstanding all their efforts, only four Catholic bishops, in addition to the three Roman legates, appeared at Trent during the first month.

This great coldness among the clergy shows, stronger than words can, that they had no longer real faith, nor sincere devotion; questions of religion and morality had ceased to be the principal ones for the priests; they had only become, for ambitious, greedy, and corrupt men, a mere means of levying on superstition and human ignorance; but procureurs to augment their power, their honours, or their revenues, whether as the servile agents of the court of Rome, or as devoted ministers of Catholic kings. Intrigue had reached every rank of the ecclesiastical hierarchy; prelates, as well as mere priests, changed their convictions and their doctrine, according to circumstances, or the interest of the moment. Fanaticism was dead in their weak and venal souls, which no longer used religion but for measures of diplomacy or ambition. Chiefs of dioceses thought only of establishing their revenues on solid foundations, and of settling their bastards well, as the popes set them the example.

The constant efforts of Paul the Third to elevate his bastards are an irrefragable proof of this. Having failed in his efforts to elevate Peter Louis Farnese to the duchy of Milan, he fell back on the states of Parma and Placenza, out of which he wished to create a duchy for his son. He first sought to procure the consent of the sacred college, which was necessary for the alienation of provinces belonging to the church; he proposed to the cardinals, as a compensation, to increase the apostolic domains by the duchies of Camerino and Nepi, which he had before given to his son, and to levy in Parma and Placenza an annual tribute of nine thousand ducats for the treasury of St. Peter. Several thousand crowns of gold distributed among his creatures, induced them to think the compensation an equitable one, and his bastard was proclaimed duke.

Peter Louis established himself at once at Placenza, and erected a citadel which commanded the city, according to the custom of tyrants, who surrounded their residences with fortresses and walls, to keep their people in continual fear, to weigh them down without danger, and to place themselves beyond the reach of the vengeance of the citizens. He was then employed in disarming the nobility and burghers; he restrained their privileges, and forced them to reside in the capital, that he might the better superintend them. As the fortune and power of some among them were a subject of grievous apprehension to the new duke, he sought to ruin them by giving a retrospective effect to laws; he examined into their former conduct, had them judged and condemned by unjust magistrates to considerable fines, to the entire confiscation of their property, and sometimes even to death.

His holiness, satisfied with the course pursued by his son, no longer gave any attention to this matter, and confined all his cares to the council; four metropolitans, a cardinal, sixteen bishops, and five generals of orders, had reinforced the seven prelates, who had already waited a month for the opening of the synod. As they were all devoted to the court of Rome, the pope judged the moment favourable for striking a great blow, and he issued a bull ordering the prelates assembled at Trent to open its session. Accordingly the legates, assisted by twenty-six bishops, some theologians and Jesuits, who were regarded as representing the universal church, opened the council. On the succeeding day, they sent an account of the first session to Rome, and requested instructions from his holiness as to the order which they were to observe in the reception of ambassadors, and the mode of taking the votes, whether by nations, as in the councils of Constance and Basle, or individually, as in the last councils of the Lateran; finally, what matters they were to deliberate upon, and in what order. When they arrived at the Vatican, the legates found the pontiff very much occupied with the reception of a prior named Paul, who came in the name of the king of Ethiopia, to propose to submit to the Roman church, by abjuring the schism of Dioscorus, and who at the same time asked for missionaries to teach the people of that country. The holy father charged the Jesuits with this mission, and dismissed the Ethiopian ambassador, after having loaded him with old bones, which he sold him as relics of saints and martyrs.

Paul the Third immediately assembled the sacred college, to deliberate on the request of his legates; each gave his opinion, and the secretary of the consistory framed the following reply to the trusty friends of the Holy See: "We decide that the votes be received individually and not by nations, since it is easier to corrupt individuals when isolated, than when in a body; we desire the council to call itself simply oecumenical, without adding these words 'representing the universal church,' which may tend to raise the pride of the fathers, and especially to call in doubt the supremacy of the pontiff. We decide that all questions for examination shall first be treated of in private meetings, then in a general one, and, finally, be presented in the sessions, which alone should be made public, in order to avoid making the faithful witnesses of scandalous debates, of which the enemies of our authority," adds the holy father, "will not fail to avail themselves; we exact that this formula be used at the head of all your decrees: 'The holy oecumenical council, lawfully assembled by order of the pope, under the guidance of the Holy Spirit, the apostolic legates presiding in it, declares.'" His holiness further enjoined on his legates, not to deliberate on any question touching his authority, and not to make any decision, unless he himself had dictated it in its most circumstantial details. As a compensation, he left to the fathers full latitude on questions of faith, which interested him very little; in fact, Paul the Third was accustomed to say, that if the reformed, anabaptists, Lutherans, or sacramentarians, would recognise him as sovereign pontiff, he would grant them full freedom to preach any superstitions that they wished to teach men.

In a second letter, addressed to the fathers of the council, the holy father exhorted them to preserve regular conduct during their labours, to follow religious exercises, at least ostensibly, and to separate from their mistresses, who had followed them to the city of Trent; allowing them sufficient latitude in other particulars.

The preparatory meetings took place for the examination of questions, and the Jesuits decided that they should treat of matters of faith and reform simultaneously, so that by confounding the fathers, they could determine on nothing; but the court of Rome, which trembled even at the very word, reformation, immediately sent fresh instructions to the Jesuits, to lay aside entirely the question of reform, and to keep within bounds when treating of the doctrines of the heretics. Paul instructed them to protract the council, in the hopes that time would produce something favourable to the Holy See. It happened the third session was scarcely closed, when they heard of the death of Martin Luther. This great man had terminated his illustrious life at Eisleben, his home, and left six children by his wife, Catharine of Bora, a young nun whom he had married in 1525.

His death gave rise to violent accusations against the Jesuits, and on their side, to strange stories. The protestants said, that the disciples of Loyola had poisoned the reformer; the Jesuits said, that he had hung himself, that the devil had strangled him; others said, that like Arius, his bowels had gushed out in an effort of nature in a secret place. There were even found priests who maintained, that his tomb having been opened on the day following his interment, there had issued from it an infectuous odor of sulphur and bitumen, and that an enormous piece of coal was found instead of his body. All the circumstances of his life, his doctrines and his birth, were the objects of ignoble calumnies on the part of the Catholics; they published libels against him, affirming that he sprang from carnal commerce between the devil and his mother; they blackened his memory, by accusing him of having sold to Satan his eternal share in Paradise for fifty years of a pleasant life on earth; of having denied the existence of God and the immortality of the soul, and of having composed bacchanalian hymns.

Notwithstanding this deluge of calumniating pamphlets, Luther remained the apostle of the northern nations, and his belief, which had already penetrated to the shores of the Baltic, was propagated through all the north of Germany; it reached Livonia and Prussia, where the grand master of the Teutonic order abjured Catholicism; the new doctrines finally invaded Holstein, Sweden, Denmark, Great Britain, and even France, though funeral pyres and scaffolds were erected from one end of the kingdom to the other, for the extermination of protestantism.

Although in a dogmatical and philosophical point of view, it is true that Lutheranism could not sustain a profound examination, we should still glorify Martin Luther for having snatched the people from the yoke of the court of Rome, and from having led humanity forth from the degradation and darkness, into which greedy, debauched, and ignorant priests had plunged it. It was Luther, who, by his spirit of investigation and analysis, taught men to discuss, judge, and condemn, the despotic acts of those, who to this time maintained that they had only to render an account to God for their good or bad actions; it was he alone, who, by the force of his genius, accomplished that religious revolution which wrested half of Europe from the tyranny of the popes. Thus, then, Luther merits to be glorified, even in the most distant ages, for the great things which he accomplished during his life, and for the principles of liberty and emancipation which he bequeathed to posterity.

His numerous works place him in the first rank among the writers of Germany; and Clay does not hesitate to say, that he was inspired by the Holy Spirit in the correction of the language. His translation of the Bible has become a classical work, which, if we may say so, has fixed the rules of the German language.

Notwithstanding his admirable genius and his inflexible logic, Luther had not, however, extracted all the consequences from the principle which he wished to establish, "That no dogma should be admitted as an article of faith, without having been submitted to the examination of human reason," a principle which overthrows the sacred tradition, and annihilates Christianity under every form, by submitting the words of God himself to the criticism of human intelligence.

As soon as the death of this formidable adversary of the papacy was known at Trent, the fathers of the council went into an immediate consideration of a question which they regarded as the corner stone of the church; it was, to fix the number of the canonical books. They published two decrees on this subject; the first pointed out as the orthodox books, the old and new Testament, and the second affirmed the authenticity of the text of the Vulgate, notwithstanding the gross errors and faults charged to it. After they had made these decisions, Paul the Third raised his head boldly, and armed himself with the thunders of the Vatican. He first excommunicated the archbishop of Cologne, and liberated the subjects of the prelate from their oath of fidelity and obedience; he then gave the see to count Adolphus of Schawemburg, whom the metropolitan had made his coadjutor; but the emperor having refused to permit this bull to be executed, and continuing to give the title of archbishop to the elector, he was obliged to put off his vengeance against that prelate to another time. His holiness was the more disposed to sacrifice his sentiments to Charles the Fifth, since he had entered into negotiations with him, to obtain from him sufficient aid to annihilate the protestants. The arrangements entered into between these two tyrants for this impious war, provided, that the pope should pay to his imperial majesty two hundred thousand crowns of gold; that he should furnish twelve thousand foot soldiers, and five hundred calvary, at his own expense; that he should surrender to him, for a year, one half of the revenues of the churches of Spain; that he should authorise him to alienate to the amount of five hundred thousand crowns the property of the monasteries of his kingdom; that all the troops of the church should be commanded by Octavius Farnese, but that the latter should not act, but in accordance with the orders of the emperor, or of the duke of Alba, his lieutenant, and that the cardinal Alexander, the brother of Octavius, should remain in Spain as a hostage, under the title of legate, at the expense of the Holy See. These conditions having been acceded to by both parties, Paul the Third published a bull to inform all Christendom of the abominable compact, by which an emperor and a pope pledged themselves to carry fire and blood through whole provinces. Charles the Fifth was not behind the pontiff in his manifesto; he placed John Frederick, elector of Saxony, and Philip, landgrave of Hesse, beneath the ban of the empire; he called them disturbers of the peace of nations, rebels to the laws, ravishers of church property, infamous despoilers; he accused them of having covered themselves with the cloak of religion, and of having feigned sentiments of patriotism, for the purpose of seducing Germany, and of drawing off his subjects from the obedience which they owed their sovereign; immediately afterwards he sent troops against them. Fortunately the princes of the league of Smalkald, who were on their guard against treason, flew to the aid of the elector, and opposed the entrance of the confederated troops into his states.

Paul the Third wished to take advantage of this conflict, to transfer the council of Trent to a city which was dependent on him; but Charles the Fifth, who desired to reserve to himself the means of treating with the Germans if he were conquered, opposed this plan, and signified to the court of Rome, that it must give all freedom to religious discussions; that he had undertaken the war against the protestants, only to bring them back to their obedience to him, and not to impose his belief on them. The pope replied to the ambassador of Charles, that he did not understand his late recriminations, that their treaty specified, that his majesty pledged himself to second him in a war of extirmination against the Lutherans, and that besides, the publication of a jubilee and the levy of tithes for his advantage throughout all Spain, was a witness of his adhesion to the crusade which they were to execute in concert against the Germans; that he was consequently to determine what measures it was proper to take to accelerate the extinction of the schism, and that he persisted in his resolution to transfer the council to Lucca.

This obstinacy of the sovereign pontiff so exasperated the emperor, that he sent a courier immediately to Trent, bearing orders to his ambassadors to throw the cardinal of Santa-Croix into the Adige, if he obeyed the court of Rome, or dared to dissolve the synod. The threat had the desired effect; the sessions continued, and the fathers remained at Trent. Paul the Third then took another course, and under pretext that the emperor refused to divide with him considerable sums exacted from the cities they had reduced, he recalled his troops from Germany; nay more, he organised a conspiracy against the Doria of Genoa, who supported Charles, and they would have undoubtedly been driven from that city, if John Louis, of Fiesca, who was at the head of the plot, had not been drowned in the port, at the very moment when the struggle was to have commenced. Finally, as the pope dared not break up the council, he hastened its deliberations, and caused its decisions to be published daily, so that the protestants, apprehensive of the close of its labours, should not be tempted to come to it.

Charles understood perfectly the end of the holy father's policy, and as he could not prevent its results, being still detained in Germany, he determined to strike a blow which should go right to the heart of his enemy; it was to cause Peter Louis Farnese, the bastard of his holiness, to be stabbed.

Four young lords of Placenza, the count Pallavicini, Landi, Anguissola, and Gonsfonieri, entered into the plan of the prince; they formed a conspiracy, of which Ferdinand of Gonzagua, the governor of Milan, directed the operations, and on the appointed day, thirty-seven of the conspirators, with their arms concealed beneath their garments, introduced themselves into the citadel of Placenza, as if to pay their court to the duke; after having seized on the principal passages of the palace, John Anguissola entered the chamber of the duke and stabbed him, before the latter, who was eaten up with horrid sores, and unable to defend himself, could call for aid; the conspirators then fired two cannons to warn Gonzagua, who was at a little distance from the city with an armed force, that he might enter it. The Spaniards immediately disarmed the papal troops, and took possession of the province in the name of the emperor.

As soon as the news of this revolution had reached Rome, the pontiff fell into a kind of vertigo, which drew from him frightful imprecations; he blasphemed the name of God, cursed the mother of the Saviour, the apostles, and all the saints and saintesses of paradise; he muttered frightful threats, and wished to league himself with infernal spirits to conjure the death of the emperor. He remained shut up in his laboratory for several nights, pronouncing exorcisms, studying the course of the stars, consulting his astrologers and magicians; and as his conjurations did not advance his vengeance, he sent a cartel of defiance to Charles the Fifth, challenging him to a closed field, and offering to fight him to the death.—His imperial majesty having refused this singular offer of the pope, the latter treated with the Sultan Soliman, to induce him to make a descent on the shores of Naples. At the same time, he spread a report, that the plague had broken out at Trent; this determined the fathers, who were about to open the eighth session, to transfer the council to Bologna.

Well framed as were his machinations, two unlooked for events, the deaths of Henry the Eighth and Francis the First, caused them to fail. The victory of Muhlburg, also gained by the imperialists over the princes of the league of Smalkald, rendered Charles the Fifth more powerful than ever. The elector of Saxony had fallen into his power, and his estates had been given to Maurice of Saxony, of the Albertine branch. The emperor, who was well informed of the intrigues of the court of Rome, naturally took his revenge, and excited in Germany a violent opposition to the Holy See. He even determined the electors to write to the pontiff, that they would proceed to serious extremities, if he did not at once re-install the council at Trent, and he caused their complaints to be supported by Mendoza, his ambassador.

Paul fell back on the respect which he said he had for the decisions of the fathers, and in his reply to the German princes, excused himself on the obligation under which he was, not to interfere in the deliberations of the council; he said, that the prelates had themselves determined to continue their sessions at Bologna, and that he could not consequently make them return to Trent, but that the Lutheran bishops could choose to come to Bologna, or send their agents to confer with the fathers. He contented himself with replying to their threats against the Holy See, that the throne of the vicar of Jesus Christ, was founded on an immoveable rock.

This obstinacy of the pope in retaining the synod at Bologna, and refusing to right the demands of the states and the emperor, resulted in exasperating the protestants, and in determining Charles to declare himself a kind of head of the church, and to publish a decree, which was called the Interim. This edict, instead of appeasing the troubles, rendered the religious quarrels more violent than before, the prince having prescribed to all his subjects of both communions, rules of conduct, which were to be observed until the church, as a body, had explained itself on the points of controversy between the reformers and the Catholics. The Interim displeased all parties; they compared it for temerity to the Ecthesis of Heraclius, and for impiety to the Types of Constantius. The Lutherans complained highly, that it imposed on them, doctrines which they had condemned as sacrilegious, and ceremonies which they had rejected as superstitious, such as the rites observed in the celebration of the mass, in baptism, in the sacraments of marriage and of extreme unction. The Catholics also blamed it and cried out persecution; but the pope, who saw that it would ruin the party of the emperor, by rendering him odious to both Lutherans and orthodox, made no opposition to it, and maintained a neutrality.

The magistrates at first succeeded in having the imperial decree approved by some trivial burghers, and the Lutheran ministers were compelled to abandon their flocks and condemn themselves to a voluntary exile. This critical moment did not last long; the people soon resumed the offensive, all Germany rose and demanded the abolition of the Interim. Charles wished to resist this general outbreak, and sought to have his decree approved of by the court of Rome, and the fathers who had separated from the prelates assembled at Bologna, and had remained in the city of Trent; but they made no concession, and the holy father also refused to sanction the edicts of the prince.

His holiness contented himself with sending Jesuits into Germany, authorised to free the faithful from the observance of the precepts contested by the Lutherans; to allow them the use of food on fast days, the communion under both kinds, every thing in fine, except the marriage of the priests and the lawful possession of property taken from the clergy. Notwithstanding these concessions, the papacy was so execrated in the German provinces, that no protestant would consent to range himself beneath the banner of the Jesuits. The holy father then determined to hasten the labours of the assembly of Bologna, but the emperor again thwarted his plans, and in despite of the efforts of the Jesuits Laynez, Salmeron, and Lejay, the deliberations could not be continued.

Paul wished to try a stroke of policy; he lanced a bull, which declared the council dissolved, and ordered the fathers at Bologna, as well as those who had remained at Trent, to go to Rome, to put an end to the schism, and to decide in council on the matters which divided Christendom. Charles the Fifth prohibited the prelates of Trent from obeying the sovereign pontiff, and things remained as before.

Soon after, the emperor opened negotiations with Paul the Third, and proposed to him to have his last bull executed in his kingdom, provided his holiness would give his approval to the Interim, and not convene the fathers of Trent at Rome, but as mere prelates. This offer was rejected, as Charles had expected, but the negotiations were protracted, and he had obtained his end, which was to gain time. His Catholic majesty knew that the death of the pope was near, from the frightful ulcers which were eating him up, and which had already forced his surgeons to perform a deli cate operation upon him. The dying man had not, however, lost any of the prodigious activity of his mind, and although he perceived that his life was gradually wearing away, he did not cease to employ himself with magic, with consulting astrologers, magicians, necromancers, and all the diviners of Italy, on his own destinies, and those of his family. Octavius Farnese, the second son of Peter Louis, was the especial object of his solicitude, and since the death of his bastard he had centered on him all his affections and his hopes. He at first proclaimed him duke of Parma, and entrusted him with the command of the pontifical troops, so as to place him in a condition to defend himself against Ferdinand Gonzagua, who, not content with the possession of Placenza, had invested the fortresses of San Dominico, of Val di Taro and of Castle Guelfo, and was, moreover, preparing to attack Parma.

The pope soon discovered the absolute incapacity of his grandson, and fearing lest he might permit the imperialists to seize on his duchy, he hastened to re-attach it to the domains of the church, and to send Camillus Orsini, the generalissimo of his armies, to place himself at the head of the troops, and to replace Octavius Farnese, whom his holiness recalled to Rome. Still, whilst transmitting his orders to him, the sovereign pontiff pledged himself to place Octavius in possession of the duchy of Camerino, as soon as he had concluded a treaty with either Spain or France. But the young Farnese, finding himself deprived at once of the duchy of Parma, by his grandfather, and of the state of Placenza, by his father-in-law, resolved on vengeance; and two days after having left Parma, when he supposed Camillus Orsini was no longer on his guard, he retraced his steps and fell upon the advanced posts, which he wished to carry, so as to re-instate himself in the city. This effort having failed, he entered into negotiations with Ferdinand Gonzagua, and engaged to abandon his claims of Placenza, and to recognise himself as a vassal of the emperor, if he would aid him in reconquering Parma from the Holy See. The news of this defection so operated upon his holiness as to produce several fainting fits in a day.

Paul perceived that his last hour had come, and yet, through a sentiment of pride or ambition, he still wished to triumph over Charles the Fifth, and signed a brief to re-instate in the duchy of Parma, him who was the cause of his death, provided he would abandon the party of the emperor. This bull was not, however, executed; the bishop of Pola, to whom it had been entrusted, kept it until the death of the pontiff, which took place on the 16th of November, 1549.

Ciaconius affirms, that if Paul had lived some months longer, he would have excommunicated the emperor, and have declared in favour of France, in order to be revenged for the assassination of his bastard, Peter Louis Farnese. These dispositions of the pope were well known to Charles the Fifth, for when he received the despatches which announced to him the death of the pope, he exclaimed, "There is at length one Frenchman less at Rome," and handing the letters of his ambassador to Prince Philip, he added, "Learn this news, my son, and be assured, that should the Farnese open the body of the pope, they will find three lilies engraven on his heart."

Several ecclesiastical authors have eulogised this pontiff, and Henry of Spona, in his Continuation of the Annals of Cardinal Baronius, after having exalted the virtues of this head of the church, thus terminates his panegyric: "We must admit that the holy father had a strange affection for his family, which led him to commit many crimes; but he repented in his last hour, repeating the words of the psalmist, 'if mine own had not ruled over me, I should have been without reproach,' and God has pardoned him." A singular mode of explaining facts and interpreting history.

JULIUS THE THIRD, THE TWO HUNDRED AND TWENTY-NINTH POPE.

[A. D. 1549.]

Intrigues for the election of a pope—Exaltation of Julius the Third—Commencement of his pontificate—His infamous amours with Bertuccino, the keeper of his monkeys—He makes his minion a cardinal—Edict of the emperor against the protestants—Negotiations with France—Bulls of the holy father in regard to the council of Trent—Progress of the Jesuits—Persecutions of the heretics in Italy—Affair of Parma and Placenza—Council of Trent—Treaty between France and the Holy See—Death of the nephew of the pope—The council is suspended—His holiness negotiates a peace between the emperor and the king of France—Revolution in England in favour of the Roman church—The Jesuits are pursued in France—Julius sends a nuncio into England—His death.

THE funeral ceremonies of Paul the Third had been over for twenty days, when the cardinals entered into conclave. They first entrusted the care of Rome to Horace Farnese, who commanded four thousand infantry, and that of the Vatican, to the count de Paigliano, who had under his command five thousand Italian horse, and a troop of Swiss, ordinarily attached to the service of the pontifical palace. From the commencement, there were three factions in the sacred college; that of the imperialists, that of the French, and that of the Farnese family, of which Alexander was the head.

Each cardinal naturally used all his efforts for the success of his party, and after some ballotings, it was discovered that the Spanish and French parties were equal. Though Alexander Farnese had fewer voices than his competitors, his game was to make the balance incline for him, and he sought to gain them. A skilful man, the cardinal assembled his partizans, and discussed with them whether to ally himself with Charles the Fifth, or treat with the French. Opinions were then divided; some rejected every alliance with the emperor; they recalled his treasons, his deceit, and the recent assassination of Peter Louis Farnese, and concluded that it was preferable to declare for the French; they added, that by the assistance of a pope, who owed his tiara to them, they might obtain aid in men and money, which would place the Farnese family in a condition to recover the cities of Placenza and Parma, of which Octavius was despoiled. Others objected that it was dangerous to treat openly with the French, and to draw upon themselves the wrath of the emperor, who might easily destroy the Farnese; that they should judge of the future by the past; that if Francis the First, united with Paul the Third, had been unable to resist the forces of the empire, it was not probable that his son would be more successful at a period in which all the princes of Italy were leagued against the French; that besides, by his last treaties, Charles the Fifth was allied with Octavius, and would not fail to sustain him, since he had no longer to dread the ambition of a pope of their family. These last reasons determined the cardinal, Alexander Farnese, to support Pole, a cardinal of the blood royal of England, a man of merit, who was presented by the imperial faction. Unfortunately, Caraffa ruined his election, by accusing him of Lutheranism; this accusation made such an impression on the members of the sacred college, that they all withdrew their votes from him. Salviati, was also rejected on account of the severity of his morals; at last, the Farnese faction presented its candidate, who was one of the minions of the dead pope, the cardinal del Monte. The incapacity and infamous habits of this prelate were sure guarantees that he would not undertake any reforms; a majority of voices was obtained for him, and he was immediately proclaimed sovereign pontiff and father of the faithful, by the name of Julius the Third.

The cardinal del Monte was born at Rome, in the quarter del Perione, of a poor family, originally from Mont Sansavino, in Tuscany, a dependency of the diocese of Arezzo. He was, according to the expression of Bayle, a true soldier of ecclesiastical fortune, who had gradually raised himself to the presidency of the council of Trent. He had first been metropolitan of Siponto, auditor of the apostolic chamber, twice governor of Rome, and then cardinal. As he was gifted with a very handsome person, adds the historian, it is easy to imagine what had procured him so many benefices, and such high dignities.

His language and manners were in harmony with the dissoluteness of his morals. Even in the conclave, he practised iniquity of the most bestial description, and instead of concealing it, permitted himself to be detected by his colleagues. Bayle has preserved for us a correspondence between his holiness and a courtesan of Rome, whose favours Julius shared with the cardinal Crescentius, and whose children were reared at a common expense. These letters contain recitals so disgusting, that it is impossible to put them in decent language.

As soon as he was consecrated, Julius acquitted himself of his engagement with Alexander Farnese; he restored the city of Parma to Octavius, and gave twenty thousand crowns to Camillus Orsini, to indemnify him for the loss of the command of the province. He was also careful to shield himself from the anger of Charles the Fifth, who might be enraged at him for disposing of that city without his consent, by giving him satisfaction of another kind, and he pledged himself by a solemn oath, pronounced in a public consistory, in the presence of the ambassadors of all the courts of Europe, to continue the council of Trent.

His Catholic majesty, satisfied by this concession, sent Louis d'Avila to the court of Rome, to congratulate the new pontiff on his exaltation, and to ask for a bull for the re-opening of the synod. Julius replied to the compliments, by great protestations of devotion and affection for the person of the emperor; but in regard to the convocation of the council of Trent, he made but evasive promises, and objected that he could not call it together without having first obtained the assent of the court of France, and of the principal states of Italy. "Besides," added he, laughing, "we have been but a few days on the throne of the apostle, and you will not complain of us for abandoning ourselves to festivals and pleasure, before surrendering ourselves entirely to business."

On quitting the reception, the ambassadors of his Catholic majesty wrote to the emperor, that the political system to follow with the court of Rome was that of intimidation, since it was presumable that such a pope would make all imaginable concessions, rather than be troubled in the midst of his rejoicings and debauchery. In fact, during his whole reign, Julius thought more of enjoying the pontificate, than of exercising it. "At the court of his holiness," says a grave historian, "the days and nights were passed in feasting and saturnalia. It frequently happened that the pope, after having become intoxicated in company with his cardinals and loose women, threw off his garments, compelled his guests, male and female, to do the same; then putting on an under vest, which descended scarcely below his breast, he placed himself at the head of this strange dance, and traversed the gardens of the Vatican, singing and dancing. When the holy father was tired, he re-entered the palace to continue the orgies." "Well," said he to his cardinals, "what do you think the people would do, if in the day time, with candles in our hands, we went in this accoutrement to the field of Flora, singing obscene songs instead of hymns?" "Stone us," replied a cardinal. "Then," replied the pope, "we owe it to our dress that we are not stoned, as we deserve to be." Nothing can give an exact idea of the impurities committed at the court of Julius the Third; the writer adds, "his holiness was almost always drunk, and passed his nights in orgies with courtezans and his cardinals."

It was at the close of one of these debauches, which had lasted from six o'clock in the evening until the next morning, that the pope took a fancy to elevate to the cardinalate a child of sixteen, called Innocent, who had filled about his person, when archbishop of Bologna, the double office of minion and keeper of the monkeys. Julius had such an affection for him, that not content with having him adopted by Baldwin del Monte, his brother, he had installed him in his episcopal palace, where he gave him absolute power, being even unwilling that his masters should constrain him to the slightest tasks, from fear of injuring his health. Some historians affirm, that this minion, whom they call Bertuccino, or the little monkey, was a natural child of the pope.

Since the exaltation of Julius the Third, the young Innocent continued to dwell at Bologna, and obstinately refused to come to Rome, unless a cardinal's hat were given to him, which, notwithstanding the strong desire of the pontiff to have his favourite with him, he had not yet dared to propose, from fear of exciting too violent an opposition in the sacred college, before his authority was well affirmed.

At last, one morning, in a debauch, whether his holiness thought himself in a situation to impose his will, or whether it had become impossible for him to remain longer separated from Bertuccino, or whether he had drank more than usual, he determined to make his Ganymede a cardinal, and convened the members of the sacred college in consistory. At the hour of meeting, Julius, with a head still weak, and with tottering steps, entered the assembly, and seated himself on the pontifical chair. He first commenced a strange speech, in which he lauded complacently the lascivious allurements, and extraordinary talents of his minion in debauchery, adding, that the astrologers had announced great wealth and high dignities for this child; and that it was, without doubt, to accomplish the oracle, that destiny had permitted himself to reach the throne of St. Peter; he finished by demanding the hat of a cardinal, and a bishopric for his favourite

A lively opposition was at once manifested by the members of the consistory. Caraffa represented in energetic terms, that such a proposal dishonoured the purple, and that it would be disgraceful to the cardinals to admit a miserable keeper of monkeys among them, whom his holiness recommended solely for his expertness in corruption and impurity. That the pope could, at his pleasure, load him with riches, give him palaces, domains, abbey, cities, provinces; but that they should abstain from profaning the dignity of a prince of the church, since, in the troubled condition in which Christendom was, the protestants would not fail to avail themselves of such a scandal, when attacking the papacy. Finally, he added, turning towards Julius the Third, "I appeal to the pontiff himself to be a judge in his own cause; is not his minion, from his vices and ignorance, unworthy of the cardinalate?"

At this apostrophe the holy father could not restrain his rage, and exclaimed, "By the womb of the Virgin, I swear my minion shall be cardinal. What have you to reproach him with, to refuse his admittance into your college? His vices! Are you not all devoured by shameful maladies, and plunged into all kinds of abominations? Let him among you, who has not prostituted himself carnally at least once in his life, cast the first stone at him! Ah! you keep silence—do you admit then that we are all of us a disgrace to humanity? Commence with me; what great virtues, what prodigious knowledge did you encounter in me, to make me pope? Am I not an execrable priest? Am I not a thousand times more infamous than my minion, the keeper of monkeys, whom I corrupted? Well then, should he be better than I, who am, thanks to you, sovereign father of the faithful; how dare you refuse to make a cardinal and a bishop of him?"

These reasons appeared so conclusive to the sacred college that all opposition ceased; the promotion of the Ganymede passed unanimously, and on the same day his holiness sent the hat to Bologna, with a draft for twelve thousand crowns on the apostolic treasury. Innocent set out at once for Rome, where his arrival gave rise to public rejoicings, which lasted for several days. From that moment the young cardinal never left the Vatican, now passing his days in the private apartments of his holiness, extended upon soft cushions, and contemplating the antics of a favourite monkey, whilst courtezans burned soft perfumes, and poured out enervating liquors about him; now filling the functions of head of the church, which had been surrendered to him with the title of first minister, and dispenser of grants, benefices, and prebends.

During the first months of his pontificate Julius the Third abstained entirely from business, and thought of nothing but his pleasures. The table was, according to John Crespin, one of his most important occupations, and the choice of meats a most important affair. "His holiness preferred pork and peacock," says the historian, "on account of their aphrodisiac virtue; but, as he abused the use of them, the physicians forbid his steward from serving them at his table. It happened that one Friday, Julius, not finding his favourite dishes, sent for the bishop of Rimini, his major domo, and ordered him to bring him a roasted peacock at once, accompanying the order with terrible threats, and swearing by the womb of the Virgin, and the rod of Christ, his usual blasphemies, that he would have him hung if he did not obey him at once."

Cardinal Innocent, who was present at this scene, wished to appease him, and represented to him, that so small a matter was not worth so much anger, "Yes, my beautiful minion," said the pope, "since God got angry about an apple, may not I, who am his vicar, swear at my ease about a peacock, which is worth more."

Charles the Fifth soon saw from the turn of affairs, that he had nothing to fear from the policy of Rome, under the reign of a pope abandoned to drunkenness and debauchery. He, therefore, changed the course he had before followed to subdue Germany, and instead of favouring protestantism, as he had before done, he revoked the Interim and published a new edict, which inflicted rigorous penalties on such of his subjects as professed any other religion than the Roman Catholic; he then established tribunals, similar to those of the inquisition, in important cities, and which were commissioned to pursue the followers of Luther to extremities. He then solicited the pope, both by letters and through his ambassador Mendoza, to re-instate the council of Trent, or at least to give a categorical answer, which should dispel all uncertainty on that subject.

This request of the emperor having been made with every appearance of good faith, Julius the Third found himself constrained to reply favourably to it, and to permit the sessions to be re-commenced in the city of Trent. The court of Rome, moreover, was beginning to have less fear of the fathers of the council and even of the emperor, who had in fact, lost much of his influence; on one side the ecclesiastics of both communions were tired of the tyranny of Charles, and appeared to be on the eve of revolting; on the other, his son, brother, as well as his nephew, who all aspired to the empire, threatened to give him so much trouble, that it was not probable that he would have leisure for a long time to interfere in the affairs of his neighbours.

Besides these reasons, it was the custom of the pope to yield to the course of events, and to seek escape from a present embarrassment without troubling himself about the future.—He determined then to issue a bull for the convocation of the council in the city of Trent, granting full absolution to all converted heretics, excepting always, those of Spain and Portugal, his holiness being unwilling, out of deference to Charles the Fifth, to trespass on the rights and privileges of the inquisitorial tribunals. Peter of Toledo, was deputed to carry the bull of the holy father to the court of Madrid, and the abbot Rosetto was sent to the king of France, for the same purpose.—This last legate was also instructed to thank Henry the Second for the assistance he had given him since his election, and to give him explanations as to the policy he had been compelled to adopt in defiance of his engagements with France.

The decree of his holiness was badly received in Germany; the Lutherans renewed their old pretensions of not submitting, but to a free assembly, over which the pope should not preside, either in person or by his legates, and on condition, that it should be submitted to the judgment of the fathers, as they themselves had offered to submit it. In France it met with no better success; the parliaments declared against the bull of convocation, and the king, at their instigation, recalled those of his cardinals and prelates, who were absent from the kingdom, to form a national council, which should be commissioned to choose a patriarch, to preside over the ecclesiastics of his dominions. As a provincial measure, he sent to Rome the celebrated James Amyot, abbot of Bellocane, with orders to protest loudly, in the presence of the ambassadors of all the courts of Europe, against every thing which should be decided on in the council of Trent. This vigorous determination had been taken by Henry the Second, notwithstanding the exertions of the Jesuits, who were commencing to enjoy great influence with the queen, Catherine de Medicis, and who already sought to open colleges of their order.

Julius the Third, like his predecessor, showed a great solicitude for the Jesuits, and confirmed their institution by the following bull:—"In consideration of the great advantages which Ignatius Loyola and his companions have procured for the Holy See, by their preaching, their great skill in business, and their devotion to the interests of our court, we confirm their institution, and declare that all those who would enter the Society of Jesus, should swear to combat beneath the standard of Christ, and obey unhesitatingly the orders of the sovereign pontiff, his vicar in this world. Though the gospel and the faith, teach that all the faithful owe an absolute obedience to the head of the church, still, to render the devotion of the members of this new society more perfect, we had determined that they should take an individual oath to the pope, and pledge themselves to have no will but his, to execute his orders, whatsoever they may be; and, finally, to be always ready to go to the ends of the world to crush his enemies."

The society testified its gratitude to the sovereign pontiff for the protection which he granted it, by endeavouring to procure the triumph of Catholicism in all the countries in which it was established, and by denouncing to the court of Rome, all whom it suspected of heresy. His holiness thus produced information that a great number of theologians, curates, vicars, and mendicant monks, in the different provinces of Italy, were favourable to the reformed doctrines.

Julius immediately sent to the bishops of those countries, an order to interdict the administration of the sacraments, and the preaching of the word of God, to all who did not profess orthodox sentiments; conformable to those of the court of Rome. He also sent a writ to Francesco Donato, doge of Venice, and to the senate, commanding them to lend their assistance to the bishops and inquisitors charged to annihilate the partizans of the new ideas. In consequence of this order, the council of Ten, composed entirely of fanatics, resolved to superintend the inquisitors, and united with them lay judges, to examine the accusations and pronounce the condemnations. As the intervention of the secular authority, instead of forwarding the persecutions of the heretics, frequently interfered with the execution of the sentences pronounced against them, the Jesuits solicited a bull from the court of Rome, prohibiting laymen from cramping ecclesiastical liberty, troubling spiritual jurisdiction, and interfering with the processes against heretics. This ill-advised step irritated the Venetians, and a rupture took place between the most serene republic and the Holy See.

Julius, always occupied with his pleasures, did not interfere in political affairs, but by heedless acts; thus, in regard to Octavius Farnese, who had for a long time solicited from the court of Spain the restitution of Placenza, without being able to obtain it, he was imprudent enough to refuse to undertake his cause against the ambitious Charles the Fifth. It was in vain that the dispossessed prince represented, through his ambassador Antonio Venturi, that not only had the emperor, in defiance of his agreement, retained Placenza, and had fortified it, to place it beyond the reach of an attack, but was even concentrating troops to seize on Parma; in vain was it pointed out to him, that it concerned the honour and dignity of the holy father not to permit the spoliation of one of his feudatories; Julius obstinately refused to take the part of Octavius Farnese; he replied to the envoy of the duke, that his treasury was empty, that his fetes absorbed all his revenues, that he was in complete penury, and consequently unable to go to war; that he would judge what was best for his interests; that his good wishes were with him in his enterprise, but he could do nothing more, though, if circumstances became more favourable, he would not forget the grandson of Paul the Third.

As this reply was far from satisfying the exigencies of his position, and it was becoming urgent upon the duke to defend himself, the cardinal Farnese demanded a private audience of the pope, and besought his holiness to permit Octavius to place himself under the protection of princes sufficiently powerful to resist his father-in-law, to which he acceded.

Fortified by the assent of the holy father, Octavius signed a treaty of alliance, offensive and defensive, with Henry the Second, which excited the anger of the emperor. His Catholic majesty caused his holiness to be informed, that he must pronounce this treaty null, if he did not wish to break with him. Julius, always cowardly and pusillanimous, hastened to publish a decree prohibiting the duke of Parma from introducing foreign troops into a fief which pertained to the church, under penalty of being declared a rebel, and of seeing his property confiscated. The prince replied to the holy father, that it was not in his power to obey, since he had placed himself under the protection of France, by the authority of the Holy See, and that a foreign garrison was already in the place.

The pope then broke out into violent reproaches against the Farnese; he accused them of wishing his ruin, of wishing to create embarrassments for him; and to punish them, he decreed the confiscation of their fiefs, and drove from Rome the cardinals, brothers, or cousins to Octavius. He sent, at the same time, an order to his legate in France, to leave the court of Henry the Second, if he refused to recall the French garrison which was in Parma, and would not surrender, bound hand and foot, the duke, who was a vassal of the Holy See, to answer before the sacred college for his rebellion and his felony. These demands having been rejected, hostilities commenced between France and Rome. The emperor, who was unwilling to break openly with Henry the Second, at a moment when the lightest conflict might lose him Germany, appeared to remain a stranger to this war; the marquis of Marignan, one of his generals, under pretence, however, of taking the part of the Holy See against the Farnese, seized, in the name of Charles the Fifth, on Montecchio and Castel Nuovo.

The pope, alarmed at seeing the emperor thus seize on the places in Romagna occupied by the Farnese, and fearing lest he might take a fancy to keep them, proposed to Hieronyme Orsini, the mother of the Farnese, to the cardinals Alexander and Ranucus, who had retired to Urbino, as well as to Horace, who commanded the troops of Octavius, and to Carpi, who still held the legation of Viterba, to give up to him all the strong places which they had in Campania, so as to place them beyond the reach of the attacks of the imperialists, pledging himself to restore them to their original proprietors, as soon as the war was over. These measures, assented to on both sides, arrested the march of the marquis de Marignan, who having no longer any pretext to carry on the war in the states of the church, and not daring openly to attack the pope, fell back on Parma, whose siege he protracted, waiting for something favourable to turn up.

His holiness at last discovered that this war against France, was in reality only profitable to the emperor, and that it would ruin the finances of the court of Rome, if it were prolonged much longer; he accordingly assembled the cardinals in consistory, and informed them of his intentions in regard to the cessation of hostilities. The latter wrote at once to Alexander Farnese, and to the cardinal de Tournon, the French ambassador, who both hastened to Rome to confer with Julius the Third. They represented to the pope that nothing could be more agreeable to them, than to enter into an arrangement with him, and that it was equally for the interests of the Holy See, since his holiness would thus re-attach to his party the people of Parma and Bologna, who had separated from him on account of his alliance with the imperialists. "Consider," added they, "the disasters which Clement the Seventh brought on Rome, and see if their cause did not lie in his crooked policy, and his alliances with the emperor. Consider, that that same pertinacity in sustaining Charles the Fifth, against Henry the Eighth, drew on the Holy See the irreparable loss of England. What then would be your despair, if a like motive should withdraw France from your jurisdiction? King Henry the Second has already prohibited his subjects from carrying money to Rome; he has already published an ordinance for the convocation of a national council, which shall appoint a French patriarch; already do the doctrines of Calvin, notwithstanding the address of the Jesuits, threaten to invade the kingdom, and replace Catholicism. Therefore, most holy father, hasten, for moments are precious. . . ."

Julius, as usual, sought to allay the storm, which appeared to him most imminent. He replied to the cardinal of Tournon, that he was ready to accept a peace with France, and he instructed him to negotiate it on such conditions as he judged best, maintaining always the honour of the Holy See. He, moreover, confided the legation of France to the cardinal Verallo, whom he knew to be acceptable to Henry the Second, so as to obtain authority from that prince to persecute the protestants, and permission to form some colleges of Jesuits in Paris.

The disciples of Ignatius Loyola did not produce a great sensation in the capital of France, and notwithstanding the efforts of William Duprat, bishop of Clermont, their protector, and notwithstanding their hypocrisy, and their feigned humility, they had not yet been able to overcome the repugnance of the Parisian people, and they vegetated in obscurity, living by extortions, alms, and pious legacies, and having but a dilapidated mansion for their asylum.

Though exercising no apparent influence over the mind, the Jesuits were indeed valuable auxiliaries to the Holy See, from their system of espionage, and the preponderance they had acquired over weak men, who confided to them, under the name of confessors, the direction of their consciences, and that of their wives and children. This hidden power, which they exercised, caused them to be felt, not only in Paris, but in every other country where they were. His holiness, thus counting on their accustomed skill in procuring triumphs for the court of Rome, re-opened the sessions of the council of Trent, under the presidency of Marcel Crescentio, the cardinal legate, assisted by two adjuncts, Sebastian Pighini, the metropolitan of Siponta, and Louis Lipoman, bishop of Verona, without troubling himself about the appeal made to the Lutheran prelates of Germany by Charles the Fifth, who, having at heart a desire for vengeance on the pope, had exacted, that the protestants should be represented in the assembly.

The Jesuits opposed this demand of the emperor, and when it had been transmitted officially to the legates of the Holy See, they protested with energy against it, and raised a crowd of difficulties which rendered impossible, they said, the admission of Lutheran ministers into the council, especially those of Maurice of Saxony; they would only consent to receive pure Lutherans. This concession alarmed the pope, who dreaded the consequences of a debate between the protestants and his theologians, and he informed his legates that they must not authorise any public conference, nor any debate on religious matters, with the followers of Luther.

Violent disputes then broke out between the Catholics and protestants, and the latter, who were protected by the Spanish ambassadors, whose aim was to excite embarrassment at the court of Rome, to compel it to separate from France, ended by carrying it over the pope, and obtained that the Lutherans should be permitted to present the articles of their belief to the secretary of the council in a public meeting. The expressions which they used in their work, when speaking of the papists, and of the worship of the Roman church, were so irreverent, that they caused the greatest scandal among the Catholic fathers.

Whilst the theologians of the different communions were offering to the world the sight of their ridiculous quarrels, the emperor was still carrying on war with his son-in-law; and as Julius the Third feared it would end by the duchy of Parma being taken from the Holy See, he determined to close the negotiations with France. He agreed with the ambassador of Henry the Second, that Duke Octavius should surrender his estates to the Holy See, receiving in exchange the principality of Camerino, and other domains; he pledged himself, moreover, to place a garrison in Parma, which should be composed one half of French and Italians, and he entered into a solemn engagement to keep this city against the emperor, and not to favour him in any difficulties he might have with France. But Duke Octavius having shown to Henry the Second, that this arrangement ruined his family, the king ordered the cardinal of Tournon to go to Rome to modify the terms of the treaty, and to demand that Octavius should be maintained in Parma, and the duchy be placed under the protection of France. The cardinal could scarcely make Julius comprehend, that this last arrangement was the only one which was advantageous to the Holy See, since it gave him always in Italy a powerful enemy to oppose to the ambition of the emperor.

They consequently agreed upon the following articles: 1. That the pope should preserve, for two years, a neutrality between France and the empire, and should not assist either party with men or money, nor in any other way. 2. The city of Castro should be restored to Horace Farnese, provided the cardinals Alexander and Ranucus, his brothers, should become surety for his conduct towards the Holy See. 3. That the pontiff should recall his nephew, John Baptist del Monte, and the troops which are still in the service of the emperor. 4. His holiness will inform Charles the Fifth, of the conditions of this treaty, and that he must evacuate the territory of Parma and Mirandola.

Notwithstanding the real advantages which resulted to the Holy See from these arrangements, they were on the point of being lost, by the obstinacy of the pope's nephew, who not only refused to treat with France, but even threatened to declare against the church, and in favour of Charles the Fifth, if they persisted in recalling the troops which were at Mirandola, under his orders. Fortunately, he was killed in a sortie, and his death raised the last barrier to the ratification of the treaty between France and Rome. Julius at once sent orders to his generals, Alexander Vitelli and Camillus Orsini, to lead back their troops to Rome. The siege was raised at once, and this courageous city, which had supported for two whole years the rigours of a siege, could at last be provisioned. Hippolyte d'Este, cardinal of Ferrara, took the command of the place, and with the assistance of some French troops, drove back on Placenza a corps of three thousand Germans, who had been sent by the marquis of Marignan, to attempt to retake the positions abandoned by the besiegers. The emperor was much discontented with all that had occurred, and threatened the court of Rome with his anger, if it did not hasten to break with France; but no regard was paid to his remonstrances. His power was already beginning to decline, his knavish actions were used up; his Machiavelian policy no longer made dupes; all, whether kings or people, had a like contempt for his person. He, moreover, found himself up to his arms in a war with the German princes, which he had been imprudent enough to bring on, and whose results could not but be fatal to him.

As soon as hostilities had broken out, the princes, Maurice of Saxony, and Albert of Brandenburg, hastened to inform the fathers of the council of Trent of it, that they might abandon their idle discussions, and return to reinforce their ranks; at the same time, they published a manifesto against the emperor, whom they justly accused of having violated the constitutions of Germany, and with having made attempts upon its independence. The king of France skilfully profited by these circumstances, and declared himself the defender of the Germanic liberties, though at the same time, he was endeavouring to demonstrate to the pope that the Lutherans had been but instruments in the hands of Charles the Fifth, to abase the pontifical power.

A powerful league was spontaneously organised throughout all Germany, for the defence of religion, and an army of protestants marched toward the city of Trent. Then the Spanish, Neapolitan, and Sicilian prelates, who feared to be made prisoners, as the subjects of the emperor, if they fell into the power of his enemies, fled in haste from the council. The Italian bishops soon followed their example, and embarked on the Adige to go to Verona. At last, when only the nuncios and a few Jesuits remained, Julius the Third ordered the suspension of the council. His holiness could the better take this step as Charles the Fifth was no longer in a condition to alarm him, being himself attacked on all sides by the French and Germans. Finally, after several months of bloody strife, the emperor was conquered at Inspruck, and compelled to purchase peace.

By the treaty of Passau his majesty set at liberty John Frederick, the elector of Saxony, as well as the landgrave of Hesse, the father-in-law of the elector Maurice; he granted the free exercise of the worship prescribed by the confession of Augsburg, and the recall of the protestant ministers exiled by virtue of the Interim. He, moreover, consented, on the representation of the electors, to place the government of Germany in the hands of his brother Ferdinand, who was proclaimed king of the Romans. This prince already possessed the kingdom of Hungary, in full sovereignty, which had been augmented by the dominions of Queen Isabella and her young son, the king of Transylvania, in consequence of their forced surrender to him by their lawful masters. This spoliation had been done for the advantage of Ferdinand, and by the bishop George di Martinuzzi, who received, as a recompense, the title of viceroy and the hat of a cardinal.

In the end, through one of those reverses of fortune so frequent at the court of princes, the prelate became suspected by the new monarch, and his death was resolved upon. A certain marquis of Castaldo, a confidant of Ferdinand, was charged with the execution of the crime. One day, when the cardinal was going to a pleasure house he had at Winitz, Castaldo asked permission to accompany him, making no scruples at becoming the guest of his victim. All his measures were arranged by the marquis, that in case his failure, a troop of Spanish soldiers should carry him off. On the following morning, the secretary of Castaldo was introduced into the apartment of Martinuzzi, under pretence of handing him some despatches, and whilst the cardinal was stooping over the table to sign them, he stabbed him in the breast with his dagger. The prelate felt the wound, called for assistance, and threw himself upon the assassin to crush him, but at the noise of the struggle, Castaldo entered with his sword in his hand, and at a single blow cleft his skull. As he still stood erect, four soldiers discharged their aquebusses at once at him, and he fell dead. The dead body remained for seventy days on the floor of the apartment, the Spaniards steadily refusing to bury him; at last, Count Sforza Pallavicini, who commanded in the province, permitted the Hungarians to inter it.

Independently of his desire to rid himself of a man whom he dreaded, the king of the Romans hoped he should put himself in possession of large treasures; he was greatly deceived; for the assassins found only a very small sum, which they divided among themselves, and Ferdinand received for his share only an ear, which the barbarian Castaldo sent him, as a pledge of his devotion.

As soon as the news of this murder reached Rome, his holiness became greatly enraged, and cited the monarch before his tribunal, to justify himself of an assassination committed on a prince of the church. In vain did the ambassadors of Ferdinand, and those of Charles the Fifth, interfere to have this decree revoked; the pope declared he would have justice on a sovereign, who was rash enough to kill one of his cardinals, and on the refusal of Ferdinand to go to Rome, he fulminated an excommunication against him and his accomplices, and ordered the sentence to be published in all the kingdoms of Europe. This act of rigour is the only one that can be cited during the reign of Julius the Third, and we are induced to believe that he only obeyed the impulse of the sacred college, which had the death of one of its members to avenge; for, in less than a month after the publication of this bull, he yielded to the threats of the Spaniards, and recalled his decree of excommunication. The ambassadors of Charles the Fifth knew so well how to tempt the cupidity of the pope by the promises of large sums, that they determined him to offer himself as a mediator between Spain and France. Prosper, of Santa Croix, one of the great dignitaries of the court of Rome, was sent to Henry the Second, to consult with him as to the mode by which concord could be re-established between the two sovereigns. The king of France was unwilling to enter into any agreement with the emperor; he would only consent to renounce his plan of invading the kingdom of Naples and to draw off the fleet of Soliman, his ally, which was cruising on the shores, on condition that the imperialists would leave the territory of Sienna, whose inhabitants were at war with the emperor, and that the independence of this flourishing city should be recognised by the prince. This concession not having satisfied any of the belligerent parties, hostilities recommenced in Italy; but the emperor soon found himself constrained to leave Tuscany with his army, to fly to the assistance of Naples, which the Turks were blockading closely. On parting, he gave full powers to the Holy See, and authorised Julius the Third to offer peace to the Siennese, on condition that they would recognise the cardinal Fabian, the nephew of the pope, as their head, and receive a foreign garrison. These proposals were again rejected by the citizens, who did not want to be ruled by the pope or the emperor, and they continued to carry on the war to recover their independence.

Whilst the people of Italy were endeavouring to free themselves from the tyranny of the bishops of Rome, the Calvinistic theologians of Geneva, those implacable enemies of the papacy, those furious censors of the abuses and cruelties of the Catholics, became in their turn persecutors, and were erecting, on the public square of their city, the funeral pile which was to consume Michael Servetus, condemned as impious, heretical, and atheistical.

This celebrated man was originally from Villanova in Arragon. At the age of sixteen, he came to France to study law in the university of Toulouse; after having finished his studies he travelled through Italy, and became connected with the Socinians; he then visited Switzerland and Germany. At Basle, he had had public discussions with Ecolampadius; at Strasburg he had disputed with Capiton Bucer on the doctrines of the Trinity and consubstantiation; he had maintained to them that the reformers had not entirely accomplished their work of emancipation, since they feared to apply the hatchet and the hammer to the old edifice of superstition, and to beat it down to the last stone. His adversaries were alarmed at the boldness of his views, and Bucer, who was regarded as the least violent among the Lutherans, said one day, at the close of a conference which he had with the young Servetus; "this wretch is stronger than all of us, and if we do not cut him to pieces and wrench his bowels from him, he will devour us."

Shortly afterwards Servetus published his dialogues upon the Trinity, whose singularity excited all the protestants against the author. Alarmed by the dangers he ran in Germany, he took refuge in France, renounced the career of the bar, and studied medicine. He was not more successful in this new profession, for having put forth some new ideas on the circulation of the blood, which were in opposition to those of the faculty, they cried out heresy, forced him to leave Paris, and abandon his labours on a discovery which was afterwards regarded as one of the most splendid triumphs of man in the domain of science. He then retired into Dauphiny and entered the establishment of the brothers Frelon in the capacity of a proof reader. Charged with the superintendence of a reprint of the Bible, he added to it a preface and notes which Calvin called impious and impertinent. Michael replied to the attacks of the reformer, and entered into a correspondence with him on the different questions of their belief; their dispute soon became so envenomed, that their letters contained only the grossest invectives; they thus became irreconcilable foes. Servetus wishing to humble his rival, sent him a manuscript, in which he pointed out a great number of errors he had made in his "Christian Institution," the best of his works, which made Calvin so furious, that he wrote to Favel and Viret, two of his disciples, that if this heretic ever fell into their hands, they must use all their influence to destroy his life.

Michael then produced his famous treatise "De Christianismi Restitutione," of which there are now but two copies extant. Notwithstanding the care of the author to cover himself with an anonymous veil, Calvin divined him from the irony, with which he spoke of himself and his writings. From this moment the death of Michael Servetus was resolved on by the reformer; and to reach his end he did not hesitate to play the part of an informer; he sent to the archbishop of Lyons some leaves from the treatise of Servetus. The cardinal de Tournon, who filled the see of that city, at once set on foot inquiries, to discover the office from which the book had issued; but his researches having been fruitless, the author was on the point of escaping the danger which threatened him, when Calvin sent from Geneva the originals of some letters which had been addressed to him by Michael, and which had been printed in the treatise. Servetus was immediately arrested and confined in the prisons of Vienne, to await the day of his judgment. His friends, fortunately, found means to get him out, and they concealed him in the environs of the city. As he feared lest his retreat should be discovered, he determined to quit France and went to Geneva, to go from thence into Italy.

Calvin gave him no time; as soon as he heard that his enemy had taken refuge in a city in which he was all powerful, he caused him to be arrested, and as he did not wish to be submitted to the laws of the country, which provided, that in such cases, the accused and the accuser should share the same dungeon, he yielded the principal part to one of his domestics named Lafontaine, and reserved himself for the discussions on theological questions.
